TO THE LEARNED MEMBERS Of the TWO CELEBRATED UNIVERSITIES OF

Reverend and Learned Gentlemen,

THE great helps and encouragement, which the authors of this work have received from your Two Learned Bodies, not only exact this public testimony of our gratitude, but have made us long since look upon ourselves as accountable, in no small measure, to You, for every deviation we have found reason to make from our original plan; especially as the greater part of our number have had, and some of us do still enjoy, the happiness of being members of one or other of your colleges.

The late learned Mr. Sale, the first compiler of this grand work, was so fully satisfied, that it was capable of considerable improvements, that he offered the first plan, rather as a sketch or specimen, than a complete system of what was intended; and accordingly closes it with a hint, that the undertakers were, even then, sensible they should find cause both to make additions to, and to vary from, the method of it, in the course of this history: And that every such addition and variation might the more effectually conduce towards the perfecting of the whole, as far as a work of this nature, and hitherto unattempted by any nation, could be brought to such perfection, care was taken, in the proposals prefixed to every number of the first and subsequent volumes, to invite such of the Learned, both at home and abroad, who wished to see so considerable and extensive a work well executed, and could either furnish us with any useful hints, towards the improvement of the plan or history, or could favour us with any observations, which might explain a doubt, clear up a difficulty, discover an error, or give a new light to any point of history, chronology, geography, &c. that they would be pleased to communicate them to us, with a promise, that they should be thankfully acknowledged, and either complied with, or reasons assigned, why they were not.

This we quickly found to have the desired effect, and many learned men, not only from your Two Illustrious Universities, and other parts of South and North-Britain, but likewise from other parts of Europe, even so far as from Sweden and Norway, favoured us with their correspondence, and furnished us with many useful hints and remarks, and even curious materials, which have been inserted in this work, and well approved by all the Learned of our acquaintance, to say nothing of some others, which will more properly belong to the Modern Part of this history. We were more particularly obliged, for several very curious remarks, to those gentlemen, who undertook the translation of this work into foreign languages, especially the learned translator of it into Dutch, who was pleased not only to send us over his version, as it came out in Holland, but likewise to communicate to us his reasons, whenever he found any, to differ from us in any of those remote and abstruse points, concerning which nothing can be offered, at best, but probable conjectures, and wherein, consequently, every author has an undoubted right to declare, and defend, his own. And as it plainly appeared to us, that these gentlemen had not been behind-hand with us in calling in the best helps, and consulting the ablest judges of their nation and acquaintance; so not to have paid a due regard to their judgment, in points of that arduous and intricate nature, would have been doing a manifest injury to them, and a much greater to the public.

But, notwithstanding all this, our eyes have chiefly been fixed on your Two Illustrious Bodies. It is to some of your learned Members that we have had constant recourse, in all doubtful points; and it has been their decision that has finally determined us in every deviation from, or, rather, ther, as we have good ground to hope, in every improvement we have made, to our original plan; for, whether they occurred to ourselves, in the course of this work, or were communicated to us by our correspondents, they never received our approbation, till they had previously obtained the sanction of some of the most learned amongst You: And that we might the more effectually come at your real sentiments, we did not content ourselves with a bare epistolary intercourse, but deputed, upon all such material emergencies, some of our number to your Universities, to consult with such members of Both, as were known to be best versed in those points, in which we wanted advice, or could direct us to the most likely means to improve both the design and the work itself: And this was done sometimes by personal application to such of our learned friends and acquaintance, who, we were sure, would give us their opinion, without any reserve; but, in other cases, much oftener, by a third hand; that is, by the assistance of some persons of their acquaintance, who could more freely introduce the point in question occasionally, as it were, and without any other seeming view, than to know their private sentiments on the subject. And by this means it was, that many of them have been prevailed upon to open their minds more freely, especially where they differed from us; which their extreme modesty, the inseparable companion of true learning, might, in all probability, have induced them to conceal, had they been applied to in any other way. Hence it will be allowed, that we took the most effectual steps to enable ourselves to carry on this arduous and useful work in such a manner, as to intitle it, as we may presume to say, to the kind acceptance it hath met with from your Two Illustrious and Venerable Bodies: and, as a natural consequence of that, from the public. And the obligations we are under on this head to several of the Learned Members of those Bodies, will, we hope, be deemed a sufficient apology for addressing this concluding Volume of the Antient History to both your Universities, as well as for every thing that, in the execution of the work, shall be found to deviate from our original plan.

However, for our further justification to the rest of our readers and encouragers, who are unapprised of our frequent applications to You, as well as to remove even the shadow of a suspicion, that this address was calculated to insinuate them into an implicit belief of, and acquiescence to, what we have ventured to affirm in it, we shall, for their fuller satisfaction, acquaint them, in the Preface here subjoined, not only with the most material alterations we have made to our plan, but with our reasons for them, and the visible advantages the public will receive from them; and we doubt not but they will convince every unprejudiced reader, that we have, in every such deviation, studied the ease and benefit of the student and purchaser, much more than our own interest.

But, not to anticipate what more properly belongs to the pages following, we beg leave to instance to You, our Reverend and Learned Patrons, only one of those alterations, indeed a very considerable and advantageous one to the Purchasers, which was first thought of and agreed upon at Oxford, and has been since honoured with an universal approbation; we mean, the dividing the whole work into two distinct classes or bodies; the one, to contain all that is properly called Antient History, and which is now happily concluded in this Seventh Volume; the other, all that belongs to the Modern part, which is now to follow; that so each part might be had separate, or, when completed, together, as the genius and inclination, the course of study, or circumstances of every purchaser, should determine him.

All that we shall presume further to add to this our thankful acknowledgment for all Your past favours, shall be only our constant and hearty prayers for increase of the honour, welfare, and prosperity, of your Two Illustrious Bodies, and to declare our sense of the singular happiness which this address affords us, of subscribing ourselves,

Reverend and Learned Sirs,

Your most Obligated, most Dutiful, and Humble Servants,

The Authors.

P R E F A C E.

HAVING been induced to deviate, in several particulars, from our Original Plan, we think ourselves obliged, in the Preface to a Volume which concludes one great period of our labours, to lay before the public our reasons for so doing.

These deviations, then, may be reduced to the three following heads.

The First, That we have swelled the book to a greater bulk than we had promised in our Proposals.

The Second, That we have taken a much longer time to finish it than we had engaged for.

The Third, relates to that division of the work into two distinct bodies ; the one, of the Ancient History, the other of the Modern ; which is mentioned in the preceding Dedication.

As to the First article, relating to the increased bulk of the work, it is necessary to observe, That the fourth number of our First Volume was scarce published, when we received complaints from several of our correspondents, that we had handled the histories of the Egyptians, Syrians, Canaanites, and other ancient nations, in so concise a manner, as could by no means answer the principal end of the work, which, according to our Proposals, was, to save our readers all that vast expence of time and books, which they must otherwise be at, to obtain a competent knowledge of the histories of the respective nations, by furnishing them with a Complete Body of History, ready compiled to their hands ; and, at the same time, to let in upon the abstruser parts, all the light that could be gained from ancient and modern authors ; as well as from our own study, and, even, conjectures, where the matter to be treated of, admitted not of absolute certainty.

These considerations, and others of equal force, determined us to be more full and explicit for the future, upon every curious and material point ; and even, where requisite, to write short dissertations upon them ; and since our purchasers would be gainers by these additions, if they were pertinent and instructive, to be less solicitous, than we had been, about the bulk of the work ; which must, of necessity, by this means, be greatly increased.

Accordingly, we found ourselves obliged to enter upon a more diffuse and copious display of historical facts, extracted from a much larger number of authors, than we had before selected, and, as our subjects called for it, to take into our scheme the principal masters of Chronology, Geography, Natural History, Politicks, Philology, &c. And by these means we presume to say, we have given our readers a clearer and more extensive view, not only of past ages, and ancient nations ; but of their various religions, laws, trade, navigation, climates, genius, learning, manufactures and produce ; of their wars and conquests, rises and falls ; and, in a word, of every thing that is diverting, useful, and instructive in the history of each country ; intermingling occasionally, besides, proper explanations of every dark and intricate point ; reconciling original authors, and removing every difficulty, as far as the nature of the subject, and our own abilities would admit.

Nor may it be amiss, in this place, to observe, that if we had principally consulted our own interest, as Authors, or that of the Proprietors, we must have been naturally led to adhere to our original design. For as, on the one hand, the more expensive a work of so large a nature, is made, the fewer purchasers it will have ; so on the other, the succinctness we had proposed to observe, would have afforded us a very plausible excuse (had we been inclined to make use of it) for passing over slightly, or in silence, many things which were difficult to come at ; whereas a more enlarged and capacious plan, necessarily obliged us to take notice of every thing that we imagined our readers had reason to expect either from our care or industry.

These considerations will, we presume, sufficiently apologize for the length we have been obliged to run into : and, at the same time, necessarily account for the Second deviation from our Proposals ; which is, The delay of the work : For the reader cannot but suppose, that the abovementioned alteration in our scheme, must have laid us under a necessity of entering upon new studies and researches, and of procuring great numbers of the scarcest books ; some of which were not to be had in England ; so that no small time was required after we had, with the greatest difficulty, obtained them, to digest them ; and when we had done this, we were obliged to new-model the copy we had before in a manner ready for the press.

But hence, that is to say, from this enlargement of our plan, resulted a still greater cause of delay than the former ; for, hereupon several of our society declined the work ; some plainly acknowledging, that it was become too difficult a task for them to perform, while others, as freely, declar'd, that it would be too laborious an undertaking ; and that it was unlikely to succeed in such a manner as to afford them a suitable encouragement for the time and pains which this new method made absolutely necessary to be taken. This extremely surprized, and even disconcerted the remaining few, who began then to apprehend, that the design must be wholly laid aside. But the proprietors having found the work, so far as it was published, received with an uncommon approbation, and their learned encouragers, as well abroad as in Britain, extremely desirous to have it prosecuted, resolved, as they had been already at a very great charge in providing books and entering into Correspondencies, &c. to spare no expence to obviate this new and very discouraging difficulty ; by engaging, as opportunity should offer, new assistances ; in which they happily succeeded. But nevertheless, like mariners in a storm, who are obliged to part with some valuables, in order to save the rest of the cargo, they found themselves under a necessity to give up that part of our Proposals, which engaged us to publish twenty sheets monthly : For, after proper hands were procured, which was not easily or soon effected, it must be supposed, that it took up some considerable time, notwithstanding the extraordinary qualifications of the new-engaged gentlemen, to acquaint themselves with what had been already done ; with the method to be proceeded in ; with the authors we had selected for our purpose ; and with the system of history, chronology, &c. which, upon the maturest deliberation, and with advice of our learned friends, we have resolved to follow throughout the work.

To these difficulties, (to which may be added, the much-to-be-regretted death of a valuable assistant) which would have been unfurmountable to authors and proprietors less determined to prosecute so useful, and, we will venture to say, so publick-spirited an Undertaking, was it owing, that the publication of the First Volume, more particularly, was so long delayed, that we began ourselves to apprehend, that the Work would not meet with an encouragement answerable to our assiduity and pains. But when our readers and correspondents came to see what they were likely to gain by this delay, it procured from them such a kind and generous reception to our labours, that it inspired the proprietors with hopes, that altho' the first edition might not compensate them, nor even repay them the interest of the money they should be obliged to expend in the prosecution of a Work, that must necessarily take up some years to complete ; yet that the probability of its becoming a Standard Work to Posterity, and of a future impression, (the present not being a large one) and that their families, if not themselves, might reap the benefit of their risques and expence : This therefore induced them to spare no pains nor charge to perfect it ; and this ardor being seconded by all the gentlemen employed, we have been enabled, notwithstanding such unavoidable and unforeseen hindrances, as have been

occasioned by the sickness, the death, and sometimes the necessary absence of some of our society, to publish every volume more regularly since; and at length to complete this body of Ancient Universal History, in such a full and extensive manner, that the like never had been attempted in our own nation, or any other.

But before we obtained this desirable end, and even at the time we determined upon the alteration we have mentioned; to wit, the enlargement of our plan; another difficulty, and that no small one, occurred, which concerned principally the interest and advantage of our kind Encouragers: For we could not but foresee, that by this more diffuse manner of treating our subjects, we must necessarily swell the Work to a price as well as to a bulk, that might not be suitable to the convenience of every one that might be desirous of being possessed of so valuable a repository of ancient and modern learning. And this brings us to account for

The Third material deviation from our original plan.

To be the better enabled to obviate this difficulty, some of our society undertook personally to consult such of their learned friends at Oxford, on whose judgment they had the greatest reason to rely. The result, after the maturest deliberation, was, as we hinted in the Dedication, to divide the Work into two distinct bodies; the one, to contain the Ancient, the other, the Modern History; so as that each might be purchased separately, as the genius or circumstances of our encouragers should determine them. And as the preparation necessary for the Modern Part, would take up some time, that intervening space, it was observed to us, might possibly make the purchase of the Modern Part, when it came to be published, more convenient to such as chose to have both:—While the Ancient History would deserve, nevertheless, to be considered as a perfect Work of itself.

To what we have mentioned on this head, we shall observe, that this deviation from our original plan, will render the study, as well as the purchase, easier to many gentlemen, who are desirous to acquire knowledge in the history of the Universe, than if we had adhered to our proposed method; as it will enable them to distinguish with greater certainty and judgment between what properly belongs to the Ancient, and what to the Modern. For such a distinction is manifestly necessary to be made between those ancient kingdoms and nations, that have long since ceased to be such; for instance, the ancient Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, Persians, Grecians, &c. and those that continue still in being, under the same or other denominations; as also, from those that remain nearly in the same condition which they have been in from the remotest times; such as the Moscovites, the Tatars, vulgarly called Tartars, the Chinese, and many other eastern and northern nations.

And here it is proper to observe, that upon the prosecution of this part of our new plan, another distinction appeared to us absolutely necessary to be made; and that was, between the ancient state of these kingdoms and nations that still subsist, and that period of time in which they were brought to the form of government they now enjoy, or live under; as it is proper, for the better elucidation of the history of those nations, to begin their Modern at that epocha. Thus, for instance, the ancient nation of the Arabs, with respect to its religious concerns, differs as much from itself before and since the time of Mohammed, as any two nations can well do, from one another. Their Ancient History, therefore, could not reach lower than that epoch; and it is our design, for the same reason, to begin our Modern, at the birth of that noted Legislator. The like may be said with respect to the history of Spain, Gaul, Germany, Italy, and several other countries; in which, had we followed our first Plan, the Ancient and Modern History would have been so blended and confounded, as to have rendered both much more unintelligible to our readers, than now they will be found to be.

But we ought not to omit mentioning, that while we were endeavouring to please such of our judicious readers, as admonished us against being too succinct and concise, we had the misfortune to be blamed by some few others, for having been too copious and diffuse in some parts of the Work, particularly in the Roman History. But here, not to remind those gentlemen, that the History of the Constantinopolitan Empire is, properly, includable, and therefore included, in that of the Roman; we desire, that it may be considered, that the Roman History is by far the most considerable of any, both as to the extent and copiousness, as well as the usefulness of its matter; and that by reason of its unbounded conquests, the affairs of almost every nation in the then known world, must be, more or less, included in it; and the more, because in duration of time it exceeded any of the other three Universal Monarchies, as they were called. And as there was a necessity, that the most material transactions between the Romans, and the nations they subjugated, should be inserted either in the history of the one or the other, we judged it more eligible, to give the preference to the conquering nation; and in our account of the others, to refer for the principal transactions between both, to that of the Romans; than to take the contrary method: And by this means the histories of the other nations are treated with a brevity which that of the Romans would less allow of; references being constantly made in them to the Roman History; as will be found in our accounts of the ancient Spaniards, Gauls, Germans, &c. By this method, prolix as the one part must necessarily seem, compared with some of the others, the bulk of the Work in general is very little augmented.

But we had still a more cogent motive to treat the Roman History thus extensively: The reader may remember, that it had been written very lately abroad in other languages, and by several hands; but tho' by far more diffusive than ours, yet in so partial and unsatisfactory a manner, that it would have been next to impossible to have set the most important and instructive facts related in it in their true light, without descending into all those particulars, which serve as a clue to unravel the truth and springs of the principal ones. And this we have frequently hinted at in several parts of that history, by way of apology, and to prevent our readers being misled into a notion, that we were swelling the Work to an unnecessary bulk, for selfish considerations.

When we first entred upon this great Work, we resolved to make it a rule with us, to avoid, as much as possible, all Religious disputes, and to leave all controverted points of that nature to Ecclesiastical writers: But we had scarcely passed over the threshold; (that is to say, the Cosmogony) before we found reason to dispense, occasionally, with this our Resolution.

The account which Moses gives us of the Creation, the Flood, the Dispersion of nations, the Foundation of ancient kingdoms, &c. is so succinct, and, in many cases, so dark, intricate, and controverted, that our readers would have reaped but little benefit from the best light we could have given them, unless we had descended to particulars, by explaining some, proving others, and obviating or answering such objections, as had been, or might be made to that and the rest of the sacred historians; as well as inserting the various notions and systems which the learned, whether Christians, Jews, or Gentiles, had built either upon, or against them. And we were soon convinced, by the universal approbation that first Volume met with, as well as by the letters which we received from our correspondents, that this method, tho' difficult, and likely to swell the first Volume beyond our intention, ought to be strictly followed where-ever our materials were taken from the inspired Penmen.

By this means, we may safely affirm, that we have rendered much easier than ever, the study of those remote histories; and, at the same time, by the explication we have given to obscure and difficult places, in the Sacred Books, have cleared up many abstruse Points that had been the subject of Controversy, occasionally answering the Objections of our modern, as well as the ancient Sceptics; and, we hope, have set many important Facts, and intricate Subjects, in such an impartial light, as may both convince and instruct; and upon the whole, save our readers the trouble of consulting an endless number of Commentators, which would be more likely to confound than satisfy, the minds of the younger students especially.

Whatever, therefore, may be objected to this new method, by persons who had much rather be left at liberty to cavil at their pleasure with the sacred writers, the more serious and unprejudiced part have been very well pleased to see those important points so fairly stated and cleared.

This likewise has necessarily increased the bulk of our Work; particularly in our Jewish History: But nevertheless, instead of blaming us, several eminent writers have

have done us the honour of a public approbation, by quoting us, in some of their learned works since published, and many more have favoured us with theirs in their epistolary correspondence.

We must beg leave to add, that we should have been justly chargeable with the most flagrant, not to say unpardonable neglect, if, whilst we endeavoured, as becomes all impartial historians, to vindicate the character of a ZOROASTER, a CONFUCIUS, a SOLON, a LYCURGUS, or any other heathen philosopher or lawgiver; we had left those of our truly INSPIRED WRITERS, and more especially that of our DIVINE MASTER, unrescued from the misrepresentation and obloquies of an unbelieving age. Such an omission must have been interpreted either as a total giving up of the cause of Revelation, or, at least, of all hopes of convincing our modern unbelievers of the truth of it, by any arguments. Whereas we ought, in candor and charity, to believe, that the most sober and thinking part of them are willing and ready to peruse and weigh every thing that can be said against, as well as for, their unbelief. However that be, the success which this work has met with, hath happily convinced us, that our theological, critical, and even philosophical excursions, have been disrelished but by very few, in comparison of those who have given them their approbation and encouragement.

The Chinese, the Eastern Tartars, the Japanese, the Siamese, and other potent Nations of the East-Indies, were, some of them, so wholly unknown, and the rest so imperfectly known to ancient authors, that we have thought proper to refer our accounts of those people (as well as, still more properly, of the kingdoms of America, or the New World) intirely to the intended Modern Part of our Work. But nevertheless, that we may not be thought to omit any thing material to our design, we propose to begin our Modern History of those East Indian empires, kingdoms and states, with a brief recapitulation of all that is to be met with in ancient writers concerning them.

Upon the whole, we presume to congratulate our kind encouragers, as well as our selves, that we have so happily gone through and completed the most abstruse and laborious part of our undertaking: An undertaking, the difficulties whereof the reader will be able to form some idea of, when he casts his eye on the subsequent list of authors which we have consulted, for the first Volume only, (for it would have been too tedious and painful a task to have gone through the whole Seven Volumes in the same manner) and upon the ensuing collection of texts of scripture, which we have either new translated, or explained and defended, or both. We repeat our thankful acknowledgments to them, and to all our correspondents, for their patience with us, and favour to us; and hope, all the difficulties of a task so arduous considered, that our Work will appear worthy of both: Whatever faults there are in it, (and several we have already, as we proceeded, taken proper occasion both to acknowledge and correct) we promise, if we shall be so happy as to see it come to a Second Edition, carefully to rectify them; and to print separately the most material of them, for the sake of the purchasers of this first.

And here, having, as we hope, shewn evident tokens of disinterestedness, in every instance where it could be shewn, and that we preferred the Good of the Work to our own or our Proprietors Interest, we beg leave to mention a grievance that particularly affects both Authors and Proprietors: And that is, That two Printers of a neighbouring kingdom are at this time actually contending, who shall hurt us most, by publishing this expensive work upon us, and propagating their spurious editions at an under-rate; which they may the better afford to do, as they pay nothing for the Copy; and as Paper in Ireland is not subject to a Duty; whereas we in England pay a very large one upon it.

The Proprietors of these Volumes have reason to complain of this ungenerous treatment for two reasons, peculiar, as we may venture to say, to this Work; the first, because the Undertaking is not so much a National, as, answerable to its title, an Universal one; for, altho' we were not a little pleased, that it was thought to have merit enough to be translated into foreign languages, nevertheless we hoped that we were out of all danger of a piracy upon us in the English tongue, to be printed verbatim from our copy: The other, because, if the Proprietors are prevented coming to a Second Edition, they will, notwithstanding standing the encouragement they have already met with, be losers rather than gainers, by reason of the very great expence they have been at, to authors, engravers, &c. and by a trouble and attention, and correspondencies, of a very extensive nature, as well as by an incredible expence of books collected for this purpose; and other incidental charges, which a Second Edition only can compensate.

Notwithstanding this is a grievance that principally affects the Proprietors, yet the Authors and the Public are not wholly unconcerned in it: For, altho' the compilers acknowledge themselves to have been as handsomely gratified, as the thing would bear, for their great pains and labour; yet, as the pirated editions will be printed verbatim from their copy, it will, by preventing a Second Edition to be set forth by them, deprive them of the honour and credit, which they had all along proposed to themselves, in making such corrections and emendations, as, on the strictest and maturest consideration, they should find proper to be made; for we had long ago agreed, that immediately upon the close of this Ancient History, even previous to the publishing of the Modern, each of us should have revised his own Part with the utmost Care and Deliberation; to be afterwards re- and cross-examined and criticized in common concert, in order to have rectified every mistake, supplied every deficiency, retrenched every superfluity; and, in a word, to have enriched it with every thing which either our own retrospection had suggested to us, or which came too late to us from our Correspondents to be inserted in the former.

By this means we promised to ourselves that having thus happily reached the summit of our arduous task, we should be able, as weary travellers from some convenient eminence, to view, as it were at one point of sight, both the difficult roads we had left behind in the ancient, and the more pleasant prospect that was now before us with respect to the modern part, as would have enabled us to have made both more perfect and uniform to each other.

If this good design be thus rendered imperfect, by the sordid intervention of two or three private men, who would never have been venturers or embarkers, originally, in so expensive and precarious a work; and which, indeed, hardly any other persons of learning or business would have prosecuted through so many discouragements, and with a necessary ardour of so many years continuance; may not the Public be said to be universally a sufferer in so base and sordid an invasion of a design not yet compleated? For what heart can the Undertakers have to proceed, even with the Second Part of their Design, the Modern History, if they are to be invaded, and robbed of the due Reward of their labours and risque, by so ungenerous and unjust a violation of their property?

HISTORY,

FROM THE Earliest Account of Time to the Present.

The history of the Carthaginians.

The history of the Carthaginians, from the beginning of the second Punic war, to the destruction of Carthage by Æmilianus.

THE consul Lutatius, at the conclusion of the first Punic war, had behaved with such insolence to Hamilcar Barcas, when, for some time, he insisted, that the Carthaginian troops, under his command, should deliver up their arms to the Romans, and even pass under the jugum, that the Carthaginian general, from that moment probably, conceived an aversion to him, and his whole nation. Nothing could have been more inconsistent with true magnanimity and greatness of soul, than such a conduct, and consequently more disagreeable to a person of heroic and generous sentiments. Hamilcar therefore could not but deeply resent an action so infamous in its nature, and look upon the people countenancing it as void of honour, as strangers to all those amiable qualities, from which military virtue is inseparable. That this notion is founded upon truth, sufficiently appears from Cornelius Nepos, who tells us, that Hamilcar professed he would rather die, than return home loaded with the ignominy a compliance with such a proposal must fix upon him. We may therefore conclude this to have been a remote cause of the second Punic war ^a.

Hamilcar likewise condemned himself for having so tamely given up Sicily to the Romans. Being endued with that greatness of soul so natural to a true lover of his country, he reflected, with the utmost regret, upon that action, which, in every light, he considered as dishonourable, and too precipitate. This undoubtedly excited him to meditate revenge upon that nation, which occasioned so false a step, and consequently determined him to embrace the first opportunity that offered of attacking the Romans ^b.

BUT what the most effectually contributed to the war we are going to enter upon, was the injustice of the Romans, who, taking advantage of the weakness of the Carthaginians, after the Libyan war was terminated, dispossessed that nation of Sardinia, and extorted a vast sum of money from them. The great success of the Carthaginians in Spain likewise heightened the animosity betwixt the two states, and consequently disposed both of them to a rupture. The train therefore for a bloody contest betwixt them was laid before the siege of Saguntum ^c.

THE cession of Sardinia to the Romans, and the payment of the vast sums to that rapacious nation, in compliance with their unjust demands, after Carthage had been so drained by the Libyan war, incensed Hamilcar Barcas, or, as some call him, Boccor, to the last degree. He saw that there was no end of such extortions, and therefore came to a full resolution, not only to endeavour at securing his country from such depredations for the future, but even to take ample vengeance of the Romans for their perfidious conduct in this particular. He therefore inspired his four sons, Asdrubal, Hannibal, Hamilcar, and Mago, with an implacable hatred to that proud republic, which was the object of his aversion, declaring publicly, that he looked upon them as four lions whelps brought up for the destruction of the Romans. Hannibal only survived nearly to execute the vast project his father had formed, and probably was the only one of them endued with a genius fit for the execution of it. From hence it appears, that the grand spring, which set Carthage in motion against Rome at this juncture, was the disposition Hamilcar had transfused into his family, as well as the majority of the citizens of Carthage.

Hamilcar's resentment therefore may be looked upon as the chief impulsive cause of the second Punic war. That great general was of too heroic a spirit, and too strongly attached to the interest of his country, not to make use of all proper means to restore it to its former grandeur. As this could not be done without humbling the Romans, it is no wonder, especially considering the affronts he had in person received from them, that he should bend all his thoughts that way. In fine, after his great achievements had raised his reputation to so high a pitch at Carthage, that he was looked upon there as a second Mars, it is no wonder he should have interest enough to lay the foundations of a second war with the Romans.

THE great success the Carthaginians had in Spain, we may, with Polybius, likewise look upon as a concurring impulsive cause of the second Punic war; for this did not only increase the jealousy of the Romans, and strongly excite them to a rupture, but also dispose the Carthaginians thereto, as it furnished them with such copious supplies both of men and money, which enabled them to put their favourite scheme in execution. The Greek writers frequently call this the Hannibalic war. The interval betwixt it and the first Punic war consisted of twenty-three years.

The Carthaginians repulsed by the Saguntines.

BUT to return to our history: The Saguntines were a colony, partly of the Zacynthians, and partly of the Rutuli from the city of Ardea. According to Livy, they were not of long standing in Spain, though they soon grew immensely rich there, the province in which they were seated being extremely fertile. Their city was situated on the Carthaginian side of the Iberus, about a mile from the sea, near a ridge of mountains, that separated Spain from Caliberia, and in a country where, by the late treaty, the Carthaginians were permitted to make war, though this city was expressly excepted from all hostilities by that treaty. As soon as Hannibal approached their frontiers, he detached a party to lay waste the territory adjacent to the city, and then made a disposition to attack it in three places at once. With his battering-engines he made the utmost efforts to beat down the wall, whilst his troops were in readiness to storm the city upon the first breach made. The Saguntines defended themselves with inexpressible bravery, making frequent sallies upon the besiegers, and destroying many of their men, though they were scarce sensible of this loss, since Hannibal's army consisted of a hundred and fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse. The besieged however suffered extremely in these actions, losing as many men as the Carthaginians; which rendered their condition almost desperate. However, their fate was for some time respite, by a wound Hannibal received in his thigh from a javelin, as he was viewing some of the works; which occasioned such a consternation amongst his troops, that the enemy were upon the point of making themselves masters of all his works and military machines. Till the wound was cured, a sort of cessation of arms ensued, tho' the besiegers still maintained their posts, carried on their approaches, and perfected their works. After Hannibal's recovery, hostilities recommenced with double fury, the Saguntines opposing the enemy with undaunted resolution, and Hannibal pushing on his attacks with the utmost vigour. At last the besiegers, after having laid a great part of the wall level with the ground, and demolished three towers, by which the body of the place lay intirely exposed, made an assault with unparalleled bravery, thinking, that now a fair opportunity offered of taking the a town sword in hand. The besieged, on the other hand, considering, that every thing valuable to them lay at stake, exerted themselves in an extraordinary manner. They drew up their forces in order of battle in the space betwixt the ruins of the walls and the town, and disputed every inch of ground with such incredible valour, that the place where the engagement happened was covered with dead bodies. In short, hope and despair so animated both parties, that the greatest efforts were made on each side. However, at last despair prevailed, the Saguntines forcing the Carthaginians not only to abandon the breach, but to flee to their camp with prodigious slaughter. Livy tells us, that a kind of dart or missile weapon, called falarica (A), was of singular service to the Saguntines on this occasion.

b It appears from Zonaras and others, that, in pursuance of the resolution above-mentioned, the Romans sent deputies to Hannibal at his camp before Saguntum (B), who arrived there about the time we are now upon. According to these authors, Hannibal avoided giving them an audience, and that in a refined politic manner. He employed certain Spaniards, whom he could confide in, to meet the Roman

(A) The description of the falarica, as it may be collected from Livy and other authors, is as follows: The falarica was a kind of large dart, or missile weapon, discharged by the parties posted in wooden towers, upon the enemy. These wooden towers were called fala, as we learn from Juvenal, Servius, and others; so that the weapon undoubtedly derived its name from those machines. It had an oblong shaft, round and even every-where, but towards the end, where it had a square piece of iron, bound about with tow, besmeared with pitch. The iron head, resembling that of the Roman pilum or javelin, was three foot long, that it might be capable of penetrating the strongest armour, and, through it, of doing execution; which it frequently did. As the combustible part of it was set on fire before it was thrown upon the enemy, and this fire must have been greatly increased by the air fanning it in its motion, in case it killed not the person it fixed upon, but only stuck in his armour, it could not fail of throwing him into the greatest consternation; since, in order to preserve himself from the flames, he must have lain under the necessity of disarming himself, and consequently of leaving himself entirely exposed to the future efforts of the enemy. To render this weapon the more terrible, by making the fire indistinguishable, the tow, according to Pontepianus Sabinius and Vigerius, was smointed or besmeared likewise with sulphur, resin, bitumen, and burning oil. This dart was sometimes discharged out of the ballista with an inconceivable force, and did not only destroy men in the manner just mentioned, but likewise frequently consumed the enemies wooden towers, against which it was levelled. The falarica was either magna or parva, as we have before observed of the ballista. From the particulars already laid down, it cannot but appear probable, that this weapon was of oriental extraction; and therefore it can by no means be deemed absurd to deduce the name itself from the east. Fellus, as hinted above, intimates, that the dart here described derived its name from the towers called fala, from whence it was discharged; and that fala, in the Etruscan language, signified high. We may therefore either deduce it from the verb פלה phala, mirabilis, enclausus, ardens, excellens fuit; or from פלה phala, ascendit, altus, elevatus fuit, with a compictive vau prefixed, which will make it פלה phala or phalab. That the eastern nations, particularly the Hebrews and Arabs, used vau and fe, or phe, sometimes in such a manner, without any signification annexed to it, may be proved by many instances; so that there is nothing forced or unnatural in the latter etymon, if the first should not satisfy our readers. From one or both of these words, (for it is very possible, that the former may have been originally formed from the latter) the Greek φάλαξ, crissa, eminens in mari petra, ornamentum in summitate galea, &c. is to be drawn. Fellus and others farther countenance this notion, by calling the wooden towers we are now upon loci extructi. By adding to either of the verbs above-mentioned any of the following radices, viz. פלה phala, interfecit, פלה phala, maius fuit, פלה phala, affixit, פלה phala, longus fuit, from whence פלה phala, arica, longa, may be formed the word falarica; in which case the name will aptly enough answer to the nature and office of the weapon here described. It is probable, that the Saguntines either learned the use of the falarica from their neighbours the Carthaginians, or the Phœnician colonies settled antiently in Spain. We shall only further observe upon this head, that the falarica is called פלה phala, a kind or species of lance, by Hefichius (1).

(B) Saguntum being first built and peopled by a colony of Zacynthians, it is no difficult matter to account for its name. It was probably called by the citizens ZAKTNOOS or ZAKTNOON, Zacynthus or Zacynthos; which, in old Latin, was Sacuntius, Sacuntum, or Saguntus, Saguntum, the ancient Latins using C in the same manner as those of the classic period of time did G, as we learn from Terenianus, the columna rostrata of Dionisius, Quintilianus, &c. In confirmation of this notion, it may be further observed, that some of the oldest editions of Aurelius Victor, for Saguntum, have Zagynthus; which reading receives some strength from Priscian. Silius Italicus likewise calls it Sagynthos, which word approaches very near what we would have the original name. According to Appian, after Hannibal had taken it, he brought thither a colony from Carthage, and called it Spaurigens. There seem to have been, in ancient times, two cities of this name in Spain, on the ruins of one of which at present stands Sigüenza, a city of New Castille, situate upon the river Henares. The inhabitants of Saguntum are greatly celebrated, for their constancy and fidelity to the Romans, by most of the Roman historians (2).

ministers at some distance from the camp, and, accosting them as friends, to assure a them, that it would on no account be safe to approach nearer the camp, since the general himself was absent, and the barbarous nations, which formed the Carthaginian army, had such an antipathy to the Romans, that they would undoubtedly massacre them, if an opportunity offered. Livy intimates, that Hannibal dispatched messengers to the sea-side to meet the deputies above-mentioned, and acquaint them in his name, that it was by no means proper for them to trust their persons with those fierce nations, of which his army was composed; and that the multiplicity of his affairs would not permit him then to hear their proposals. Polybius, on the other hand, asserts, that the Roman deputation found Hannibal in his winter quarters at New Carthage, a little before he had formed the siege of Saguntum; and that, being b admitted to an audience, they advised him not to attack the Saguntines, whom the Romans had taken under their protection; nor infringe the late treaty concluded with Asdrubal, by passing the Iberus. Hannibal, according to the same historian, being then successful in all his enterprizes, fired with ambition, and mortally hating the Romans, with some emotion, replied, that the Romans themselves had already given just grounds for a rupture, by oppressing several of the principal inhabitants of Saguntum, after the citizens had applied to them, upon the breaking out of a sedition in the city, to make up all differences between the contending parties by a just and impartial arbitration; and that as the Carthaginians, in imitation of their ancestors, always thought it incumbent upon them to succour the oppressed, he would c revenge so perfidious an action, unless the Romans gave immediate satisfaction to the persons injured. At the same time he dispatched an express to Carthage, informing the senate, that the Saguntines, grown insolent by their alliance with Rome, and spirited up by their allies, made irruptions into the Carthaginian territories, desiring instructions how to act in so critical a situation. Livy says, that the Roman deputies, being denied access to Hannibal, sailed directly to Carthage, to demand satisfaction there; but that Hannibal took care to send advice to the leaders of the Barchine faction of what had happened, and to prepare their minds for giving the Romans such a reception as he desired; in consequence of which, they were dismissed from Carthage, without any satisfactory answer. Whether any of these jarring relations be d true, or which of them is so, we shall not take upon us at present to determine. However, we cannot avoid observing, that Polybius has probability on his side; for it is much more likely, that a general, so famed for politeness and address as Hannibal was, should confer with the Roman deputation, in his turn expostulate with them, and impute the approaching rupture to their principals, as is, generally speaking, the practice of civilized states at this day, than to behave in so rude and savage a manner towards them, as the Roman historians, and their adherents, suggest. Certain it is, that these last authors deserve very little credit, when they deliver any thing, that affects the character either of Hannibal, or his enemy Hanno, since it is their constant endeavour to paint the former in the blackest colours, and to represent e the latter, with his partizans, as the only virtuous members of the state of Carthage. They were so greatly obliged to Hanno for his kind disposition towards them, or at least his aversion to their enemies, and received so much of the treatment they deserved from Hannibal, that it is no wonder they should labour so heartily to depreciate the one, and extol the other, though this was done at the expence of truth, as well as of their own reputation, since many of their insinuations relating to the characters of both these Carthaginians are absolutely inconsistent with the accounts of their actions, which they themselves have handed down to us. As we cannot therefore but look upon Polybius as the most impartial and unprejudiced, as well as the most rational and probable, historian, we shall supersede that tedious declamatory harangue of f Hanno to the senate of Carthage, in order to prejudice them against Hannibal, and the Barchine family, given us by Livy; notwithstanding which, in order to preserve consistency, and render our history uniform throughout, we must follow this last historian with respect to order of time, and suppose the Roman deputies to have found Hannibal employed in the siege at present under consideration. The majority of the senate and people being closely attached to Hannibal, neither the Roman faction in Carthage, nor the deputies sent from Rome to put them in motion, could prevent the destruction of Saguntum ^g.

- ^a BUT to return to the military operations: After the late repulse, Hannibal, finding his troops greatly fatigued, remained for some days in a state of inaction, but disposed guards in proper places to defend his works and machines from all attempts of the enemy. In the mean time, in a speech he made to his soldiers, he endeavoured to raise their courage, by inspiring them with a detestation of the enemy, by promising them great rewards, if they did their duty, and lastly, by assuring them of the plunder of the place, in case it was taken by storm. The garrison likewise kept quiet within the town, and took the opportunity of this cessation of arms to build a counter-wall opposite to the breach the Carthaginians had made. Hannibal's troops, greatly animated by the hopes of sharing the plunder of the town, made a vigorous attack, being encouraged
- ^b by their general, who had placed himself on the top of a moveable tower, overlooking all the works of the besieged, and the whole city. In fine, Hannibal, having cleared the breach of the soldiers posted there for its defence, and demolished the new wall, by the assistance of five hundred Africans appointed to undermine it, entered the town without opposition; and possessing himself of an eminence near the citadel, drew a line of circumvallation round it, and planted his artillery against it. The Saguntines however did all that could be expected from men animated by despair; they erected a new wall to support that part of the city, which the enemy had not yet made themselves masters of; they disputed every inch of ground with the utmost bravery; and repulsed the besiegers in many attacks. However, being not a little
- ^c streightened for want of provisions, they found themselves reduced to great extremities, especially as they had no prospect of foreign aid, the Romans seeming to have intirely deserted them. But they were, for the present, relieved by an expedition Hannibal undertook against the Carpetani and Oretani, who shewed a disposition to shake off the Carthaginian yoke. The besieged however did not reap any great advantages from this expedition, since Maberbal, the son of Himilco, whom Hannibal left to command the forces before Saguntum in his absence, pushed on the siege with as much vigour as Hannibal himself could have done. Battering the new wall incessantly with his rams, he made such a breach in it, that Hannibal, returning sooner than was expected, having quashed the conspiracy of the aforesaid nations in embryo,
- ^d immediately stormed the citadel. After a warm dispute, Hannibal, making a lodgment, possessed himself of part of it, the Saguntines, with no small difficulty, maintaining themselves in the other^h.

Hannibal carries on briskly the siege of Saguntum.

WHILST affairs were in this melancholy situation, one Alcon a Saguntine went privately by night, unknown to his countrymen, to the Carthaginian camp, where, by his tears and supplications, he endeavoured to move Hannibal's compassion towards the unhappy citizens of Saguntum. He could however make no impression upon that general. The conditions he insisted upon were; that they should give ample satisfaction to the Turdetani; that they should deliver up all their treasure to the Carthaginians; and that they should retire, with only their cloaths upon their

^e backs, to the place the Carthaginians should assign them for their habitation. These conditions appeared so intolerable to Alcon, that he durst not propose them to the garrison of Saguntum; and therefore remained in Hannibal's camp. But one Alorcus, a Spaniard, then in the Carthaginian service, though expressing a great regard and esteem for the miserable inhabitants of that unfortunate city, undertook to convey the Carthaginian general's proposals to them. This he did, endeavouring at the same time to prevail upon that unhappy people to embrace them; but they were so harsh, that the Saguntines could not so much as think of accepting them. Before they gave their final answer, the principal senators, bringing their gold and silver, and that of the public treasury, into the market-place, threw both into a fire lighted for that purpose, and afterwards themselves. At the same time a tower, which had been battered

^f by Hannibal's rams, falling with a dreadful noise, the Carthaginians entered the town by the breach, soon made themselves masters of it and the citadel, and cut to pieces all the inhabitants, who were of age to bear arms. Livy relates, that vast numbers of the Saguntines, without distinction of sex or age, were massacred; and that many, taken prisoners, became the property of the soldiery. According to Frontinus, Hannibal, by a stratagem, drew the garrison out of the town, and put them all to the sword. Zonaras tells us, that Hannibal took the city in the following manner: He applied a machine to the wall, which overtopped it, and was filled with armed men, some of whom were in sight, and others concealed. Whilst the Saguntines warmly engaged a those in fight, the others concealed undermined the wall; which falling, gave the Carthaginians an opportunity of advancing into the town, and threw the Saguntines into such a consternation, that they immediately retired into the citadel. Upon their application to Hannibal, finding him averse to moderation, and themselves destitute of any prospect of assistance from the Romans, they desired some days to deliberate upon the measures they were to take; which being granted, in that interval they committed every thing valuable to the flames; persuaded the poor helpless people to lay violent hands on themselves; and then, making a sally on the besiegers, were all put to the sword ⁱ.

He finds great spoils there.

NOTWITHSTANDING the fire above-mentioned, the Carthaginians got a very b rich booty. Hannibal did not reserve to himself any part of this; but applied it solely to the carrying on of his enterprizes. Polybius remarks, that the taking of Saguntum was of signal service to him in the execution of the scheme he had formed, as it stimulated his soldiers to further conquests by the sight of so much booty, and a prospect of more; as likewise by engaging the principal persons of Carthage to second his views; which the large presents he was enabled to make them from such rich spoils could not fail of doing. He also from hence laid the foundations of a future fund to supply all his exigencies in the accomplishment of the vast project he had so long been intent upon.

The Romans send fresh ambassadors to Carthage.

THE news of the taking of Saguntum had scarce reached Carthage, when embassa- c dors arrived there from Rome, demanding of the senate and people, whether the Spanish expedition had been undertaken by their order, or Hannibal, contrary to their approbation, had been the sole author of it. One of the Carthaginian senators, the best qualified for this purpose, by order of the senate, endeavoured to vindicate Hannibal's conduct, or rather that of the republic, on this occasion. He made very slight mention of the last treaty Asdrubal had concluded with the Romans, only endeavouring to draw a parallel betwixt it and the peace granted the Carthaginians by the consul Lutatius after the battle off of the islands Ægates. He insisted, that as the senate and people of Rome had taken the liberty to insert some additional articles in that treaty, so the Carthaginian senate and people had an equal right to make what d alterations they thought proper in that Asdrubal had concluded with the Romans. He further acquainted them, that the Carthaginians were not strangers to the ambitious designs of their republic; and that they might enter upon the execution of them as soon as they pleased, without giving any concern or uneasiness to his state. In short, he gave them to understand, that the senate and people, notwithstanding the efforts of Hanno and his faction, were of the same sentiments with Hannibal, in relation to the affair of Saguntum, and intirely approved of what he had done. Upon which Q. Fabius, the senior of the embassy, declared war against the Carthaginians, in the manner already related by us in a former part of this history ^k.

An inquiry into the justice of this war.

IN order to give our readers an adequate idea of the justice with which this war e was entered upon, we must beg leave to observe, that the Carthaginians had, in reality, a right to call the Romans to an account for their former instances of oppression; but made use of a pretended motive, not so consistent with the dictates of equity, to vindicate, or at least to palliate, their conduct on the present occasion. The iniquitous conquest of Sardinia, and perfidious exaction of the immense sum above-mentioned from the Carthaginians, undoubtedly authorized that nation to make reprisals upon the Romans, whenever they found themselves in a capacity of so doing; and the Romans, by intermeddling with the affairs of Spain, without any other cause, than to give a check to the Carthaginian conquests there, did, with reason, highly irritate the state of Carthage. But then, on the other hand, it must be allowed, that f no just parallel could be drawn betwixt the treaty of peace concluded by the Romans with Asdrubal, and that granted the Carthaginians by Lutatius. In the former, no mention was made of the senate and people of Carthage; but Asdrubal acted, as tho' he had been invested with full powers to sign whatever articles he should judge proper for the good of the republic; which afterwards gave a sort of sanction to what he had done, by an acquiescence in it: whereas to the latter, Lutatius expressly added a clause, importing, that the treaty should be valid, provided the senate and people of

- a Rome thought proper to ratify it. Here therefore, with Polybius, we cannot but acknowledge, that the Carthaginian pretext was mere chicanery, void of the least shadow of reason or justice to support it. But, with regard to one of the articles of the treaty of Lutatius, which the Romans urged as a condemnation of the destruction of Saguntum, we own ourselves not so intirely of that author's sentiments. The article was to this effect; That neither party should injure or molest the allies of the other; which he extends to all those with whom an alliance might be contracted in any future times, though, in our opinion, no necessity appears for admitting such a supposition, at least except such an alliance had been contracted by the mutual consent of both parties; for otherwise, each nation might have entered into a confederacy with the declared enemies of the other, and then, by virtue of this article, have forced their old friends to make peace with their new confederates; which would undoubtedly have been contrary to the true intent and meaning of it, as well as the general tenor of the treaty; since it would have given the more formidable power an opportunity of extorting a compliance with the most ruinous conditions from the other. It is probable, notwithstanding the silence of the Roman historians on this head, that the article we are now upon furnished the Romans with a pretext to countenance the Sardinian rebels above-mentioned, and espouse their interest, in order to make themselves masters of Sardinia; since it appears from Livy, that they understood it in the sense of Polybius, which seems to authorize such an action. It is certain the perfidious conduct they were guilty of towards the Carthaginians at that time, gives ground to suspect them capable of wresting the treaty of Lutatius in such a manner, to serve so villainous a purpose; and therefore justifies our not intirely agreeing with Polybius in the above-mentioned particular. Be that as it will, as the treaty of Lutatius was infringed by the reduction of Sardinia, the Romans had no reason to condemn any subsequent conduct of the Carthaginians for its not squaring with the articles of that treaty. Besides, as the Sicilian peace bore no relation to the Carthaginian conquests in Spain, which were made long afterwards, they had no right to prescribe limits to those conquests, which they did, by obliging Asdrubal not to pass the Iberus. Add to this, that it does not appear from history, that the Carthaginians ever ratified, with an oath, the articles Asdrubal signed by his own authority, but only concealed their disapprobation of that action, till a proper opportunity of discovering it offered; and therefore the Carthaginians could not, with so much justice, be charged with perjury, by concurring with Hannibal in the destruction of Saguntum, as the Romans with a second violation of the treaty of Lutatius, by extorting a compliance with such hard terms from Asdrubal, when the necessity of his affairs would not permit him to refuse it. In confirmation of what has been advanced, it may be farther observed, that the Romans had not obliged themselves, by any implicit covenant prior to the pretended treaty with Asdrubal, to fix the Iberus as a boundary to any future acquisitions or discoveries they might make in Spain; besides which, nothing could have the least tendency to palliate their treatment of the Carthaginians on that occasion. However, it must be owned, that the Carthaginians would have acted more generously, by assigning the unjust cession they found themselves forced to make of Sardinia, and the immense sum of money at the same time iniquitously exacted from them, as the chief motives that prompted them to desire a rupture with the Romans. But they were doubtless hindered from this by some political views, which, they thought, it might be for their interest to keep concealed; than which scarce any practice has been more common in all ages; and we have had recent instances of princes publishing a manifesto, immediately before a declaration of war, filled with frivolous pretences, rather than the real causes of their hostile intentions¹.

- f Appian seems to intimate, that Hannibal, in order to provide for his own safety, Hannibal undertakes this war to prevent civil dissensions at home, according to Appian. was obliged to attack the Saguntines, and come to blows with the Romans. Notwithstanding he was elected general by the army after the death of Asdrubal, and had his election confirmed by the senate and people of Carthage, yet, according to this author, Hanno's faction, taking advantage of his youth, endeavoured to inspire the giddy populace with sentiments to his prejudice. His friends, perceiving the wicked suggestions of that faction beginning in a short time to take some effect, apprised him of it, desiring him by no means to forget them, but to exert himself in order to promote their interest, and consequently his own. This, adds the same author, Hannibal had foreseen; and being sensible, that whatever attacks seemed levelled at his friends, were principally intended against him, notwithstanding the great services his family had done the state of Carthage, he thought, that the only expedient to prevent civil dissensions; and hinder Hanno's insinuations from making any impression upon the minds of the populace to his disadvantage, would be to enter upon a war with Rome. An enterprize of such importance as this, he very well knew, would engage all the public attention, and of course greatly contribute towards stifling the cabals and schemes, that might have been formed against him, especially as the generality, both of the senate and people, were eagerly bent upon such a war. Besides, the fears and anxieties arising in their minds for the success of an Italian expedition, would naturally render them cautious of changing hands at home. Appian, we say, mentions this as one of the motives that induced Hannibal to lay siege to Saguntum; which may possibly be true. But we must own, that neither Polybius nor Livy takes any notice of it. That another motive, as the first author relates, was a desire to immortalize his name, will be granted by all, who consider the genius of that general, as described to us by the best writers. But whatever might prompt him to the siege above-mentioned, he met with a courage and resolution in the Saguntines worthy of himself. After a most gallant defence, they fell in the manner already related, the very women from the ramparts, with astonishing intrepidity, beholding the slaughter of their husbands and relations, and massacring all the children, that had escaped the flames, to prevent their falling into the enemy's hands. Some writers insinuate, that, before the last sally, the Saguntines melted lead with their gold and silver, imagining, that such a mixed mass could not be of any great service to the Carthaginians; and that Hannibal would have found it more difficult still to have carried the place, had not the citizens been reduced to the last extremity by famine. The Carthaginian general did not think proper to raze the city, but transplanted thither a colony from Carthage. Thus the Saguntines, after a siege of eight months, fell a sacrifice to Hannibal's resentment, being marked out for destruction, on account of their singular fidelity and attachment to the Romans.

The Romans attempt to draw the Spaniards off from the Carthaginian interest, but in vain.

THE Carthaginians, or at least the Barchine faction, received the Roman declaration of war from Fabius with great joy and acclamations, assuring him they would carry it on with the utmost vigour and alacrity, and make all possible efforts to revenge the repeated extortions, the sinister designs, the unjust invasions, and the haughty behaviour of his republic. In consequence of this step, Fabius, and his companions, returned home, taking Spain in their way, as they had been ordered by the senate. Upon their arrival there, they endeavoured to draw the Spaniards subject to Carthage from their allegiance, to detach the allies of that state there from its interest, and to enter into an alliance with as many of the Spanish nations, as were disposed to accept either the friendship or protection of the Roman republic, pursuant to the instructions they had received before their departure from Rome. The Bargusii, being desirous of shaking off the Carthaginian yoke, gave the Roman ambassadors a kind reception; which not a little influenced many other neighbouring cantons. But this success was not lasting; for the Volsciani, upon Fabius's application to them, made him this smart reply: With what face can you, Romans, offer to solicit us to prefer your friendship to that of the Carthaginians, since your treachery to the brave Saguntines, who did so, exceeded even the cruelty of that barbarous enemy, who destroyed them? Seek for allies, where the fate of Saguntum is not known. The destruction of that city will serve for a lively lesson to the people of Spain, to take care how they ever repose any confidence in the Romans. After which, the ambassadors, being commanded to leave the territories of the Volsciani, found themselves obliged to retire out of Spain, without accomplishing their design. Neither did they meet with any better success in Gaul; for when they desired the Gauls to refuse the Carthaginians a passage through their country into Italy, they could by no means prevail upon them to grant their request. Hannibal had before prepossessed them in favour of the Carthaginians; which he found it no difficult matter to do, they having, on various accounts, conceived an aversion to the Romans.

Hannibal puts both Spain and Africa into a posture of defence.

AFTER the reduction of Saguntum, Hannibal put his African troops into winter-quarters at New Carthage; but permitted the Spaniards, in order to gain their affection, to retire to their respective habitations. During the winter, he remained in a state of inaction, but made several very wise regulations for the security of the

- a Carthaginian dominions both in Spain and Africa. He transported into Africa, for the defence of that country, a body of Spaniards, consisting of Iberians, Mastiani, and Olcades, amounting to twelve hundred horse, and thirteen thousand eight hundred and fifty foot, to which were added some companies raised in the Balearic islands. These it was thought proper to place, for the most part, in the provinces of Metagonium, and city of Carthage. He posted four thousand Metagonites likewise in Carthage, not only to defend that metropolis, in case of need, but likewise to serve as hostages for the good behaviour of their countrymen. Hannibal appointed his brother Asdrubal to command in Spain, leaving him, besides a sufficient naval force, a powerful army, to preserve the Carthaginian acquisitions there. The African corps, b destined to act in Spain under the command of Asdrubal, was composed of four hundred and fifty African and Libyphœnician cavalry, eleven thousand eight hundred and fifty Massylian, Massylian, Macian, and Mauritanian foot, besides three hundred (C) Lorgites, eighteen hundred Numidians, three hundred Ligurians, five hundred Balearic slingers, and above twenty elephants. These particulars, Polybius tells us, he extracted from some tables or records of copper, engraved by Hannibal himself when in Italy, and left by him at Lacinium (D). After such a prudent disposition, which had a natural tendency to render both Spain and Africa intirely dependent on Carthage, as well as more closely to cement the people of those countries by mutual bonds of friendship, he made the necessary preparations to pass the Iberus. But before he c attempted this, he judged it expedient to win the Cisalpine Gauls over to his interest, that he might not only have a free passage through their country, but likewise receive a reinforcement from them when there. This he effected, partly by distributing some gold amongst their chiefs, and partly by heightening their aversion to the Romans. Having received intelligence, that the Gauls were ready to join him, and before discharged his vows made to Hercules at Gades, as well as engaged himself by new ones, provided success attended his arms in the ensuing expedition, he immediately put himself in motion. As his emissaries, arrived from Gaul, informed him, that

(C) It is evident from Livy, that Polybius's text here stands in need of an emendation. We find in no author the word Lorgita, [ΛΟΡΓΙΤΑΙ] as the name of a people; but the Ilargetes, whom Livy takes notice of here, and whom Polybius had mentioned just before, were a people of Spain, frequently described by antient writers. In the room therefore of ΛΟΡΓΙΤΑΙ, we ought to substitute ΙΛΑΡΓΙΤΟΙ, nothing being more easy, than for some letters, and parts of letters, to be defaced by time, or a variety of contingencies. As Livy closely followed Polybius, we doubt not but ΙΛΑΡΓΙΤΟΙ is the true reading (3).

(D) The Lacinian, here mentioned by Polybius, must, we apprehend, have been the name of a town near the Lacinian promontory in Calabria, taken notice of by several authors. From this curious passage of Polybius, as well as from Livy, it seems to appear, that Hannibal left behind him an account of the principal, if not all the transactions he was concerned in there. But here a question may arise, In what language was this account left written or engraved? To which we must beg leave to answer, that our readers may determine for themselves, when they have considered the principal arguments that may be offered in favour both of the Greek and Carthaginian languages, which we shall here lay down for their perusal. In behalf of the Greek it may be urged, first, that Hannibal intended his tables should be understood by the natives of the country wherein they were left. Now the Greek was the tongue of Magna Græcia, and consequently of the Bruttii, in whose territory Lacinium was situated. Secondly, Hannibal understood Greek, having been taught it by Sesilius the Lacedæmonian, and composed some pieces himself in that language. Thirdly, Sesilius attended Hannibal in his expeditions, and wrote a history of them in Greek, from whence, it is probable, the inscriptions on these tables of copper, mentioned by Polybius, were taken. Fourthly, as Polybius understood these inscriptions, and made extracts from them, it is natural to suppose, that they must have been in Greek. On the other hand, it may be said, first, that the Greek language had been expelled Carthage before Hannibal's time; and that the Carthaginians ever retained such an aversion to the Greeks, that it cannot be supposed the language of that nation should afterwards have been introduced amongst them. Secondly, that though Hannibal, for his own private amusement, studied the Greek tongue, he was too wise so far to thwart the genius of his countrymen, as to leave a journal or history of his Italian wars in it, especially as he had a faction against him at Carthage. Thirdly, that the Carthaginian and Etruscan languages must have been related, the Etruscans being descended from the Pelasgi and Phœnicians; and it is well known, that the Etruscan was the antient language of Magna Græcia, that country having been antiently a part of Etruria. Fourthly, the Carthaginians had, for many generations, an intercourse with the people of Magna Græcia; and several coins of that country, particularly of the Thurians, have characters upon them resembling the Etruscan, and even the Carthaginian. From hence it is probable, the inhabitants of Magna Græcia understood something of the Carthaginian tongue; which renders it likely, that the language of Hannibal's tables must have been the Carthaginian. But this we leave our readers to decide (4).

tho' the passage of the Alps was difficult, it was far from being impracticable, he began to look upon the Carthaginians as already masters of Italy°.

HAVING therefore completed his military preparations, and got every thing in readiness for the intended expedition, early in the spring he moved out of his winter-quarters, advancing at the head of all his forces to Etouissa, and from thence to the Iberus. Here, we are told, Hannibal had a remarkable dream, which gave him great hopes of success in the enterprize he was going to enter upon. That general, according to the authors referred to, imagined himself, in his sleep, summoned to a council of the gods, who commanded him to begin his march for Italy without delay. At the same time there appeared to him a youth incircled with glory, who said, that Jupiter had appointed him his guide, with orders to conduct him and his troops to Italy, strictly injoining him never to draw his eyes from off him; which injunction he, for some time, obeyed: but at last, having the curiosity to look behind him, he saw a serpent of a monstrous size moving with great celerity, overthrowing all the trees, shrubs, &c. in its way, and attended by a dreadful tempest, with violent claps of thunder. He then asked his guide, What such a prodigy could portend? who told him, it prefaged the dreadful devastations, that should be committed in Italy by his troops, desiring him to pursue his journey, and not to be too inquisitive, nor pry too deeply into what the fates had decreed. Upon his passing the Iberus, several beasts, of a species utterly unknown, likewise appeared to him, seeming to shew the way to his troops. The Romans, about the same time, were as greatly dispirited by bad omens, as Hannibal found himself animated by good ones. An ox spoke audibly with a human voice at Rome, just before the commencement of this war; another threw itself from the top of a house into the Tiber, and was drowned, during the public diversions; many places were struck with lightning; blood flowed from many statues, and from the shield of one of the legionaries; and lastly, a wolf carried off a sword out of the camp. Whether these occurrences are to be esteemed as so many fictions, intirely owing to that credulity and superstition, to which both the Romans and Carthaginians were so much addicted, or as real events, intended by Providence as prefages of those dreadful convulsions, which afterwards happened in the Roman and Carthaginian states, we shall not take upon us to determine; but only observe, that many arguments may be offered in support of each opinion. However, as the histories of almost all nations are interspersed with such relations, as Scripture itself gives countenance to some of them, and as the authors cited here are of no mean authority, we doubt not but our curious readers will at least excuse what has been inserted in this place P.

He passes the Iberus.

BEFORE Hannibal began the operations of the campaign, he thought it incumbent on him to inspire life and vigour into the soldiery, nothing but that being now wanting, since the senate and people of Carthage, at the instigation of Asdrubal, had given him an unlimited commission, which left him in full power to act as he should think fit for the good of the republic. In an harangue therefore he acquainted the army, that such was the insolence of the Romans, that they insisted upon having him, and all the general officers, delivered up to them; that Italy was one of the most fertile and delicious countries in the world; that he had just concluded a treaty with the Cisalpine Gauls, through whose countries they must pass, who would not only supply them with all necessaries, but join them with a good body of troops, bearing a mortal hatred to the Romans; so that they ought to look upon themselves as morally certain of success. The soldiers, animated by this speech, loudly proclaimed their confidence in his conduct, at the same time declaring themselves ready to follow him whithersoever he should think proper to lead them, and to spend the last drop of their blood in executing the project he had formed. Finding it therefore time to enter upon action, he took a review of his army, consisting of ninety thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, of various nations, besides a good number of elephants; and then, without the least obstruction, passed the Iberus q.

And subdues all the nations betwixt that river and the Pyrenees.

THE Ilergetes and Bargusii were the first cantons he obliged to submit to the Carthaginians, and soon after the Arenosii and Ausetani, people whose territories extended as far as the Pyrenees. Nevertheless, as he reduced several towns by force, these conquests cost him abundance of men. Before he proceeded farther on his march, he constituted Hanno governor of the country betwixt the Pyrenees and the Iberus,

- a which included the territory of the Bargusii, injoining him to have a watchful eye over that people, whose former conduct gave him reason to suspect, that still they were secretly well-wishers to the Romans. To support Hanno in his new post, he left him a body of ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse; and in order to ingratiate himself with the Spaniards, that he might be the more readily supplied with what recruits he should want in Italy, he dismissed about the like number of them to their respective habitations, and gave the greatest encouragement to those that continued in the Carthaginian service. Upon a muster of his forces, after they were weakened by sieges, desertion, mortality, and the aforesaid dismissal and detachment, he found them to amount to fifty thousand foot, and nine thousand horse, all veteran troops, and the best in the world. As they had left all their heavy baggage with Hanno, and were light-armed, Hannibal easily crossed the Pyrenees, passed by Ruscino, the Roussillon of the moderns, a frontier town of the Gauls, and arrived on the banks of the Rhone without opposition^r.

- For some time however he was retarded in his march by the jealousy of the Gauls; for that nation, hearing that the Carthaginian army, then encamped at Illiberis, a city of Gallia Narbonensis, had reduced the country immediately beyond the Pyrenees, and left strong garrisons there to keep the natives in awe, entertained vehement suspicions, that Hannibal had a design upon them, notwithstanding his pretext of invading Italy. But upon his decamping speedily from Illiberis, giving them the strongest assurances of his amicable intentions towards them, and making a few presents to their reguli, they permitted him to continue his route without the least molestation. Upon his approaching the banks of the Rhone, the greatest part of the Volcae (E), a nation inhabiting the tract contiguous to that river, withdrew, with all their effects, to the opposite bank, the other neighbouring Gauls being his friends, and giving him all the assistance they were able. The Gauls on the other side, taking umbrage at the approach of so formidable a power, had assembled all their forces, with an intent to dispute the passage of the river; which Hannibal perceiving, and finding it no-where fordable in sight of the enemy, he began to be in pain for the success of the expedition; but his good fortune still attending him, he at last carried his point by a stratagem, and dispersed the Gallic forces in the manner by us already related. But, after all, the greatest difficulty was how to waft over the elephants. Some affirm this to have been done in the following manner: a float of timber two hundred foot long, and fifty broad, was thrown from the bank of the river, being fixed thereto, by large ropes, and quite covered over with earth; so that the elephants, deceived with this appearance, thought themselves upon firm ground. From the first float they proceeded to a second, which was built in the same form, but only an hundred foot long, and fastened to the former by chains, that were easily loosened. The female elephants were put upon the first float, and the males followed. As soon as they got upon the second float, it was loosened from the first, and, by the help of small boats, towed to the opposite shore. After this, it was sent back to fetch those which were left behind. Some threw their guides, and fell into the water, but they at last got safe to shore; so that out of forty-eight, not a single elephant was drowned. Others say, that Hannibal ordered them all to be drawn together on the bank of the river, when one of the guides, by his direction, having irritated the fiercest of them, leaped into the river, and swam to the opposite side, being hotly pursued by the enraged beast, that immediately rushed into the (F) water after him with the utmost fury;

(E) The Volcae, or Volcae Aricomici, according to Strabo, were a nation, that inhabited the country contiguous to one side of the Rhodanus or the Rhone; but had nothing to do on the other, as Livy here asserts. Nemanus, the Nîmes of the moderns, was their capital. Mela, Pliny and Ptolemy, take particular notice of them (f).

(F) But this, with Livy, we cannot help thinking improbable; especially since it is remarked by Polybius, that elephants were exceedingly afraid of the water; inasmuch that though they were taught an exact obedience to their guides, yet these could never prevail upon them to go into the water without the utmost difficulty. That excellent author adds, that, on the present occasion, these beasts were at first so terrified, that they ran from one side of the float to the other; but seeing themselves surrounded with water, the fear of that element kept them in order. However, some of them, he tells us, were so extremely scared, that, being in the middle of the stream, they leaped into it, tho' breathing freely, and discharging their stomachs of the water taken in, by the assistance of their trunks, which they held above water, they were thereby preserved.

Though, according to Polybius here, the elephant fury; upon which all the rest followed. Hannibal spent five days in passing the a river, though vast numbers of the Gauls, by their assistance, facilitated the execution of the plan he had formed. The elephants were not wasted over, till the day after the is afraid of passing deep and rapid waters, yet, if Ælian may be credited, that animal takes delight in the marshes, being, for the most part, in moist places. The Indians therefore, employed in taking their whelps, (for vast numbers of these they train up for use) generally go to such places, where they seldom fail of finding them. In summer-time the elephant covers himself with mud, to avoid the heat, receiving more refreshment from hence, than from being in the shade (5).

In confirmation of what Polybius asserts, it may be observed, that, according to naturalists, the elephant is a vast animal, of a make intirely unfit for swimming. He drinks much, Aristotle assuring us, that there have been some elephants, that have been seen to drink fourteen amphora's of the Macedonian measure, that is, if we will believe Budens, about one eighth part of a Paris hoghead. It is remarkable, that this animal always disturbs the water before he drinks, as if this was a way to make it more nourishing, or to add a certain taste to it, and take away the sweetness of it, which is not sufficiently pungent to his tongue. Ælian intimates, that the sight of the sea terrifies the elephant; and that, in order to get him on ship-board, recourse is sometimes had to such an artifice as that here mentioned; which notion he undoubtedly received from the very passage of Polybius we are now upon (6).

The wild elephant chiefly feeds upon rushes, ivy, the tender tops of palms, the young shoots of other trees, plants, &c. We are told, that when wild elephants find themselves necessitated to pass a river, that is not extremely deep, the younger swim over first, after which the others ford it, the females carrying their young on their trunks. These animals herd together in great numbers in India, and are hunted by the Indians, partly on account of the ivory they produce, and partly for other reasons. We find a full and particular description of the Indian manner of hunting them in Agatharchides Cnidius, and Ælian (7).

Of all quadrupeds the elephant is the largest; the male is much higher and stronger than the female, being sometimes in India nine cubits high, and capable of carrying a tower on his back, with thirty-two warriors in it. With one stroke of his trunk he kills a camel or a horse, and has been known to draw two cast cannons fastened together with cables, and weighing each three thousand pounds, five hundred paces, with his teeth! The Indian elephants are either black, or of a mouse-colour; but some white ones are found in Ethiopia. According to Ptolemy, all the Ethiopian elephants were formerly of that colour. Some few were likewise produced in India, and looked upon as great curiosities by the princes of that country. It is remarkable, that this animal has a particular aversion to a sow. The grunting of that creature, as well as the squeaking of a young pig, strikes him with terror. A ram likewise he has an antipathy to. But his two worst enemies are the dragon and the rhinoceros; the latter frequently wounding him in combat, and the former as often destroying him by sucking all the blood out of his veins. Ælian tells us, that these dragons strangle the elephant first. However, the blood, that they imbibe, kills them. Some authors affirm, that the female elephant goes two years with her young; and that the elephant is reckoned in his prime at sixty years of age. Some elephants have been known to live above two hundred, three hundred and fifty, and even four hundred years; for which reason that animal was a symbol of eternity amongst the antients, and, as such, may be seen on the reverses of several antique coins (8).

Though the elephant is naturally a quiet and inoffensive animal, yet he is terrible when provoked: nothing can stand before him; he oversets trees, houses and walls; he tramples under foot every thing that comes in his way; he overthrows whole squadrons. His arms are his trunk, and his teeth his horns, for so some of the antients call them. His trunk is a long, hollow cartilage, like a large trumpet, hanging between his teeth, and frequently serves him for hands. His teeth are the ivory so well known to us, being of the nature of horn, and may be softened. There have been elephants teeth seen as large as a man's thigh, and a fathom in length. When they quarrel amongst themselves, they strike one another with their teeth, as bulls do with their horns. However, the elephant never uses his strength, but when compelled to it. He creates no terror in other creatures. If he is obliged to pass through a herd of other beasts, he puts them gently out of his way with his trunk, to make way for him. He feeds in the fields and meadows; and the weakest and tamest animals, with impunity, play before him. If Ælian may be credited, the elephant is quite ravished and transported at the sight of a beautiful woman. He takes great delight likewise, according to the same author, in beautiful flowers, particularly those that emit fragrant odours, which are exceeding grateful to him (9).

Of all animals the elephant comes nearest to man in sagacity, docility, address, clemency, prudence, equity, and, according to some authors, even religion. His modesty, fidelity, chastity, &c. are likewise greatly celebrated by the antients. He understands the language of his guide, and of the country where he is produced. Pliny mentions one that understood Greek, and could write that language. Ælian tells us he saw another that wrote Latin, and, whilst writing, behaved with great attention. In Hadrian's time, Arrian saw an elephant playing on a cymbal, and others dancing about him. That they worship the sun, moon and stars, and even are not void of some sense of moral duties, is attested by several good authors. In short, so many things of this kind are related of them, as would seem fabulous, were they not delivered by grave writers. The antients gave them both names and surnames. The names were generally such as great warriors had gone by, viz. Patroclus, Ajax, &c. They frequently bore a singular affection to their guides, of which we are a the defeat of the Gauls, who attempted to dispute his passage. The particulars here laid down, added to those already related in a former part of our history, make up a full and ample description of this remarkable achievement.

WHILST the elephants were crossing over, Hannibal detached five hundred Nubian horse to get intelligence of the enemy, who, he was informed, approached the banks of the Rhone with a powerful army, in order to give him battle. These, falling in with a party of three hundred Roman and Gallie horse, sent out by Scipio upon the same design, a rencounter immediately ensued, which, after a brisk dispute, ended in favour of the Romans, though the loss was pretty equal on both sides. As Hannibal had drawn up his troops in order of battle, and the Roman detachment b pursued his cavalry to the camp, Scipio was soon acquainted with the disposition of the Carthaginian army; which encouraged him to move with all possible expedition towards Hannibal, in order to attack him. That general was, for some time, in suspense, whether he should engage the Romans, or continue his march for Italy;

The natural parts of the elephant are under his belly, like those of a horse; but his testicles lie concealed in his loins. The female elephant receives the male lying upon her back, contrary to the nature of other beasts; and he never courts her as long as any one appears in sight. When he is heated with lust, he beats down trees, walls, and every thing that approaches him, butting with his forehead like a ram. We are told he copulates but once in his whole life, and that about the twentieth year of his age. Others say, that the male is capable of propagating his species at ten years old, and the female at five; and that the male covers the female once every three years. The females bring forth only one at a time, which immediately sucks the dam with its mouth, and not the trunk. The elephant sleeps in an erect posture; and, when he is tired, leans against a tree, which being cut in two, he falls to the ground, and cannot rise, and by this means is sometimes taken by the Indians and Ethiopians. Wild elephants are likewise caught sometimes by the help of a female elephant, which is ready for the male, and put into some narrow place between barricades, where the elephant engages himself, and is taken. They are also taken in deep ditches, dug particularly for that purpose, and covered with a little earth scattered over hurdles, which close the open part of them. A nation inhabiting that part of Ethiopia to the west of the Nile, and not far from the line, used formerly to eat great numbers of those they took; for which reason they were called Elephantophagi by Agatharchides, Cnidius, and others. To what has been before-mentioned, with regard to the elephants food, we may add, that some of them could eat at once nine Macedonian medimni of barley, besides a great quantity of leaves and young branches of trees. They feed likewise upon legumes, hay, herbs, &c. as the tamest animals. They drink a vast quantity of liquor at once, as has been observed; but, to make amends for this, they can go eight days, without taking any liquid whatsoever. Though the wild elephants drank only water, those that were trained up for war had either wine mixed with their water, or a liquor composed of water, rice, sugar, &c.

which infused new life and vigour into them, and made them exert themselves in such a manner, that nothing could stand before them. We read in the Maccabees, that the elephants of Antiochus Eupator's army had the blood of grapes and mulberries shewn them, that thereby they might be animated to the combat, to accustom them, as it were, to the sight of blood; as likewise that it was usual to intoxicate them, by giving them wine mixed with incense, or with parcels of incense; which parcels were dipped in the wine, in order to make the fumes of it the stronger, and consequently more proper to intoxicate the elephants. Ælian says, that the only parts of the elephant used for food by the Elephantophagi, were his proboscis, his lips, and the marrow of his horns. The same author affirms the fat of the elephant to be a preservative against all venomous animals, which will not approach any thing anointed with it. We read in Philostrophus of bulls and oxen, resembling the elephant in size, skin and colour, common in Ethiopia (11).

History affords us surprising instances of the dexterity of the elephant: in the public theatres at Rome, elephants danced upon ropes. They sat down in a formal manner to a feast, helping themselves, in a decent manner, to what they wanted, with their trunks. Forty of them carried lamps or torches before Julius Cæsar to the capitol, and from thence home, a representation of which we have upon an ancient coin taken notice of by Spanheim. Some authors tell us, that, notwithstanding the antipathy betwixt swine and the elephant, pork cures that animal of ulcers, and other disorders; and that the tiger, a potent enemy, is frequently too hard for him. Thus we have enumerated the principal qualities and properties of the elephant; which is sufficient to give our readers a general idea of that creature, and consequently answers our purpose; tho' we might fill a volume by repeating what has been laid down by various authors on this subject. We shall conclude the whole by observing, that an elephant is called syll in the Islandic tongue, and phill in the Turkish; and that Roland seems to derive the word baron or barro above-mentioned from the Persic baron, which signifies a castle, tower, bulwark, &c. (12).

but was soon determined to the latter; by the arrival of Magilus, a prince of the Boii, who brought rich presents with him, and offered to conduct the Carthaginians over the Alps. In consequence of the resolution he had taken, the next day he decamped, commanding his horse to move towards the sea-coast, in order to prevent any sudden irruption from thence; the foot followed at some distance, whilst he himself waited for the coming up of the elephants, and the guides that conducted them. That his troops might bear the fatigues of so long and painful a march with the greater alacrity, Hannibal, the day before he began it, in the presence of them all, gave an audience to Magilus, who assured him by an interpreter, that his subjects ardently desired to see him; that both they, and the neighbouring Gauls, were ready to join him upon his first arrival amongst them; that he himself would take care to conduct his army through places where they should meet with a plentiful supply of provisions; and that he would soon bring them safe to Italy, which was one of the finest countries in the world. And then, after the prince was withdrawn, Hannibal, in a speech to them, magnified extremely this deputation from the Boii; extolled, with just praises, the bravery which his forces had hitherto shewn; and exhorted them to sustain, to the last, their reputation and glory. The soldiers, greatly animated hereby, protested they were ready to execute all his measures. Nothing could have happened more favourable to Hannibal's affairs, than the arrival of Magilus, since there was no room to doubt the sincerity of his intentions, the Boii bearing an implacable hatred to the Romans, and having even come to an open rupture with them, upon the first news, that Italy was threatened with an invasion from the Carthaginians.

the foot of the Alps.

For four days Hannibal continued his march, crossing through the midst of Gaul, and moving northwards, with his horse and elephants posted in the rear; not because this was the shortest way to the Alps, but because it kept him at a considerable distance from the sea, and consequently enabled him to avoid Scipio, with whom he chose to decline an engagement, in pursuance of the advice given him by Magilus, that he might march his army, without any diminution, into Italy. Advancing towards the country of the Allobroges, he found two brothers disputing about the sovereignty of a territory, where he encamped. Brancus, the elder brother, was driven from his throne by the younger part of his subjects, who espoused his younger brother's interest. Hannibal, being made arbiter of this dispute, reinstated Brancus in the possession of his dominions; who thereupon, out of a sense of gratitude, supplied his troops with every thing they wanted, particularly arms, of which they then stood in great need, their old ones being, in a manner, worn out by long service; which was, as Polybius observes, the same thing as furnishing him with a proper number of recruits. He likewise escorted him through the countries of the Tricastini, Vocontii, and Tricorii, as far as the river Druentia, now the Durance; from whence he reached the foot of the Alps without opposition.

As, in a former part of this work, we have given a large account of Hannibal's passing the Alps, we shall have no occasion to expatiate upon that head here. Nothing further is requisite to be done, than to insert all the most material circumstances and occurrences, relative to so famous a transaction, that have been hitherto omitted. This we shall do from those writers, whose authority is the most esteemed, and who have been the most particular in their descriptions of it; which, we hope, will not be unacceptable to our readers.

He comes to the summit of those mountains.

NOTWITHSTANDING most, if not all, of the barbarous nations, through whom Hannibal was to pass, had a mortal aversion to the Romans, yet, as they were incapable of friendship or fidelity, he frequently found both himself and his army in the most imminent danger of being cut off, and particularly at his beginning to ascend the Alps, soon after his escorte had left him. Being however informed, that the enemy only kept guard in the day-time, he found means to encamp not far from them; and, about the first watch of the night, ordering a great number of fires to be made in his camp, as though all his troops remained there, he moved, at the head of a choice detachment, to some passes in the neighbourhood, which the enemy had abandoned, their main body always retiring at night to a town at some distance. These he immediately seized upon, and soon after gave them a defeat, killing vast numbers of them upon the spot; upon which, advancing to the town, he found it a deserted by the inhabitants. Here he met with plenty of cattle, and other provisions, with which, for three days together, he refreshed his forces. Continuing his march to the summit of the Alps, he encountered with many other difficulties. The sight of these mountains, which seemed to touch the skies, that were all covered with snow, and where nothing appeared to the eye but a few tottering cottages, scattered here and there on the sharp tops of inaccessible rocks; nothing but meagre flocks almost perished with cold, and hairy men of a savage and fiery aspect; this dismal spectacle, we say, renewed the terror, which the distant prospect of this ridge of mountains had raised, and struck a prodigious damp on the hearts of the soldiery. Besides which, the whole army was brought upon the verge of destruction by the perfidy of a Gallie nation, who, under the specious appearance of friends, persuaded Hannibal to commit himself to their conduct, promising to shew him the best and most expeditious way to the summit of the Alps. But these faithless guides, having led him into a steep pass, out of which they thought it would be impossible for him to make his escape, facing about on a sudden, charged him with great fury, being supported by vast numbers of their countrymen, who, till that time, had kept themselves concealed, but now rushed out from an eminence, that commanded this pass, where they had placed an ambuscade. However, Hannibal, by the wise disposition of his forces, as well as the assistance of his elephants, and bravery of his infantry, who greatly distinguished themselves on this occasion, at last dispersed them; and, having surmounted all other difficulties, the ninth day from his beginning the ascent, arrived at the top of the mountains. It must be observed, that Hannibal was, in a great measure, obliged to the elephants for his escaping all the disasters the enemy threatened him with, since where-ever these huge animals appeared, the Gauls were struck with such terror, that they immediately took to their heels; by which means the Carthaginian general gained the summit of the Alps with the less molestation^x.

HERE Hannibal halted for two days, to refresh his wearied troops, which were greatly disheartened by the snow that had lately fallen. In order to animate them to make another effort with alacrity, from one of the highest hills he gave them a prospect of the fruitful plains watered by the Po, the day before he decamped. He likewise pointed towards the place where Rome stood, which, he assured them, a battle or two would make them masters of, and consequently put a glorious period to all their toils. This inspired them with such vigour, that they seemed to have forgot all the fatigues they had undergone, and to think of nothing but taking possession of that baughty city, whose conduct towards their state had been nothing but one continued series of insults since the conclusion of the Sicilian war^y.

THEY therefore pursued their march; but the difficulty and danger increased, in proportion as they approached nearer the end of the descent. We are told, that, about this time, Hannibal meditated a return home; but, from the main conduct and genius of that general, this seems highly improbable. To omit many particulars, they came at last to a path naturally very steep and craggy, which being made more so by the late falling in of the earth, terminated in a frightful precipice above a thousand foot deep. In fine, Hannibal found it would be impossible for him to accomplish his design, without cutting a way into the rock itself, through which his men, horses, and elephants, might pass; which, with immense labour, he effected. Approaching therefore gradually the Insubrian foot of the Alps, he detached some parties of his horse for forage, there appearing now some spots of pasture, where the ground was not covered with snow. Livy informs us, that, in order to open and enlarge the path above-mentioned, all the trees thereabouts were cut down, and piled round the rock, after which fire was set to them. The wind, by good fortune, blowing hard, a fierce flame soon broke out; so that the rock glowed like the very coals with which it was surrounded. Then Hannibal, according to the same author, caused a great quantity of vinegar to be poured on the rock; which piercing into the veins of it, that were now cracked by the intense heat of the fire, calcined and softened it. In this manner, taking a large compass about, in order that the descent might be easier, he cut a way along the rock, which opened a free passage to the forces, baggage, and elephants, as above observed. As Polybius has passed over in silence the use Hannibal made of vinegar on this occasion, many reject that incident as fictitious. However, Pliny mentions one extraordinary quality of vinegar, viz. its being able to break rocks and stones, after fire had been applied to them, and found ineffectual. And that the walls, or at least a strong tower, of the city Eleuthera in Crete, after a continued operation for several nights, were thrown down by the force of vinegar, is asserted by Dio. Appian likewise, and Ammianus Marcellinus, attest the fact we have, from Livy, here taken notice of. But, admitting this acid to be endued with such a quality, it seems difficult to conceive how Hannibal could procure a quantity of it sufficient for his purpose in so mountainous and barren a country ^a.

He arrives in Insubria.

THREE days after this, Hannibal gained the fruitful plains of Insubria, where, taking a review of his army, he found, that, in five months and a half's march, (for so long was it since he had set out from New Carthage) he had lost, by sickness, desertion, fatigue, and various engagements, thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; so that it amounted at present to no (G) more than twenty-six thousand effective men. Of the soldiers missing, above twenty thousand had perished since his departure from the Rhodanus. And here, that we may have a clearer idea of Hannibal's march, it will be proper to give the names and distances of some of the principal places, through which that general passed in his way to Italy; which we shall beg leave to transcribe from Polybius. From New Carthage to the Iberus were computed two thousand six hundred stadia; from the Iberus to Emporium, a small maritime town, which separated Spain from the Gauls, according to Strabo, sixteen hundred stadia; from Emporium to the banks of the Rhodanus, sixteen hundred stadia; from the Rhodanus to the Alps, fourteen hundred stadia; from the Alps to the plains of Insubria, twelve hundred stadia. In all eight thousand four hundred stadia, making much about a thousand English miles ^b.

Takes Taurinum.

UPON Hannibal's arrival in Italy, he, for some time, encamped at the foot of the mountains, in order to give his troops some rest, they having suffered extremely in their passage over the Alps. He first took care to refresh them, and afterwards to recruit his cavalry, that he might be ready to enter upon action. He then solicited the Taurini, who were at war with the Insubres, to enter into an alliance with him. Upon their refusal to conclude a treaty with him, he entered their territories in a hostile manner; and sitting down before Taurinum, their capital city, after a siege of three days, took it by storm, putting all, that made any resistance, to the sword. This struck all the neighbouring Gauls with such terror, that coming in to him as one man, they surrendered at discretion. By this first instance of success, he had not only his army plentifully supplied with all kinds of provisions, but likewise strongly reinforced by great numbers of these Gauls, who took on in the Carthaginian service. The rest of the Gauls would, in all probability, have done the same thing, had they not been awed by the terror of the Roman arms, which were now approaching. Hannibal therefore thought his wisest course would be to march up directly into their country without loss of time, and make some important attempt; such as might encourage those, who shewed a disposition to join him, to put themselves under his protection ^c.

And advances towards the Romans.

IN the mean time, Hannibal received intelligence, that Scipio had passed the Po with his legions, and was advancing, with all possible celerity, to give him battle. This, at first, he could scarcely believe, thinking it impossible, that he should return from Gaul to Italy, cross Etruria, pass the Po, and be ready to receive him, in so short a time. What gave him this notion, was an information from those he could confide in, that the passage from Massilia, now Marseilles, to Etruria, by sea, was

(G) We have followed Polybius in this particular, since he tells us, he extracted this account from the column at Lacinium, which specified the number of forces here mentioned. It is highly probable, as Livy followed Polybius in most points, that this column is the altar, that author tells us, Hannibal erected in the temple of Juno Lacinia, whereon he engraved the general account of his great achievements in Greek and Punic letters. We do not learn from this testimony of Livy, in what language these memoirs were written; but as either the Greek or Punic, or rather both, bids the fairest for it, Livy's authority confirms what we have lately suggested on that head. Polybius, it is certain, has been intirely silent as to this particular; and therefore Livy's authority is not decisive. However, with what we have lately advanced, it is nearly, if not absolutely, so (13).

a extremely difficult and tedious; and the way to the last place from the Alps, by land, almost impracticable. Scipio, on his side, was as much surpris'd at Hannibal's expeditious march, and rapid progress. The news of his arrival in Italy, and the conquests he had already made there, so alarmed the people at Rome, that they dispatched an express to Sempronius at Lilybæum, to repair, with the utmost expedition, to the relief of his distressed country. Having received an account of the posture of affairs, he imbarqued immediately for Rome with the naval forces, leaving orders with the respective tribunes to draw together what troops they could out of their several garrisons, fixing a day for them to rendezvous at Ariminum, now Rimini, a town situated near the coast of the Adriatic, on the edge of the plains watered by the Po on the south. Hannibal, besides the method made use of to animate his soldiers formerly mentioned, in a set speech, put them in mind of their glorious achievements, and of the great difficulties they had surmounted. He told them, the Romans had never yet engaged men act'd by despair, nor such warriors as themselves, who had marched from the pillars of Hercules, through the fiercest nations, into the very heart of Italy. His own superiority to Scipio in military experience and exploits, he insinuated, they were not strangers to. They could not but be sensible, he went on, that he was almost born, at least educated, in his father Hamilcar's tent; that he was the conqueror of Spain, of Gaul, of the inhabitants of the Alps, and, what is still more, of the Alps themselves; that, by a little bravery, they would make themselves masters of Rome, and consequently of all the Roman acquisitions in Sicily, of which that ambitious republic had deprived their ancestors. Lastly, he rous'd their indignation against the insolence of the Romans, who had had the assurance to demand, that both he, and the other officers employ'd in the reduction of Saguntum, should be deliver'd into their hands, in order to be put to the most exquisite torture; endeavouring to inspire them with a just abhorrence and detestation of such a proud and imperious people, who imagin'd, that all things ought to obey them, and that they had a right to give laws to the whole world.

In the mean time, Scipio, advancing to the Ticinus, threw a bridge over that river, and immediately erected a fort to defend it against all attempts of the enemy. It is not improbable, that he call'd it Ticinum, after the name of the river, and that this was the original of the city of Pavia, which, in the most antient authors, is call'd Ticinum. Whilst the Romans were employ'd in raising this fort, Hannibal detach'd Maberbal, with a body of five hundred Numidian horse, to lay waste the territories of those nations, that were in alliance with Rome; but gave him orders to spare the Gauls, and excite the various princes of that people, if possible, to a revolt. The Roman army, having pass'd the Ticinus, advanced to a village of Insubria, five miles from the fort they had built, and there encamp'd upon some heights, in sight of the Carthaginians. Hannibal, upon this motion, call'd in the Numidian detachment under Maberbal, and made the proper dispositions to attack the enemy. Before the signal was given, he thought it requisite to animate his troops with fresh promises; which having done, cleaving with a stone the skull of the lamb he was sacrificing, he pray'd Jupiter to dash to pieces his head in like manner, in case he did not give his soldiers the rewards he had promis'd them. This render'd his troops impatient to come to blows with the enemy, especially as two ill omens had just fill'd their army with terror and consternation. In the first place, a wolf had stol'n into the Roman camp, and cruelly mangled some of the soldiers, without receiving the least harm from those who endeavour'd to kill it; and secondly, a swarm of bees had pitched upon a tree near the prætorium, or general's tent. However, Scipio mov'd at the head of his forces into the plain, where Hannibal had drawn up his troops in order of battle; and, advancing with his dartmen and cavalry to take a view of the number and posture of the enemy, fell in with the whole body of the Carthaginian horse, command'd by Hannibal himself; upon which the fight immediately began. As we have already given a full account of this battle, it will be unnecessary to be prolix here in our description of it. We shall therefore only observe, that Hannibal post'd in the centre of his cavalry the troopers who rode with bridles, and the Numidian horse on the wings, in order to surround the enemy; that the action was very hot and bloody, victory continuing, for a long time, in suspense; that many troopers on both sides, in the heat of the action, dismounted, and fought on foot; but that at last the Numidians charged the Romans in flank with such fury, that they broke them, put their centre into disorder, and wounded the consul himself; which obliged the Romans, after having lost the greatest part of their army, to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. The immediate consequence of which victory was, that Scipio repassed the Ticinus in great confusion, broke down the bridge he had lately thrown cross that river, and left six hundred men in the fort to the mercy of the enemy, who surrendered at discretion to Hannibal upon his approach. It is agreed, that Hannibal owed this first victory to his superiority in cavalry, and the disposition of the ground where the engagement happened, no place being more proper for such troops to act in, than those large open plains lying between the Po and the Alps ^d.

the Trebia.

Hannibal, having thus driven the enemy out of the field, pursued them as far as ^b the bridge above-mentioned; but finding it broke down, he marched up the river for two days, till he came to the banks of the Po. Here he dispatched Mago, with the light Spanish horse, to move after the Romans; who, having rallied their shattered forces, and repassed the Po, were encamped at Placentia. Asdrubal immediately crossed that river on a bridge of boats, and was followed by Hannibal with the gross of the army, after he had given an audience to the deputies that came to him from several Gallie nations. These nations, immediately upon Scipio's defeat, entering into an alliance with Hannibal, not only reinforced the Carthaginians by inlisting in their army, but supplied them plentifully with all sorts of necessaries. Having given a most kind reception to the deputies above-mentioned, and concluded a treaty ^c with them, he pursued his march with great expedition, soon joining Mago, who had advanced a day's march beyond the Po, towards Placentia, where he halted, till Hannibal came up. Upon the junction of their forces, the two Carthaginian generals advanced to Placentia, and offered the Romans battle. But they judging it proper to decline accepting the challenge, the Carthaginians encamped ten miles from them, where a body of Gallie deserters from the consul's army came over to them, after they had cut to pieces a good number of the Romans. As the Boii likewise, about the same time, were guilty of an action equally black and perfidious, Scipio feared a general insurrection of the Gauls; and therefore, removing from the neighbourhood of their country, he passed the Trebia, a small river which falls into the Po, taking ^d post on an eminence near that river, on the frontiers of his allies. Here he encamped, being determined to remain in a state of inaction, till the arrival of his colleague Sempronius with the forces from Sicily ^e.

Hannibal, being apprised of the consul's departure from Placentia, sent the Numidian horse to harass him in his march, himself moving, with the main body of the army, to support them, in case of need. The Numidians, finding the Roman camp deserted, set fire to it; which gave the consul an opportunity of making his retreat without any loss: whereas, had not the Numidians spent their time in so trifling an action, they might have cut off a great part of the Roman army. However, they made such speed, that they arrived upon the banks of the Trebia, before the rear of ^e the Romans had intirely passed that river, and put to the sword, or made prisoners, all the stragglers they found upon their arrival there. Soon after, Hannibal coming up, encamped in sight of the Roman army, on the opposite bank; and having, by his spies, soon learned the character of Sempronius, who had joined Scipio, and, during the disorder that general laboured under by reason of his wound, had the sole command of the Roman forces, formed a scheme to intrap him. In fine, Sempronius, being of a rash, though ambitious, disposition, contrary to the sentiments of Scipio, was resolved, at all events, to venture an engagement with Hannibal. To this he was farther excited by the scarcity of provisions prevailing in the Roman camp; whilst the Carthaginians enjoyed the greatest plenty and affluence, Hannibal having ^f lately seized the principal Roman magazine at Clasidium, a city betrayed to him by Publius a Brundusian. As a body of Numidians, by Hannibal's orders, were ravaging the country of the Gauls in alliance with the Romans, he detached his cavalry in quest of them, who, coming up with them, gained an inconsiderable advantage over them; which so puffed up the consul, that, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, it being now about the winter solstice, he commanded his troops to be ready at an hour's warning to pass the river, and attack the Carthaginian camp. Hannibal, in the mean time, posted Mago, with a detachment of two thousand horse and foot, in a ambuscade, on the steep banks of a rivulet running between the two camps; and then detached a body of Numidian cavalry to pass the Trebia, and insult the enemy, with orders to repass it upon the first motion of their army, and, if possible, to draw the Romans after them. This stratagem had the desired effect; for Sempronius, not being able to bear seeing himself braved in this manner, dispatched all his horse, supported by his dart-men, after the Numidians, himself following with the rest of the army. Upon this motion, a battle ensued, wherein, partly by the wise disposition of the Carthaginian forces Hannibal had made, partly through the great imprudence of Sempronius, and partly by the bravery of his troops (H), Hannibal intirely defeated the Romans, in the manner by us already related. Almost the whole Roman army, besides a body of ten thousand men, who made their retreat to Placentia, were either slain, or taken prisoners. The Gauls, in the Carthaginian service, suffered pretty much in the action; but the Carthaginians sustained no considerable loss, except that of their horses and elephants, all of which last, but one, perished by the cold, and in the battle. The Roman army consisted of sixteen thousand legionaries, twenty thousand auxiliary forces, some companies of the Cenomani, and four thousand Roman horse; Hannibal's of twenty thousand Gallic, Spanish and African infantry, eight thousand Spanish and Balearic slingers, and ten thousand Gallic and Numidian cavalry. The Carthaginians pursued the routed enemy, with great ardour, as far as the Trebia; but did not think proper to pass that river immediately, on account of the excessive cold. The next night Scipio decamped, and retired likewise with great precipitation to Placentia f.

It is evident, that what principally contributed to the defeat of the Roman army, was their inferiority in horse; for the Carthaginian cavalry amounted to ten thousand, whereas that of the Romans did not exceed four thousand; and this body, small as it was, could not act with vigour, being soon thrown into confusion by the enemy's elephants. The horses could neither bear the sight nor smell of those monstrous animals, and therefore were, in the highest degree, terrified upon their approach. Scipio undoubtedly had acquainted Sempronius with the danger he was in from the enemy's superiority in horse, since he had lost the battle of Ticinus just before by the d weakness of his cavalry, and urged this among other topics, as a reason for him to decline an engagement. But Sempronius, being infatuated by his rashness, as well as ambition, was deaf to all salutary admonitions, and, in consequence of this infaturation, brought upon the Romans the signal loss and disgrace above-mentioned e.

THE Carthaginians, upon Fabius's declaration of war, proposed to act by sea as well as land, against the Romans, and their allies; and therefore, besides all their military preparations above-mentioned, fitted out twenty galleys, with a thousand soldiers on board, to ravage the coasts of Italy. Nine of these seized upon the islands of Lipari, and eight upon the island of Vulcania, the other three not being able to approach the shore, by reason of the tide's being against them. They likewise equipped a fleet of thirty-five quinqueremes, with a sufficient land-force on board, to pos-

(H) We are told by the Roman authors, that the Carthaginians, at Hannibal's command, anointed their bodies with oil before the engagement began, making use of this expedient as a preservative against the cold, a vast quantity of snow having fallen the day before. In like manner Xenophon tells us, that Cyrus's troops anointed themselves with oil before large fires, when snow two cubits deep had fallen in Armenia. Frontinus insinuates, that, on such occasions, the ancients sometimes used oil and wine mixed. It appears from Virgil, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, &c. that wrestlers increased their strength and vigour, by applying oil to their bodies in the manner above-mentioned. In allusion to which custom, the ancient christian writers sometimes called the Holy Spirit ANETHES, or The Anointer; because he supplies good christians with an ample degree of courage and power in their spiritual warfare. The pastors of the christian church have likewise that name given them by some of the Greek fathers, on account of the assistance they afford the flocks committed to their care, in their struggle with their spiritual enemies. That the ancient Romans, as well as the Carthaginians, used oil for the ends just hinted at, is evident from many authors. Pliny relates, that when a person asked Augustus in his extreme old age, how he came to preserve such vigour of body and mind so long? he answered, Intus mulso, foris oleo, i. e. By refreshing myself inwardly with wine, and outwardly with oil (14).

self themselves of Lilybæum. This last attempt however miscarried, the Carthaginians being defeated by the Romans, and losing seven of their vessels, together with seventeen hundred of their men taken prisoners, amongst whom were three Carthaginian noblemen. From the coast of Sicily, Sempronius, with the Roman and Syracusan squadrons, sailed to Melita, now Malta, and had the island, together with the Carthaginian forces in it, surrendered to him by Hamilcar, the son of Gisco, the governor. From Melita the consul steered his course to the island of Vulcania, thinking to meet with the Carthaginian fleet; but he was disappointed in his expectation, the Carthaginians having before sailed to the coasts of Italy, and plundered the territory of the city of Vibo, threatening at the same time to attack that city itself; which the consul being apprised of when he returned to Sicily, and likewise receiving letters from Rome by an express, notifying to him Hannibal's arrival in Italy, with orders to return home with all possible expedition, he found himself obliged to alter his measures. He immediately therefore dispatched Sextus Pomponius, with twenty-five long ships, to protect the maritime coasts of Italy from the insults of the Carthaginian squadron; and hastened himself to Ariminum, from whence he proceeded to the Trebia, where he met with the misfortune above related ^b.

The transactions in Spain this campaign.

WHILST Hannibal was pushing on his conquests in Italy, Hanno, who commanded in Spain, received intelligence, that the Romans, under the command of Cneius Scipio, had advanced as far as the Iberus, and reduced all the country betwixt that river and the Pyrenees. Upon this advice, Hanno assembled his forces, and marched to the city of Cissa, where he encamped in sight of the Romans. The vicinity of the two armies soon brought on a general action, wherein the Carthaginians were totally routed. Hanno himself was taken prisoner, together with Indibilis, a Spanish prince, intirely devoted to the Carthaginians. Their camp was forced, six thousand of them slain, and two thousand taken prisoners. All the heavy baggage Hannibal left with Hanno before his departure for Italy, fell a prey to the Romans; and many of the Spanish nations concluded an offensive and defensive alliance with Scipio upon this defeat. However, this did not discourage the Carthaginians; for Asdrubal, another Carthaginian commander, hearing that the Roman seamen and marines had dispersed themselves about the country, without any order or discipline, immediately passed the Iberus with a body of eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon them unexpectedly, and put the greatest part of them to the sword, pursuing the rest to their fleet. Nothing of moment happened afterwards this campaign in Spain, Asdrubal taking up his winter-quarters at New Carthage, as soon as he had ended this expedition; and the Romans theirs at Tarraco, after Scipio had divided the booty got from the Carthaginians by the late victory amongst his troops ^c.

Hannibal's policy to win over to his interest the allies of the Romans.

THE Romans, having received an account of the two terrible blows given them by Hannibal upon the Ticinus and the Trebia, were struck with the utmost terror and consternation. However, they made vigorous preparations to continue the war. In the mean time Scipio removed from Placentia to Cremona, where he put his troops into winter-quarters. Hannibal, after the action upon the Trebia, ordered the Numidians, Celtiberians, and Lusitanians, to make incursions into the Roman territories, where they committed great depredations: and not contented with this, he formed a design to make himself master of a Roman fortress in the neighbourhood of Placentia; but miscarried in the attempt. He likewise reduced Vidulumviæ, making the garrison prisoners of war; which concluded the operations of this campaign. But, during his state of inaction, he took care to refresh his troops, and win the affections of the Gauls, as well as the allies of the Romans. He therefore declared to the Gallie and Italian prisoners he had taken, that he had no intention to make war upon their nations, being determined to restore them to their liberty, and protect them against the Romans. To confirm them in the idea he was desirous they should entertain of him, he dismissed them, without demanding the least ransom ^d.

He marches into Etruria.

DURING the winter, Hannibal's troops were reinforced by a considerable body of Gauls, Ligurians, and Etruscans, who, for various reasons, thought proper to abandon the Romans. Hannibal however reposed no great trust in his auxiliaries, but rather entertained a suspicion of them; on which account he disguised himself this winter in the manner already related. He was the better enabled to do this by the variety of languages he understood, amongst which Zonaras mentions the Latin. By a this conduct he found, that the most effectual way for him to secure himself, was to change the theatre of the war, and march into Etruria. This he did, after a brisk rencounter with Sempronius, wherein many fell on both sides, as we have already observed in a former part of this history ¹.

Hannibal having, to the great surprize of all, crossed the Apennines, and penetrated into Etruria, received intelligence, that the new consul Flaminius lay encamped, with the Roman army, under the walls of Arretium. Pursuant to the plan of operations laid down, he moved directly that way, in order to inform himself of the Roman general's capacity and designs, as well as the course and situation of the country. As his troops had been greatly harassed by the late fatiguing march, he halted b some time in the neighbourhood of Fasula to refresh them. Here he learned the true character of Flaminius, that he was a good orator, but intirely ignorant of the military art: in fine, that he was rash, proud, and of a fierce disposition. This gave Hannibal no small encouragement, not doubting but he should soon be able to bring him to a battle. Hannibal, in the first step he took, says Polybius, acted like a wise commander, since it ought to be the chief study of a general to discover the genius of his antagonist, in order to take advantage of his foible. To inflame the impetuous spirit of Flaminius, the Carthaginian general advanced towards Arretium, taking the way to Rome, and leaving the Roman army behind him, destroying all the country, through which he moved, with fire and sword. As that part of Etruria abounded c with corn, cattle, all sorts of provisions, in fine, with all the elegancies, as well as necessaries, of life, being one of the richest and most fertile spots of ground in Italy, the Romans, and their allies, sustained an incredible loss on this occasion.

Flaminius was not of a temper to continue inactive in his camp, though Hannibal should have lain still, and given him no provocation; but when he beheld the territories of the allies of Rome ravaged in so dreadful a manner, he lost all patience, thinking it would reflect the greatest dishonour upon him, should he permit Hannibal to continue his devastations with impunity, and even advance to the very walls of Rome without opposition. He resolved therefore immediately to attack the Carthaginians; and so furiously was he bent upon this, that when the officers of the army, d in a council of war, endeavoured to prevail upon him to wait the arrival of his colleague, he rushed out of the council in a rage, giving orders to the army instantly to begin their march. Yes truly, said he, we ought to sit still before the walls of Arretium, since this is our native country, and here are our habitations! We ought to let Hannibal escape out of our hands, and destroy all the country, to the very walls of Rome, with fire and sword! We ought, by no means, to move from hence, till the conscript fathers send for C. Flaminius from Arretium, as they formerly did for Camillus from Veii! He mounted his horse in such a hurry, that he fell from him; which was considered as a bad omen. This however made no impression upon him. Immediately after this, a messenger came to acquaint him, that the ensigns stuck so fast in the ground, that the soldiers e could not pull them out. Upon which, turning towards him, Dost thou bring me a letter likewise, said he, from the senate, prohibiting me to act against the Carthaginians? Go tell them, they may dig the ensigns up, if their hands are so benumbed with fear, that they cannot pull them out. As though therefore he had been certain of victory, he immediately decamped, approaching Hannibal with the utmost temerity, in order to attack him ^m.

In the mean time Hannibal kept on, still advancing towards Rome, having Cortona on the left-hand, and the lake Thrasymenus on the right. At last, observing the disposition of the ground to be very commodious for his purpose, he put himself into a posture to receive Flaminius, who was upon the point of coming up with him. The f lake Thrasymenus, and the mountains of Cortona, form a very narrow defile, which leads into a large valley, lined on both sides with hills of a considerable height, and closed at the outlet by a steep hill of difficult access. Upon this hill Hannibal encamped with his Spanish and African troops, posting the Baleares and light-armed infantry, which were drawn up in one long line, in ambuscade, at the foot of the hills on the right-side of the valley, and lining with the Gallie cavalry the left-side of it, in such manner, that they extended as far as the entrance of the defile. Hannibal, having thus in the night surrounded the valley with his forces, lay still, as though he had no intention to engage. This farther excited the consul to fall upon the Carthaginians as soon as possible; for which end he so eagerly pursued them, that the following night he advanced to the valley, and entered it the next morning, moving with his vanguard at a small distance from the lake Thrasymenus above-mentioned. Hannibal, now observing, that the greatest part of Flaminius's troops marched in disorder, and were so near him, that his men could not fail of doing great execution amongst them, provided they instantly charged them with vigour, ordered them to be attacked in front, in rear, and in flank, at the same time. As the Roman officers could not see which way to lead their men, nor discover the enemy that charged them, by reason of a thick fog from the lake, the consular army was, in a moment, thrown into confusion. Flaminius however did his utmost to animate his men, exhorting them to cut themselves a passage with their swords through the midst of the enemy; but the tumult, which reigned every-where, the dreadful shouts of the enemy, and the fog that was risen, prevented his being seen or heard. However, the Romans, seeing the impossibility of saving themselves by flight, and a little recovering themselves upon the dissipation of the fog, for some time fought with unparalleled bravery; but Flaminius himself being slain by an Insubrian, they began to give ground, and at last betook themselves to a precipitate flight. The Roman army, according to Appian, consisted of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; of which fifteen thousand (twenty thousand, says Appian) fell upon the field of battle, and six thousand, that retreated to a town in Etruria, surrendered the next day at discretion to Maherbal. According to Valerius Maximus, Eutropius, and Orosius, five-and-twenty thousand Romans perished in this action. Hannibal lost only fifteen hundred men on this occasion, most of whom were Gauls, though great numbers, both of his soldiers and the Romans, died afterwards of their wounds. He commanded the strictest search to be made for the body of Flaminius, in order to give it a decent interment; but it could not be found. He likewise solemnized the funerals of thirty of his chief officers, who had been slain in the action; but was at a loss how to dispatch a courier to Carthage, with an account of the glorious victory he had gained.

 All the other principal particulars relating to the defeat of the Romans at the lake Thrasymenus, our readers will find in a proper place.

Maherbal romus Centenius.

Hannibal, being informed, that the consul Servilius had detached a body of four, or, according to Appian, eight thousand horse from Ariminum, to reinforce his colleague in Etruria, sent out Maherbal, with all the cavalry, and some of the infantry, to attack him. The Roman detachment consisted of chosen men, and was commanded by (1) Centenius a patrician. Maherbal had the good fortune to meet with him, and, after a short dispute, intirely defeated him. Two thousand of the Romans were laid dead upon the spot, the rest retiring to a neighbouring eminence, where being surrounded by Maherbal, they were obliged the next day to surrender at discretion. This blow, happening within a few days after the defeat at the lake Thrasymenus, almost gave a finishing stroke to the Roman affairs. Appian tells us, that the people in Rome were so alarmed on this occasion, that they expected an immediate visit from Hannibal; and therefore not only posted great numbers of dartmen on the ramparts to defend them, but likewise armed even the old men with the arms taken from their enemies in former wars, and hung up as trophies in their temples. Hannibal however, now thinking himself so much superior to the Romans, that they would not be able hereafter to make head against him, did not advance to Rome, but moved towards the territory of Adria, taking his route through Umbria and Picenum. As he plundered all the country through which he marched, upon his arrival in the territory of Adria, he was loaded with booty. Spoletum he attacked in his march; but was repulsed with great loss. From thence approaching the frontiers of Apulia, he ravaged the adjacent territories, viz. the country of the Marsi, Marrucini, Peligni, together with the districts of Arpi and Lutetia. The consul Ch.

(1) We cannot forbear expressing our surprize, that Isaac Casaubon, in his Latin version of Polybius, should prefer the name Centronius to Centenius, since, in the original, it is Centenius. That very learned man might have been convinced by Sigonius, in his excellent scholia upon Livy, that, tho' some antient copies of this last author have in one place Centronius, Centenius was the name of the general here mentioned. To what Sigonius has said, we shall only beg leave to add, that Appian and Zonaras both call this proprætor Centenius; which is a confirmation of that great man's opinion (15).

a Servilius did nothing memorable this campaign. He had only a few slight skirmishes with the Gauls, and made himself master of an inconsiderable town. However, he thought proper to move towards Rome, to cover that capital from any attempts of the Carthaginians. Polybius tells us, that Hannibal treated the allies of the Romans with the utmost cruelty in this expedition, which that author attributes to the invincible aversion he had been inspired with by his father Hamilcar to the Romans.

THE Carthaginian army at this time was very sickly, being troubled with a scorbutic disorder, called by the Greeks Lemphoros. This seemed owing to the unwholesome encampments they had been obliged to make, and their march through so many morasses. As both the horses and men were infected with it, Hannibal found it absolutely necessary to repose his troops for some time in the territory of Adria, which was a most pleasant and fruitful country. In his various engagements with the Romans, he had taken a great number of their arms, with which he now armed his men after the Roman manner. Being now likewise master of that part of the country bordering on the sea, he found means to send an express to Carthage, with the news of the glorious progress of his arms. The Carthaginians received this news with the most joyful acclamations, at the same time coming to a resolution to reinforce, with a proper number of troops, their armies both in Italy and Spain. They also had frequent consultations how they might send them a plentiful supply of all necessities with the utmost expedition, being determined to prosecute the war with all possible vigour.

Hannibal arms his soldiers after the Roman manner.

encamped near Isonium. In the mean time Fabius, for his singular virtue and abilities surnamed Maximus, was elected dictator at Rome, and had the absolute command of the Roman army given him. Fabius ordered the consul Servilius to watch the motions of the Carthaginians by sea, whilst he, with the legions, and his general of the horse, advanced to Ægæ, to have an eye upon Hannibal. The cunning Carthaginian made a great variety of movements, and had recourse to an infinity of stratagems, in order to draw the Roman general to a battle, which it was his highest interest to do; but all his endeavours proved ineffectual. Hannibal therefore, having before d ravaged all the country bordering on the Adriatic, crossed the Apennines, and entered into Samnium, where he likewise committed great devastations. He plundered the territory of Beneventum, took the strong city of Venusia, and laid siege to Telesia, a town at the foot of the Apennines. Fabius still kept pace with him, tho' he did not think proper to approach the Carthaginians nearer than a day's march, being determined to decline an engagement. Hannibal, being convinced, that a state of inaction must prove fatal to him, in order to draw Fabius to a battle, marched his army into Campania, by the advice of some of the Italian prisoners he had dismissed after the late battle, and who now had joined him. Accordingly he ordered his guides to e conduct him to the territory of Casertum, being informed, that, if he could make himself master of this, he should cut off all communication betwixt the Romans and their allies on that side. Livy tells us, that Hannibal, not having the true pronunciation of the Latin, named Casilinum, instead of Casertum, to his guides; who thereupon pursued a different route, leading him through the districts of Allifæ, Calatia, and Cales, into that of Stella, where finding himself surrounded on all sides by mountains and rivers, he inquired in what part of the world he was; and received for answer from his guides, that he should lodge that night at Casilinum; when discovering the mistake, he put to death the principal of them, and detached Maberbal, with a body of horse, to plunder the territory of Falernum. That general, penetrating as far as the waters of Silueffa, destroyed all the country, as he advanced, with fire and sword, the Numidians making a terrible slaughter of the poor country people. However, the Campanians continued firm in their obedience to the Romans. Hannibal afterwards, encamping upon the Vulturnus, ravaged the whole province in a most dreadful manner, Fabius not offering to stir; though he beheld these devastations from the top of mount Masivus, where he had posted himself to observe the motions of the Carthaginian army. This greatly incensed both the Roman troops, and his general of the horse, against him.

bring Fabius to a battle.

ALL methods had been now tried in vain by Hannibal to bring Fabius to a battle. ^a He had at first advanced to his very intrenchments at Ægæ, and braved him; he had upbraided him and his troops with having lost the valour of their ancestors, tho' at the same time he inwardly fretted to find himself engaged with a general of so different a genius from Sempronius and Flaminius; he had endeavoured to rouse him by frequent removals from place to place, by laying waste the lands, plundering the cities, and burning the villages and towns. He, at one time, would decamp with the utmost precipitation, and at another quite stop short in some remote valley, to see whether he could not rush out, and surprise him in the plain; but, notwithstanding all his artifices, all his marches, countermarches, and finesses, the dictator inflexibly adhered to his first resolution, and thereby gave the crafty Carthaginian to ^b understand, that the Romans, instructed by their defeats, had at last made choice of a general capable of opposing Hannibal ^c.

He retires from Campania.

As Campania was a country more agreeable to the eye, than proper for the subsistence of an army, and the Carthaginians would have been forced to have taken up their winter-quarters amongst morasses, rocks and sands, had they remained any considerable time longer there, Hannibal began to think of decamping. To this he was farther excited by an apprehension, that the Romans would receive plentiful supplies from Capua, and the richest countries in Italy. That he might not therefore consume idly the provisions he had amassed for the winter-season, nor lose the immensely rich spoils gotten in the provinces he had ravaged, he began his march out of Campania towards the decline of summer, and pursued it for some time with great expedition ^d.

difficulty arrives on the confines of Sam-nium.

IT being natural to suppose, that Hannibal would return the same way he came, and Fabius being apprised of this by his spies, the Roman general ordered a detachment of four thousand men to advance, and possess themselves of the pass on mount Eribanus, exhorting them to behave with bravery, when an opportunity of engaging the Carthaginians offered. After this, Fabius, that he might the more easily annoy Hannibal in his march; threw another body of troops into Casilinum, a small town situated on the Vulturnus, which separated the territories of Falernum from those of Capua, and at the same time took post with the main body of his army on mount ^d Callicula. From hence he sent a party of four hundred horse, under the command of L. Hostilius Mancinus, to reconnoitre the enemy, with orders to retire upon the first news of their approach. Mancinus, paying no regard to his orders, skirmished with several straggling parties of Numidians, who, retiring before him, drew him on by degrees nearer the Carthaginian camp; which Cartalo, general of the Carthaginian cavalry, observing, pursued him, at the head of a good body of horse, five miles, and at last coming up with him, cut him off, with the greatest part of his men. The rest fled to Cales, from whence, through several by-paths, they made their escape to Fabius, bringing him the melancholy news of the disaster that had befallen them.

so effect this.

Hannibal, with his forces, soon arrived at the foot of the mountains, where he ^e encamped. Soon after, an action happened between him and Fabius, wherein he lost eight hundred men, and the Romans two hundred. But here he found himself involved in great difficulties, being pent up in such a manner, by reason of the Romans having seized upon Casilinum and Callicula, that it seemed impossible for him to make his escape. Now he found, that his own arts were put in practice against him, and that he had fallen into much the same snare he had laid for Flaminius at the lake Tbrasymentus. Fabius, in the mean time, thinking he had his enemy in his power, was making the proper dispositions for an attack the next morning. At this critical conjuncture, Hannibal, by the assistance of two thousand wild and tame oxen, with torches, faggots, and dry vine-branches, tied to their horns, and driven with ^f great violence, in the dead of the night, to the top of the hills where the Romans lay encamped, found means to gain the pass above-mentioned, which opened a way for him to Allifæ. We are told, that, before he communicated this stratagem to his general officers, he massacred five thousand Italian prisoners, to prevent its taking air by their means, as well as to hinder their joining the enemy, if his design should miscarry. By this singular contrivance, Hannibal eluded all the efforts of Fabius, and preserved both himself and his army, when they were upon the very brink of destruction. It is certainly glorious for a general to turn his very errors to his advantage, a and make them subservient to his fame. For the particulars of this stratagem we must refer our readers to the Roman history*.

As soon as day-light appeared, Hannibal observed, that his light-armed troops were advanced to the summit of the mountain, on which was the defile he had forced the Romans to abandon by the stratagem above-mentioned. Here they met with a strong body of the Romans, who had ascended the hill in the night; so that they were in danger of being all cut to pieces, especially as the enemy had found means to surround them. Upon this, Hannibal detached a party of Spaniards to bring them off, which he imagined them capable of doing, as they were more used to craggy rocks and precipices, as well as more active and nimble, than the Romans. Accordingly, the Spaniards charged the Romans with so much bravery, that they put them to flight, killed a thousand of them upon the spot, and covered the retreat of their companions in such a manner, that scarce a man was lost on this occasion†.

Hannibal, upon his arrival near the confines of Samnium, made a motion, as though his intention had been to pass through that province towards Rome; but, wheeling about on a sudden, he fell into the country of the Peligni, which he ravaged a second time. From thence he retired into Apulia, and took possession of a defenceless town called Gerion; which the inhabitants abandoned upon his approach. This is Livy's account. But, according to Polybius, who calls the place (K) Gerunium, making it about twenty-five miles distant from Luceria, it stood a siege, and was at last taken by storm. Hannibal, if we chuse to follow the same author, put all the inhabitants to the sword; but made granaries of the houses, lodged his troops under the walls, and fortified his camp with a retrenchment. From hence he sent two thirds of his army to gather in the corn of the province, which was extremely fertile, ordering them by turns to relieve daily the other third part that remained with him. This he had always drawn up in battalia, not only to protect the others, but likewise to prevent the enemy from making any attempt upon his camp. In the mean time Fabius, being sent for to Rome, left the command of the army to Minucius, his general of the horse, with orders to observe the motions of Hannibal at a proper distance; but by no means to engage him‡.

d Minucius, being of a contrary disposition to Fabius, resolved not to keep in the path, which that general had chalked out for him. Being therefore informed, that the greatest part of the Carthaginian army was dispersed over the territory of Gerunium, in order to forage, and that Hannibal himself lay encamped with the other part under the walls of that place, he took post on an eminence called Calela, in the neighbourhood of Larinum, not far from Hannibal's camp. Hannibal, receiving intelligence of the enemy's approach, recalled part of his foragers, and possessed himself of an ascent about two miles from Gerunium, imagining, that this post would enable him to secure his other foragers from all insults. The night after his arrival here, he sent two thousand of his light-armed troops to seize upon a rising ground close by the Roman camp; which they effected without opposition. But, the next morning, Minucius detached a body of his light-armed forces to dislodge them from thence; which, after a brisk action, they did, putting many of them to the sword, and dispersing the rest. Animated by this first instance of success, Minucius attacked the Carthaginian foragers, cut many of them to pieces, and, in a rencounter, had the advantage over Hannibal. These things being known at Rome, greatly sunk the credit of Fabius, and occasioned there a general condemnation of his conduct; nay, as Hannibal had artfully spared his lands in the general devastation, some began to entertain a suspicion of his having kept a secret correspondence with the Carthaginians. The people and senate of Rome however did not take the command of the army absolutely from him; but gave Minucius an equal authority with the dictator.

(K) We believe, with Gronovius, that the true name of this town was Gerunium, and consequently that Livy's text ought to be emended. This seems to appear, not only from the superior authority of Polybius, but likewise from Peutinger's table, in which the place under consideration is called Gerunium. Other reasons might be offered, were there any occasion for them (16).

After Fabius's return to the army, the two generals agreed to divide the forces, that each of them might have his separate corps, Fabius, on account of his superior skill in the military art, and that he might be able to preserve at least one part of the army, not being disposed to give his consent to an alternate command ^w.

from cutting off his colleague.

NOTHING could be more agreeable to Hannibal, than to hear of the disgrace of Fabius, whose measures he so much dreaded. He flattered himself, that the dissension between the two commanders, and the rashness of Minucius, would throw an opportunity into his hands of embarrassing the Roman affairs more than ever. He resolved therefore to lay a snare for Minucius; which fortune soon pointed out to him a method of doing. Fabius encamped on the hills, after his usual manner; and Minucius in the plain, near the Carthaginians. Hannibal in the mean time observing a small rising ground between him and Minucius, by which either might incommode the other, formed a design to make himself master of it, not doubting but this would bring on an action between them. In order to which, he laid an ambuscade of five thousand foot, and five hundred horse, divided into parties of two and three hundred men each, posted in different places near this eminence. He then commanded a body of his light-armed men to advance, and take possession of that post; which Minucius endeavouring to prevent, fell into the ambuscade, and had been cut off with all his men, if Fabius had not rushed from the hills, like a torrent, to his assistance in the critical moment, and forced Hannibal to retire. Hannibal is reported to have said on this occasion, That he had overcome Minucius, and Fabius him. Hannibal, after this action, fortified his camp, seized upon the eminence above-mentioned, drew a line round it, and then continued in a state of inaction till the following campaign ^c.

The Romans defend the Carthaginians in Spain.

DURING these transactions in Italy, Cneius Scipio, having, as we observed, conquered all the Spanish cantons from the Pyrenees to the Iberus, put his troops into winter-quarters at Tarraco. Asdrubal however, as we at the same time informed our readers, gave the Romans a considerable blow towards the close of the campaign; the consequence of which, according to Livy, was, that the Ilergetes, who had left in Scipio's hands hostages for their fidelity, declared for the Carthaginians. Scipio, being apprised of this, assembled a body of forces, and immediately invested their capital city Atbanagia. He pushed on the siege with such vigour, though in the midst of winter, that the Ilergetes found themselves obliged to have recourse to his clemency, Asdrubal being then at too great a distance to afford them speedy succours. As the principal author of the revolt was fled, Scipio was the more readily induced to pardon them. Having therefore exacted a good sum of money from them for their perfidy, and compelled them to give him new hostages for their future good behaviour, he took them again into favour. From hence he marched against the Ausetani, allies of the Carthaginians, seated near the Iberus, and sat down before their metropolis. During this siege, he drew a great body of the neighbouring Spaniards, particularly of the Lacetani, who came to the assistance of the Ausetani, into an ambuscade he laid for them, putting twelve thousand of them to the sword, and dispersing the rest. However, he could not reduce the city for the space of thirty days, on account of the rigour of the season, which was such, that the Roman engines of battery could not play upon it. At last, Amusitus, their prince, having found means to retire to Asdrubal, the garrison delivered up the place to Scipio for twenty talents of silver; after which that general moved again into his winter-quarters. In the mean time Asdrubal reinforced the squadron, his brother had left him, with ten galleys, so that it now consisted of forty-five ships of the line; and gave the command of it to one Hamilcar, an officer who had distinguished himself on various occasions. Hamilcar, pursuant to his orders, put to sea, with an intention to coast along, till he came to the mouth of the Iberus, where Asdrubal was to meet him at the head of the land-forces, that they might, in concert, begin the operations of the campaign. Scipio, receiving intelligence of their design, and at the same time hearing, that Asdrubal was already in motion, immediately fitted out a fleet of five-and-thirty sail, putting the flower of his land-forces on board. Upon his arrival near the mouth of the Iberus, he dispatched two Massilian vessels to reconnoitre the enemy, who

a brought him advice, that their Squadron of galleys actually rode at anchor in the mouth of the river; upon which he made the necessary dispositions to attack it. Asdrubal, receiving timely notice of this, drew up his army in order of battle on the shore, to assist, or at least to animate, his naval forces; but they were not able to withstand the efforts of the Romans, who, after a warm dispute, intirely defeated them, forced all the vessels on shore, killed great numbers of the seamen and marines, and carried off thirty-five galleys. From this time, the Carthaginian affairs began to wear a bad aspect in Spain.

b THE Carthaginians, receiving intelligence of this blow, equipped another fleet of seventy sail with the utmost expedition, knowing of what vast consequence it was to them to be masters of the sea. With this, according to Polybius, they put in at one of the ports of Sardinia, and proceeded from thence to Pisa; where the admiral proposed to have a conference with Hannibal. But Servilius, who commanded a Roman Squadron of an hundred and twenty galleys, prevented that intercourse, the Carthaginians thinking proper to sheer off upon his approach, and return to Carthage. Servilius, for some time, gave them chace; but finding himself not able to come up with them, he left off the pursuit, and steered his course for Cercina, a small island on the coast of the Regio Syrtica; which he laid under contribution. From thence he sailed to Cossyrus, another little island, not far from Carthage; which he easily made himself master of, and left a garrison in the town. After this he set sail c for Sicily, and arrived safe with his Squadron in the harbour of Lilybaum.

And gain several other advantages over them in Spain and Africa.

d IN the mean time Scipio made a good use of his late naval victory. He first advanced to Honosca, which he closely besieged both by sea and land, took it by storm, and levelled it with the ground. Then he made a descent in Africa, ravaged all the country about Carthage, and burnt several houses adjoining to the haven and the wall. Loaded with spoil, he departed from thence to Longuntica, where he found a vast quantity of spartum, a shrub much used in the navigating of ships, amassed by Asdrubal, which he either carried off for his own use, or burnt. Afterwards he landed a body of forces in the island Ebusus, now Yvica, plundered it, and burnt some streets of its capital city; but could not reduce the town. However, he concluded a treaty with the inhabitants of this, and the other Balearic islands. Upon the fame of these exploits, Livy tells us, an hundred and twenty different cantons of Spaniards submitted to the Romans, who penetrated as far as the Salus Castellonenfis, Asdrubal retiring before them into Lusitania, and those parts of Spain bordering upon the ocean.

The consequences of the defense in Spain.

WHILST the Carthaginian affairs were in such a melancholy situation in Spain, Asdrubal reduced to great difficulties. Mandonius, a person of distinction amongst the Ilergetes, advanced to the frontiers of some of the allies of Rome, with a design to plunder them. Scipio, being apprised of this, detached a body of three thousand Romans, with some Spanish auxiliaries, to attack him; which they did so effectually, that they overthrew him, and drove e him from those frontiers with great loss. Upon this, he applied to Asdrubal for assistance, who presently marched with all his forces to support him. Scipio, being acquainted with this motion, ordered all the Celtiberian princes in the Roman interest to assemble their forces, and fall upon the Carthaginians. In compliance with this order, they made an irruption into the Carthaginian territories with a powerful army, took three fortresses there by assault, and gave Asdrubal two notable overthrows, killing him above fifteen thousand men, and taking four thousand prisoners. Nothing further material happened in Spain this campaign, except that the two Scipios passed the Iberus, and penetrated into the Carthaginian dominions as far as the gates of Saguntum, a particular account of which has been already given.

f BUT to return to the armies in Italy: Hannibal remained quiet in his winter-quarters, till the following spring, and, before the season for action came on, had the pleasure to hear of Fabius's being recalled to Rome, upon the expiration of his office, which was limited to six months. The consuls, Cn. Servilius Geminus, and M. Atilius Regulus, who succeeded him, in all things regulated their conduct according to the model Fabius had laid down. Upon their arrival in the army, they cut off several parties of Hannibal's foragers; but declined a general action, though he made use of all the art and cunning he was master of to draw them to one. Hannibal therefore found himself so streightened for want of provisions, that he had once thoughts of retiring into Gaul; but was diverted from this design by a suspicion, ^a that such a retreat would look so much like a flight, that it might be an inducement to his allies to desert him. His safety now seemed intirely to depend upon the measures the two new consuls, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Æmilius Paulus, should pursue. If they steadily adhered to Fabius's plan of operations, he must be irrecoverably lost; whereas, by a departure from it, they might throw the game once more into his hands. His hopes were not a little raised, when he received intelligence from his spies, that Varro, in disposition and genius, nearly resembled Sempronius, Flaminius, and Minucius; that there was a perfect want of harmony betwixt him and his colleague Paulus; and that he was obtruded by the plebeians upon the senate, who had a very indifferent opinion of him. Notwithstanding therefore the Roman army this ^b year consisted of eight legions, besides the troops of their allies, in all making about eighty-six thousand effective men, he was far from desponding, especially as he believed, that however numerous it might be, two thirds of the troops composing it, being new levies, would not be capable of coping with his veterans. The event justified the sentiments he entertained, as we shall see immediately.

defeat a body of Carthaginians.

Hannibal had not only learned the true character of Varro, but likewise discovered his grand design. He had received advice, that this consul, before he left Rome, declared in public, that he would fall upon the enemy the very first opportunity, and put an end to the war; adding, that it would never be terminated, so long as ^c men of Fabius's complexion should be at the head of the Roman armies. He had not been long in the Roman camp, before one of his detachments routed a body of Carthaginians, killing seventeen hundred of them upon the spot; which greatly increased his boldness and arrogance. Hannibal considered this loss as a real advantage, not doubting but it would spur him on to a battle, which he wanted extremely; for he was reduced to such a scarcity of provisions at Gerunium, that he found it impossible to subsist there ten days longer; and the Spaniards already meditated a desertion, which could not but prove fatal to him. But his good fortune at this crisis interposed, and threw in his way an antagonist, that extricated him out of all the difficulties in which he was involved ^d.

The Roman
and Carthaginian armies meet near Can-na in Apulia.

AFTER several movements, the two armies came in sight of each other near ^d Cannæ, a village and castle of Apulia, situated on the river Aufidus. Hannibal had taken the castle, which commanded all that part of Apulia, and seized therein one of the enemies principal magazines, before the approach of the Roman army. He had likewise taken care to encamp in a smooth and open plain, proper for his cavalry, in which the main strength of his forces consisted, to act in. Paulus, considering Hannibal's great superiority in horse, was for drawing the Carthaginians to an irregular spot of ground, where the infantry might have the principal share in the action; but Varro being of another opinion, that salutary design was dropped; which proved the total ruin of the Romans. As soon as the consuls appeared, Hannibal moved towards them at the head of his horse, and began an attack with great ^e bravery; but the Romans, intermixing some of the legionaries with their light-armed troops, sustained the first shock of the enemy with much firmness, and, being duly supported by their cavalry, repulsed them with considerable loss. This a little discouraged Hannibal, especially as the night rendered him incapable of renewing the charge. However, to remove all impressions of terror, that might have seized upon his soldiers minds upon that event, he judged it expedient to re-animate them the next day by an harangue, which was to the following effect: "Return thanks to ^f the gods, said he, for having brought the enemy hither, that we may triumph over them; and, in the next place, make proper acknowledgments to me, for having forced them to come to a battle with us upon the most disadvantageous terms. After three glorious victories already won, is not the remembrance of your own actions sufficient to inspire you with courage? By your former renowned achievements, you have made yourselves masters of the open country; but another victory will put all the cities, as well as all the riches and power, of the Romans into your hands. It is not words that we stand in need of, but action; and I doubt not but, by the favour of the gods, you will soon find my promises fulfilled, and your most sanguine expectations answered." The army, receiving fresh life and vigour from this speech of their general, both by their voice and gesture,

a declared themselves to be intirely at his devotion. After which, remanding them all to their respective posts, he commanded them to be ready the next morning to enter upon action *.

HAVING already given a full and particular account of the battle of Cannæ, as well as of the dispositions of both armies at that battle, we shall here only endeavour to revive in our readers minds a general idea of that most memorable event, by reciting some of the most remarkable circumstances of it, and pointing at some of the principal causes, that determined victory to declare in favour of the Carthaginians †.

We have before observed, that Paulus was for declining an engagement, being well assured, that a state of inaction must ruin Hannibal; but not being able to prevail upon his colleague to fall in with his sentiments, he then proposed fighting the enemy on such a spot of ground, as would enable the infantry, in which the Romans were much superior to Hannibal, to have the principal share in the action; but Varro, hurried away by his rashness, and impetuosity of mind, was deaf to both these salutary proposals; and, being greatly exasperated, that a party of Numidians should dare to insult his camp, the next day of his command, he advanced into the plains of the Aufidus, to attack the Carthaginian army. This was the very thing that Hannibal wished for, who therefore moved towards him with great alacrity. He had before passed the river, and drawn up his army in order of battle at a small distance from the Romans, having posted himself in such a manner, that the (L) wind Vulturnus, which rises at certain stated times, should blow directly in the faces of the Romans during the fight, and cover them with dust. On his left he had the river

The battle of Cannæ.

† Univerſ. hiſt. vol. iv. p. 709, 711.

(L) The wind Vulturnus blew south-south-east, or south-east, and was the most common of all other winds at Capua. The old Etruscan name of that city, as we learn from Livy and others, was Vulturnus, or Vulturnum, being, in all probability, so called from its founder. This founder was undoubtedly deified by the inhabitants of his city after his death, and looked upon there, and perhaps through all Campania, as a tutelary deity. That the Etruscan inhabitants of Campania worshipped the god Vulturnus, or Vulturnus, is past all doubt, as likewise that he was a deity peculiar to them. As Capua or Vulturnum lay south-east of Etruria, it is no wonder the Etruscans should call the south-east wind, especially since it blew so frequently there, Vulturnus; and from them that name passed to the Romans. That it was an Etruscan proper name, appears both from what we have just observed, and from its beginning with the word Vul or Vol, in common with many other Etruscan proper names, viz. Volumnus, Volumna, Volta, &c. The Etruscans wrote it, in all likelihood, Ful-Turnus, or Fal-Turnus; since, instead of the V consonant, they used the Eolic digamma, as appears from the Eugubian tables; and terminated those words in E, that the Romans did in US. Let this be admitted, and it must be allowed probable, that Ful, or Fal, was a term of honour, signifying high, sublime, &c. especially as we have evinced in a former note, that this word, in the Etruscan language, had that signification. Our notion, in this particular, will appear still more agreeable to truth, if we farther consider, that all the proper names, of which this word makes one part of the composition, were either applied to deities, great men, or something which apparently bore an analogy to the foregoing signification. And as for the word Turne, or Turnus, that was a proper name of Latium in the ages preceding the Trojan war, when the language of that country agreed in many, if not most, points with the Etruscan;

and consequently it might have been a proper name in use likewise amongst the Etruscans. Be that as it will, it is certain Turan, which comes extremely near it, as consisting of the same radicals, was an Etruscan proper name, as we learn from an inscription upon an antique Etruscan patere. We own indeed, that Raphael Massani Volaterranus asserts the word Vola to have signified a city in the old Etruscan tongue, which runs counter to what we have offered; but as this assertion has nothing to support it but that writer's bare authority, which, in the point before us, is of no weight, we cannot advise our readers to pay any regard to it. That the word Fal or Ful signified high, as likewise that the old Etruscan language was at first oriental, is confirmed by the proper name Volaterra, or, as the Etruscans probably wrote it, Ful-tur, Ful-sir, Ful-tera, i. e. a height or eminence, or a height or eminence strong by its situation; which exactly answers to the situation of that place, as described by Dionysius Halicarnassensis and Strabo (17).

Zonaras observes, that the wind Vulturnus greatly contributed to the defeat of the Romans; since, till that began to blow, which, he says, was about noon, the Carthaginians had no prospect of victory. Hannibal, according to the same author, soon after he arrived upon the banks of the Aufidus, ploughed up all the sandy soil there, that, by having it more immediately exposed to the heat of the sun, clouds of dust and sand from thence might the more easily be blown into the faces of the Romans (18).

The Sirocco, answering to the Vulturnus, at present blows in several parts of Italy for many days together; and when this happens, the atmosphere is extremely heated, which renders the place most disagreeable, and sometimes almost intolerable. A Tramontana, or cold north-east wind, frequently succeeds the Sirocco; which occasions a great mortality amongst the Italians from the mal di petto, &c.

Aufidus, and placing his cavalry in the wings, he formed his main body of the Spanish and Gallie infantry, which he posted in the centre, with half the African heavy-armed foot on their right, and half on their left, on the same line with the cavalry. Having made this disposition, he caused the Spanish and Gallie infantry to move towards the enemy in such a manner, as to form a large crescent, that there might be no interval between them and the African foot, that were to support them. Asdrubal was posted on the right, Hanno on the left, and Hannibal, with his brother Mago, commanded the main body. The Africans, says Livy, seemed to be a body of Romans, Hannibal having been enabled to arm them after the Roman manner by the spoils taken from the enemy in the battles of Trebia, and the lake Thrasymenus. The Gauls and Spaniards used the same sort of shields; but their swords were different, those of the Spaniards being short, and well-pointed, fit either to cut or thrust; whereas those of the Gauls were long and broad, designed for a downright cutting blow. The Gauls were naked from their waist upwards, and thereby rendered capable of giving a blow with the greater force. The Spaniards were clad in white linen-cassocks, bordered with purple, after the manner of their country; which strange habits, together with the vast size of body these nations were eminent for, exhibited an appearance, that not a little intimidated the Romans. Five hundred Numidians came over in a body to the Romans, with their shields thrown behind their backs, in the form of deserters, before the beginning of the action. Upon their arrival at the Roman camp, they dismounted, and laid down all their arms, except the swords they had concealed under their coats of mail. The consuls had not then time to examine them; and therefore Varro ordered them to be placed behind the army, till the conclusion of the engagement. Here they remained quiet, till the dispute grew very warm, when the Romans were so pressed on all sides, that they could not observe them; but then, supplying themselves with the bucklers, that lay scattered on the field of battle amongst the heaps of the slain, and making use of their own swords, they attacked the enemy's rear, killing many, and striking the rest of the Romans posted there with the greatest terror. Thus Hannibal, by this refined artifice, found means to lay an ambuscade for the enemy in a plain, and behind their backs, when such a stratagem seemed absolutely impracticable. The consular army was disposed much in the same manner as in other engagements: Paulus commanded the right wing, Varro the left, and the proconsuls, Marcus Attilius and Cneius Servilius, the main body. The signal of battle being given, both armies moved with great ardour to the attack; but the wind Vulturnus blew so strongly in the faces of the Romans, that they had their eyes filled with dust, and could scarce see the enemy. After the light-armed troops had engaged, Asdrubal, at the head of the Spanish and Gallie horse in the left wing, charged the Roman in the right wing, commanded by Paulus, with such fury, that, after a warm dispute, he broke and dispersed them; and having left, to pursue the scattered squadrons, only such forces as were necessary to prevent them from rallying, he advanced to the relief of the main body. Paulus, being wounded, at the first onset, by a Balearic slinger, found himself obliged to dismount; which induced the cavalry under his conduct to do the same. Hannibal, observing this motion, is reported to have said, I would much rather the consul had delivered his men to me bound, intimating thereby, that he looked upon them now as in his power, and himself as sure of victory. Nor can it be doubted but that this accident was of fatal consequence to the Roman cavalry posted in the right wing. In the mean time the Spanish and Gallie infantry, forming the large crescent above-mentioned, being hotly charged by the Roman legions, after a brave resistance, by Hannibal's direction, gave ground, and retired through the interval they had left in the centre of the line. The Romans pursued them with the utmost eagerness and confusion, as Hannibal had foreseen; whereupon the African infantry, which was fresh, well-armed, and in good order, wheeled about on a sudden towards that void space, in which the Romans, who were already fatigued, had thrown themselves in disorder, and attacked them vigorously on both sides, without allowing them either space or time to form themselves. Whilst matters were in this situation, Asdrubal, with his victorious horse, coming up, charged the rear of the Roman infantry, which, being pushed on all sides by the enemy's horse and foot, was at last almost intirely cut to pieces, after having fought with unparalleled bravery. Two quæstors, twenty-one military tribunes, many who had either been consuls or prætors, Minucius, late general of the horse to Fabius, Servilius, one of the proconsuls that com-

- a manded the main body, and the consul Æmilius Paulus, all fell in the action, covered with wounds and glory. Neither did the left wing of the Roman army meet with a much better fate; for Asdrubal, according to some authors hinted at by Polybius, before he advanced to the relief of the main body, by reinforcing the right wing under Hanno, enabled the Numidian cavalry posted there intirely to defeat it. Varro, the author of this terrible destruction, escaped to Venusia, with only seventy horse, being soon after joined by three hundred of the allies. Of the ten thousand men left by Paulus to guard the camp, immediately after the battle, two thousand were put to the sword, and the rest surrendered at discretion. In fine, very few of the Romans escaped either the carnage or captivity. Hannibal, upon a review of his forces after
- b the battle, found, that he had lost only four thousand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and about two hundred horse. Such was the defeat at Cannæ, the greatest the Romans had hitherto ever received *.

Causes of the defeat the Romans received there.

- THE superiority of the Carthaginians in horse must be allowed to have been the principal cause of this terrible overthrow. Hannibal's army consisted of ten thousand horse, and forty thousand foot; whereas the Roman cavalry did not exceed six thousand, though, in the consular army, the infantry amounted to eighty thousand men. The strange and astonishing figure made by the Spaniards and Gauls, together with the activity of the former, and fierceness of the latter, did not a little contribute towards throwing the enemy into confusion, as is even allowed by Livy himself.
- c The body of Numidians, that attacked the Roman rear, and the accident, which attended Paulus's wound above-mentioned, were also of singular service to Hannibal on that auspicious day the battle of Cannæ was fought. The confidence the Carthaginian troops reposed in Hannibal, looking upon him as a general absolutely invincible, likewise animated them to a prodigious degree, and consequently enabled them to exert themselves in a most extraordinary manner. Hannibal did his utmost to inspire them with a contempt of the Romans on all occasions; which had the desired effect. We are told, that when Mago, whom he had sent to view the enemy, assured him, that the Romans were extremely numerous, he replied, As numerous as they are, I give thee my word, brother, thou canst not find one amongst them,
- d whose name is Mago. And having thus said, he burst out into a great laughter, as did all the general officers that attended him; which induced the soldiers to believe, that he thought himself sure of victory, and of course so raised their spirits, that nothing could stand before them. The arming his Africans in the Roman manner was also a wise expedient made use of by Hannibal, as it enabled those troops to attack and resist the Romans in their own way, and, of course, not a little conduced to the victory. These, we say, and many more concurring causes of the defeat at Cannæ, might be produced, and expatiated upon; but we think it sufficient barely to have touched upon the circumstances here mentioned, not at the same time forgetting to observe, that Hannibal himself, by the wise disposition of his forces, by his singular address, presence of mind, vigilance, and personal bravery, during the heat of the action, contributed more towards this unparalleled overthrow, than all the other concurring causes that can be assigned *.

- THE immediate consequence of this victory, as Hannibal had foreseen, was a disposition of that part of Italy, called The old province, Magna Græcia, Tarentum, Arpi, and part of the territory of Capua, to submit to him. The neighbouring provinces likewise discovered an inclination to throw off the Roman yoke; but had a mind to see, whether Hannibal was absolutely in a condition to protect them, before they declared themselves. All the Carthaginian officers, except Maberbal, advised Hannibal to give his troops some repose after the great fatigues and hard service they had lately gone
- f through; but Maberbal, on the contrary, pressed him to take directly the route to Rome at the head of his horse, promising him, that, within five days, they should sup in the capitol. Hannibal answered, That he deserved commendation for the ardour he shewed; but that an affair of such importance required mature deliberation. To whom Maberbal replied, "I perceive the gods have not endued the same person
- " with all shining talents. You know, Hannibal, how to conquer; but not how “ to make the best use of a victory.” Livy (M) seems to fall in with Maberbal’s ^a notion, and looks upon Hannibal as guilty of a capital error on this occasion ; but others, as we have elsewhere taken notice, entertained different sentiments of this point of that renowned general’s conduct ; for which, besides those already mentioned, they assign the following reasons : 1. Hannibal was one of the most consummate generals antiquity ever produced ; a vast military genius ; a person of the greatest prudence, forecast and penetration, as the whole series of his actions, as well as the character of him, that may be gathered from the Roman writers themselves, prejudiced as they were, clearly demonstrates. It is therefore highly improbable, that, in this single instance, he should either have failed to make choice of the best expedients, or been wanting in readiness to put his designs in execution. 2. They are disposed to judge ^b favourably of him from the authority, or, at least, the silence, of Polybius, who, speaking of the memorable consequences of this famous battle, says, that the Carthaginians believed they should possess themselves of Rome at the first assault ; but he gives us no room to suppose, that such a project was feasible, nor that Hannibal did wrong in not attempting to put it in execution. 3. That as his infantry, before the battle of Cannæ, did not amount to above forty thousand men, he had not strength sufficient to undertake the siege of Rome, especially as that city was very populous, strongly fortified, and defended by a garrison of two legions. This will appear in a stronger light, if we consider, that his infantry must have been considerably weakened by the loss he sustained in the action at Cannæ, which amounted, on their part only, to ^c five thousand five hundred men. 4. Hannibal was destitute of battering-engines, ammunition, and all things necessary for the carrying on of a siege ; and consequently, on this account, as well as the paucity of his troops, he must have been incapable of attacking in form so large a city as Rome. In proof of what is here advanced, it may be observed, that, for want of the necessaries above-mentioned, even after his victory at the lake Thrasymenus, he miscarried in his attempt upon Spoletum, a town of no great strength ; and after this at Cannæ, was forced to raise the siege of Casilinum, a little inconsiderable city. 5. Not any of the Italian nations had yet declared for him ; so that, had he miscarried in the attempt, he must have been utterly ruined. These reasons, with others that might be offered, seem to render dubious the opinion ^d of those, who have espoused Maberbal’s side of the question ⁱ.

Capua.

WHEN Hannibal had thoroughly pillaged the Roman camp, he thought proper to march into Samnium, being informed, that the Hirpini, and other neighbouring nations, were disposed to enter into an alliance with the Carthaginians. He first advanced to Compsa, which opened its gates to him, and admitted a Carthaginian garrison. In this place he left his heavy baggage, as well as the immense plunder he had amassed. After which, ordering his brother Mago, with a body of troops destined for that purpose, to possess himself of all the fortresses of that country, he moved into Campania, the most delicious province of Italy. The humanity Hannibal had all along shewn the Italian prisoners, as well as the fame of the complete victory lately ^e obtained, wrought so powerfully upon the Lucani, Brutii, and Apulians, that they expressed an eager desire of being taken under his protection ; nay, even the Campanians themselves, a nation more obliged to Rome than any in Italy, except the Latins, being strangely affected with the gallant behaviour and good fortune of Hannibal, discovered an inclination to abandon their natural friends ; of which the Carthaginian general receiving intelligence, he bent his march towards Capua, not doubting but that, by means of the popular faction which then prevailed there, he should easily make himself master of that important place ^k.

And has that city surrendered to him.

SOME of the leading men in Capua had offered to deliver the city into Hannibal’s hands immediately after the battle of the lake Thrasymenus ; which induced that ^f general to march his army to their frontiers, instead of advancing to Rome, as some

(M) Most of the Roman historians follow Livy in this particular, though this adds no weight to that author’s notion. Zonaras tells us, that Hannibal himself was so chagrined afterwards at his conduct on this occasion, that he fell into a deep melancholy, often crying out in a doleful tone, O Cannæ ! Cannæ ! However, Zonaras’s authority is not capable of overthrowing the reasons offered to prove this improbable (19).

a think he might have done; tho', at that time, he was so narrowly watched by Fabius, that his partizans in Capua could not find an opportunity of executing the design they had formed. But, at the present juncture, the popular faction bearing an absolute sway in the city, and being intirely at the devotion of one Pacuvius Calavius, an ambitious nobleman, on account of his known attachment to Hannibal, the Carthaginian party put themselves again in motion. Calavius having, by artful management, brought the senate under the power of the populace, and prevented the latter from massacring the former, as they intended to do, by this means united the whole city in favour of the Carthaginians; and the battle of Cannæ happening soon after this union was effected, Calavius thought he might, without any obstruction, introduce them into the city. However, three hundred Capuan youths being at that time serving the Romans in Sicily, it was agreed to send a deputation to Varro, to learn the situation of the Roman affairs, that they might not only go upon sure grounds, but likewise have an opportunity of obliging the parents of the above-mentioned youths, by getting them out of the hands of the Romans. Varro continued still to act in character, that is, with the utmost imprudence; for he represented the Roman state as unable to support itself, much less to furnish them with the necessary succours; and therefore advised them to make war upon the Carthaginians with their own forces, that, by such a seasonable diversion, they might administer some relief to their old and faithful friends. This ill-judged representation and advice made such an impression upon the deputies, that, when they returned home, they advised their fellow-citizens immediately to conclude a treaty with Hannibal. They therefore entered into an alliance with him upon the following conditions: That the Campanians should be governed by their own laws; that the Carthaginians should not arrogate to themselves the least dominion in Capua, but live there upon the foot of friends; and lastly, that Hannibal should give them three hundred Roman prisoners, such as they should chuse, to be exchanged with the same number of Capuan youths in the service of Rome. One Decius Magius however, a person of distinction in the city, did his utmost to obstruct the negotiation, by reminding his countrymen of the fatal consequence of changing old friends with new ones, from the example of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines; nay, when the Carthaginian troops were about to enter the town, he would fain have prevailed upon his countrymen to sally out upon them, and cut them to pieces, that they might thereby have made some sort of reparation to the Romans for the great injury offered them. Hannibal was so incensed at this conduct of Magius, that he insisted upon having him delivered into his hands; which being granted, he put him on board a ship, in order to send him to Cartage; but being driven by stress of weather into the port of Cyrene, Ptolemy Philopater took him under his protection. Perolla, the son of Calavius, likewise for some time expressed a great aversion to Hannibal, and was even upon the point of assassinating him. However, Hannibal at last took peaceable possession of Capua, and fixed there his winter-quarters. Livy tells us, that Hannibal, in his march to Capua, passed by Neapolis, now Naples; and that a body of horse sallying out of the town upon one of the Carthaginian parties, that advanced to the walls, was drawn into an ambuscade, and almost intirely cut off, with one Hegeas, who commanded it; but that Hannibal could not form the siege of the place; which sufficiently justifies what has been hinted above. The same author likewise informs us, that Virius Sabius, one of the Campanian deputies sent to Varro, endeavoured to persuade the Capuans to a rupture with the Romans, by urging, that they had now not only a fine opportunity of shaking off the Roman yoke, but likewise of making themselves masters of all Italy; since Hannibal would undoubtedly return to Africa, when he had demolished that proud republic he had so justly contracted such an aversion to, and conclude a treaty with them upon their own terms. It was however agreed, our author goes on, that the same deputies should be dispatched to Rome, and propose this condition as the basis of a future friendship between the two cities, viz. that from thenceforth one of the consuls should be a Campanian; which was rejected with the utmost indignation, and the deputies ordered immediately to depart Rome. Marius Blossius, prætor of the city, greatly distinguished himself at Hannibal's entry into Capua, commanding the citizens, with their wives and children, in a body, to meet him at some distance from the town. The night after his entry, Hannibal invited Calavius, with his son Perolla, and Jubellius Taurus, an officer of uncommon merit, to sup with him; and the day following gave the Campanians flattering assurances of making their city the metropolis of Italy.

By these steps, and in this manner, did Hannibal make himself master of Capua; a which being an event of no small importance to him, and the boundary, as we may style it, of his great success, we could not avoid being thus explicit and particular in our account of it ^k.

The Carthaginians ravage the maritime part of Hiero's dominions.

WHILST Hannibal was pushing on the war in Italy with the utmost vigour, the state of Carthage sent two fleets to the coasts of Sicily. One of these ravaged the maritime part of Hiero's territories, because that prince was in alliance with Rome, whilst the other stood off of the islands Ægates, in order to observe the motions of the Romans. The admiral of this last squadron had orders to attack Lilybæum both by sea and land, as soon as the Romans advanced to the relief of king Hiero; of which T. Otacilius, the proprætor, being apprised, he dispatched an express to Rome for a speedy reinforcement of ships; but the senate, considering the deplorable condition the republic now was in, did not think proper to comply with his request. He therefore found himself obliged to stand upon the defensive, lest he should expose the Roman dominions in Sicily to an invasion ^l.

Hannibal cannot prevail upon the Romans to redeem their countrymen taken prisoners in the battle of Cannæ.

NOTWITHSTANDING the implacable hatred Hannibal bore the Romans, he dispatched Carthalo to Rome, to treat with the senate there about a redemption of the prisoners taken in the battle of Cannæ. Though the sum demanded for these prisoners was far from being exorbitant, the conscript fathers refused the payment of it. The reasons alledged for this refusal by the Romans, have been already given; but the true one seems to have been the extreme poverty of the Roman state at this melancholy juncture. Hannibal, upon Carthalo's return, sent all the Roman prisoners of distinction to Carthage, and treated the others in the manner by us related in a former part of this history ^m (N).

He dispatches Mago to Carthage, with an account of his great success.

Soon after Capua had made its submission, many cities of the Bruttii opened their gates to Hannibal, who ordered his brother Mago to take possession of them. Mago was then dispatched to Carthage, with the important news of the great victory obtained at Cannæ, and the happy consequences of it. Upon his arrival there, he acquainted the senate, that Hannibal had defeated six Roman generals, four of which were consuls, one dictator, and the other general of horse to the dictator; that he had engaged six consular armies, killed two consuls, wounded one, and driven another out of the field, with scarce fifty men to attend him; that he had routed the general of the horse, who was of equal power with the consuls; that the dictator was esteemed as the only general fit to command an army, merely because he had not had the courage to engage him. As a demonstrative proof of what he advanced, he produced, according to some authors, three bushels and a half of rings of Roman knights and senators. He likewise subjoined, that Capua, a city that was not only the metropolis of Campania, but, since the defeat of the Romans at Cannæ, of Italy itself, had submitted to Hannibal. For such unparalleled successes, he moved, that thanks should be returned to the immortal gods, and that an immediate reinforcement

(N) Appian and Zonaras intimate, that Hannibal sold some of the Roman captives for slaves, and slew a vast number of the meaner sort of them, with whose bodies he made a bridge over a river, which facilitated a passage for his troops. But this last instance of cruelty seems highly improbable, especially considering the partiality of the historians from whom it comes, and that it is passed over in silence by Polybius. That excellent author, amongst other things, observes, that the senate at Rome imagined, that a compliance with Hannibal's proposal would look like a tacit acknowledgment of his great superiority, and therefore declined closing with it. Livy affirms, that many of the Roman prisoners were bought of Hannibal by the Greeks; which may possibly be true. But that great numbers of them were put to a vast variety of the most exquisite tortures, purely to gratify the cruel and vindictive disposition of that general, as Eutropius suggests, will not be so easily admitted by our candid readers, for the reasons above assigned. We must beg leave to remark here, that, according to Diodorus Siculus, none of the Roman captives could be forced, by the most grievous sufferings, to lift up their hands against their friends and relations, when Hannibal would have obliged them to act the part of gladiators, for the entertainment of his troops; though Livy asserts the contrary, as will further appear from what we have extracted from that historian on this occasion, in the passage of the Universal history here referred to. The disagreement therefore of two such eminent authors, and the silence of Polybius on this head, seem to evince many, if not all, the instances of cruelty laid to Hannibal's charge at this juncture, to have been intirely fabulous (10).

- a should be sent to Hannibal, who, being in the heart of an enemy's country, wanted both men and money, especially as his troops must have greatly suffered in the various engagements they had had with the enemy. All ranks and degrees of people being struck with an extraordinary joy on this happy occasion, Himilco, the chief of the Barcan faction, fancying, that a fair opportunity of insulting Hanno now offered, addressed himself to him in the following terms: Do you still, Hanno, repent of the war we are embarked in with Rome? Forbid, by all means, the appointment of a day of thanksgiving to the immortal gods, for so many signal advantages obtained! Come, for once let us hear a Roman senator declaim in the senate-house at Carthage! Hanno, notwithstanding this provocation, without any emotion, according to Livy, replied;
- b That he still entertained the same sentiments as formerly, in relation to the war; that he should not cease blaming their invincible general's conduct, till his glorious victories had procured them a tolerable peace; that the mighty exploits, on which Hannibal's creatures expatiated so much, supposing them real, could only give him joy, in proportion as they were made subservient to such a peace; that however, as it was preposterous in Hannibal to solicit such succours, as could only be deemed necessary for a general in desperate circumstances, at the same time that he was amusing them with an account of the rapid conquests he had made, he could not help looking upon those exploits as perfectly chimerical and imaginary. Then turning to Mago and Himilco, he asked them, Whether a single member of any one of the thirty-five tribes had come over to Hannibal, or any of the Latin
- c nations declared for him, after the so-much cried-up victory at Cannæ? To which Mago answering in the negative; It is evident then, replied Hanno, that the Romans are still very strong. But, pray, what degree of courage are they inspired with? What hopes or expectations have they of carrying on the war with success, to animate them? Of which question Mago professing himself incapable of giving a proper solution; How! says Hanno; nothing can be more easy than this. Have the Romans sent ambassadors to enter into a negotiation with Hannibal? Has any mention been made of a peace at Rome? No, replied Mago. Why then I find, subjoined Hanno, we have the same happy prospect before us now, that we had the first day Hannibal entered Italy. In what a fine situation were we, when Lutatius gave us that memorable defeat off of the
- d islands Ægates, which destroyed all our hopes, and reduced us to the necessity of suing for an ignominious peace? This may be again our case; and therefore I am for concluding an advantageous peace with Rome, whilst our affairs wear a tolerable aspect, lest, upon some disaster, it should not be in our power to do so. Hanno therefore, with all his adherents, opposed the continuation of the war, and consequently voted against sending Hannibal any succours; but the majority of the senate considering this merely as the effect of prejudice and jealousy, the Barcan faction prevailed, and orders were given to furnish the army in Italy with a proper reinforcement of troops, as well as an ample supply of money and provisions. A body of forty thousand Numidians, with forty elephants, was first destined for that country; a large detachment of Spanish
- e forces was appointed to follow the Numidians; and that these last troops might be ready in due time, Mago set out immediately for Spain, to raise twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, there. The Carthaginians proposed to recruit, with these new levies, not only Hannibal's army, but that likewise which acted in Spain.

As soon as Hannibal had possessed himself of Capua, he attempted, both by promises and menaces, to make himself master of Naples; but the Neapolitans being proof against all his efforts, he advanced to Nola, and summoned that city, threatening its inhabitants with the utmost extremities, if they did not immediately surrender. The senate, at least the leading men in it, was wholly in the Roman interest; but the Carthaginians being masters of the open country, and in high reputation by the advantages they had gained, the populace was intirely at Hannibal's devotion. The former therefore, in order to carry their point, pretended to be in a disposition to surrender the city to Hannibal; but at the same time insinuated, that, before this could be done, it would be proper to come to some terms of agreement with him. Under the pretence therefore of entering into a negotiation with the Carthaginian general, the senate of Nola found means to spin out the time, and send, with all possible expedition, messengers to Marcellus, the Roman prætor, acquainting him with the situation of affairs, and that the city would be obliged to capitulate, except he instantly marched to its relief. Marcellus, leaving Capitulum, where he was then posted, advanced to Calatia; and having passed the Vulturnus, moved, with surprising celerity, through the districts of Satricula and Trebia, in order to succour Nola. Hannibal drew off upon his approach, and made a fresh attempt upon Naples; but without effect. After this, he laid siege to Nuceria, and starved it to a surrender. One of the articles of the capitulation was, that the inhabitants should be permitted to march out with all their cloaths, though disarmed. Thirty senators, and most of the people of fashion, retired to Capua; but were refused admission there, because they did not at first open their gates to Hannibal; but they met with a kind reception at Cumæ. Hannibal gave Nuceria up to his soldiers to be plundered, and afterwards burnt it. Marcellus, the Roman prætor, having thrown himself, with a body of troops, into Nola, was under no apprehension for the safety of that place, though the Carthaginian army, after the destruction of Nuceria, encamped before it. The populace ardently desired to deliver it up to Hannibal; but Marcellus prevented the Carthaginian from possessing himself of it, by gaining over to the Roman interest L. Bantius, the chief of the Carthaginian faction. This he did, partly by the force of adulation and condescension, ordering the lictors to give him admission, as often as he desired it, and partly by dint of presents, desiring him to accept of a fine horse, and five hundred bigati (O). Hannibal drew up the Carthaginian army in order of battle before the walls, as Marcellus did the Roman forces within the town. His parties had frequent skirmishes with those of the Romans, though neither side sustained any considerable loss. By his emissaries, he engaged the populace to seize upon the gates, as soon as Marcellus had sallied out of them with his whole force, as he had received intelligence the Roman general designed to do; by which means the Romans would have been hemmed in betwixt the garrison and the Carthaginian army, and consequently must all have been cut off. Marcellus, being informed of this, divided his army into three bodies, which he posted at three gates fronting the enemy; having before issued out an order, forbidding any of the citizens to stir out of their houses. Hannibal, in the mean time observing, that no parties were posted on the ramparts for their defence, immediately concluded, that his whole scheme was unravelled, and Marcellus now engaged with the citizens. He therefore ordered his scaling-ladders to be brought immediately to the walls, and began the attack. The moment this happened, Marcellus, at the head of a choice body of veterans, sallied out of the middle gate, fell upon the Carthaginians with such fury, that he put them into disorder. Hannibal, little dreaming of such a sally, with some difficulty rallied his troops, and made head against the enemy. During this conflict, the two other bodies sallied out of the other gates, and attacked the rear of the Carthaginians; which struck Hannibal with such terror, that he retired into his lines, and soon after drew off from before the town. Though the Carthaginians, even according to the Roman accounts, did not lose much above two thousand men on this occasion, yet the Romans looked upon this action, as one of the most considerable in its consequences to them, of all that happened during the whole course of the war, since it demonstrated Hannibal not to be invincible. Hannibal, advancing to Acerræ, made the proper dispositions to besiege it; but the inhabitants abandoning it, he laid it in ashes. From thence he moved to Casilinum, which he immediately invested. The garrison defended itself with inexpressible bravery; neither could Hannibal have ever made himself master of it, had not famine forced it to surrender. Before the Carthaginian general presented himself before the town, he detached a body of Gatulians, under the command of their captain Isalca, to prevail upon the inhabitants, if possible, by fair means, to receive a Carthaginian garrison; but, if this could not be

(O) The bigati, or nummi bigati, were silver pieces of money, with the figure of a chariot drawn by a pair of horses stamped upon them; and the quadrigati, or nummi quadrigati, others with that of one drawn by two pair of horses, as we learn from Pliny. According to the same author, the Phrygians invented the former kind of chariots, and Erichthonius the latter. Let this be admitted, and it will seem to follow, that the Romans had these chariots introduced amongst them by their neighbours the Etruscans, who were descended from the Lydians and Phrygians, since they were used at Rome before that city had any intercourse with the Greeks. Many Roman denarii, particularly of those coined in the times of the republic, with such images on their reverses, are to be seen in the cabinets of the curious. Tacitus, and other Roman authors, as well as Livy, mention the coins we are now treating of (21).

a effected, they had orders to attempt storming it. Isalca, upon his approach, finding a profound silence, and no enemy appearing, imagined the place to be abandoned; and therefore made the necessary preparations to force open the gates: which being observed by two cohorts that garrisoned the city, they, according to orders received, issued out in a moment, repulsed the Gatulians, and made a great slaughter of them. Maberbal afterwards assaulted it with a greater force; but was obliged to retire with considerable loss. Lastly, Hannibal himself, with his whole army, formed the siege of it; but lost abundance of men, without making any considerable progress. However, he at last found means to surround almost the whole garrison, in a sally they made, with his elephants, and cut to pieces most of them, the rest

b securing their retreat by favour of the night. The next day Hannibal, to inspire his troops with the greater ardour, promised to the soldier, who first mounted the ramparts, a golden mural crown; and declared, That it was matter of surprize to him, that an inconsiderable town, situated in a plain, should be able to baffle the efforts of that army, which took Saguntum, and defeated the Romans at Cannæ, Thrasymenus, and Trebia. Notwithstanding which, the garrison made so vigorous a defence, that he found himself obliged to turn the siege into a blockade, and, after leaving a small body of troops to guard his lines, to put his army into winter-quarters at Capua *.

It is intimated by the Roman historians, that Capua proved the destruction of Hannibal. Here it was, according to these authors, that those soldiers, who had long been inured to the greatest fatigues, and braved the most formidable dangers, were vanquished by luxury, and a flow of pleasures, with which the minds of the Capuans, who were immersed in a profusion of the most charming delights, had long been corrupted. Livy in particular intimates, that Hannibal's delicious abode at Capua was a reproach to his former conduct, and infinitely more prejudicial to his affairs, than the false step he was guilty of, in not marching directly to Rome after the battle of Cannæ; for this last error, according to that historian, might seem only to have retarded his victory; whereas the former rendered him absolutely incapable of conquering. This, we say, is the sentiment of Livy, and has been adopted by several later writers; but whether or no it is intirely agreeable to truth, will, if we

c consider things with due attention, perhaps admit of some dispute †.

The pleasure of Capua prejudicial to Hannibal.

For though we should allow, that the martial genius of the Carthaginians was impaired by the bewitching retirement at Capua, yet it cannot reasonably be supposed, that the bad success, which afterwards attended Hannibal's arms, ought to be ascribed to this, as its principal cause. The frequent defeats that general afterwards gave the Romans, the several towns he reduced in sight of the Roman armies, the bravery with which he maintained himself in Italy for fourteen years after this event, in spite of the continued efforts of the enemy, will not admit of such a supposition. But Livy himself puts this beyond dispute; that author points out to us a cause of the declension of the Carthaginian affairs in Italy, different from the delights of Capua ‡.

e We have before observed from him, that the senate and people of Carthage ordered forty thousand Numidian horse, forty elephants, and a considerable body of Spanish infantry, with a proper sum of money, to be sent to Italy, in order to enable Hannibal to maintain and extend his conquests there. Had this ample supply been sent him with an expedition equal to the spirit with which it was granted, the Romans would have had no opportunity of reflecting upon Hannibal, on account of his conduct at Capua. That general would, in all human probability, have obliged the haughty rival of the Carthaginian republic to have submitted to the superior force of his arms the next campaign. But, notwithstanding the influence of the Barcan faction, Hanno, and his adherents, found means not only to retard the march of the intended

f succours, but even to diminish them. Mago, through the artifices of that insatuated party, could obtain an order for only twelve thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse; and even with this body of troops, inconsiderable as it was, he was sent to Spain. Hannibal, being thus deserted by his country, through the intrigues of a profligate and abandoned faction, who had come to a resolution to sacrifice the state, of which they were members, to their private resentment, found himself obliged to be on the defensive, his army being reduced to twenty-six thousand foot, and nine thousand horse. As the Romans therefore, notwithstanding the difficulties they were reduced to, sent every year two consular armies into the field, fully recruited, and in good order; as neither the Gauls nor Italians were natural allies of the Carthaginians, and consequently would scarce fail of abandoning them, as soon as fortune began to declare against them; there is no need to have recourse to the pleasures of Capua, in order to account for Hannibal's being driven out of Italy.*

At the return of the spring, Hannibal drew his forces out of their winter-quarters, and resumed the siege of Capitulum. He did not however push this on with vigour, as knowing, that the place must soon surrender through want of provisions. The famine raged so grievously amongst the citizens, that they were obliged, for some time, to feed upon the most loathsome animals. Valerius Maximus tells us, that one of them gave another a hundred Roman denarii for a single mouse; which supported him, till Hannibal granted the garrison a capitulation; but the person who sold it, in the mean time, perished with hunger. Pliny and Frontinus affirm, that this mouse was purchased with two hundred Roman denarii; and with these authors Livy, in the main, agrees. Marcellus, not being able to attempt raising the siege, by reason of an inundation of the Vulturnus, the troops in garrison were forced to have recourse to Hannibal's clemency, who, induced thereto by their brave defence, permitted them to march out of the town, upon the freemens paying seven ounces of gold a head. Livy says, that, till the gold was paid, the Carthaginian general kept them in chains; but afterwards, with great honour, conducted them to Cuma. Of the Prænestine garrison, which, at the beginning of the siege, consisted of five hundred and seventy men, near one half arrived safe at Præneste, with their prætor Manilius, the rest having been destroyed by sickness, famine, and the other casualties of war. Hannibal restored Capitulum to the Campanians, leaving there a Carthaginian garrison of seven hundred men, to defend the place against the Romans, in case they should think proper, after his departure, to attack it. Then, to complete the reduction of that part of Italy, in conjunction with the greatest part of the Bruttii, he laid siege to Petilia, the only city of that nation, which held out against him. The Petilini immediately applied to the Romans for succours in the most pressing manner; but the perplexed state of affairs would not permit the republic to assist them. Notwithstanding which, they defended themselves for several months against the reiterated attacks of the whole Carthaginian army, with incredible bravery and resolution†.

affairs in Spain

DURING these transactions in Italy, the war was carried on with great vigour in Spain. For some time Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general there, kept himself upon the defensive, not being in a condition to face either the Roman fleet under Publius Scipio, or the land-forces commanded by Cneus. However, at last receiving a reinforcement of four thousand foot, and five hundred horse, from Carthage, he ventured to move out of the fastnesses, wherein he had before posted himself, and advanced towards the enemy's camp. He likewise gave orders to have his fleet repaired, to protect the maritime parts of the Carthaginian provinces, and the islands adjacent to them, from all insults of the enemy; but, before this was in a condition to put to sea, he received intelligence, that several captains of ships had gone over to the Romans. These captains, it seems, had been severely reprimanded for abandoning the fleet upon the Iberus, through cowardice, the last year; which they not being able to brook, had, from that time, meditated a revolt from the Carthaginians. Not content with what they had already done, they endeavoured to excite the Carpestii to a defection; in which they so far succeeded, that several towns were drawn off from their obedience to the Carthaginians, and another, that refused to join them, reduced by force. This unexpected rebellion proved very prejudicial to Asdrubal, and a seasonable diversion in favour of the Romans; for the Carthaginian general, leaving the Romans to themselves, advanced, at the head of his whole army, into the enemy's territories, with a design to attack Galbus, the Carpestian general, who lay encamped under the walls of the town he had lately possessed himself of. He therefore first sent away his light-armed troops to reconnoitre the rebels, and draw them to an engagement, detaching immediately afterwards part of his infantry to ravage the neighbouring country, and cut off all the straggling parties of the enemy, that should be found dispersed there; by which means many of the Carpestii were killed, others put to flight, and their camp alarmed at the same time. However,

- a their forces being very numerous, they were so far from being terrified at this motion, that they instantly issued out of their camp in a body, dancing and skipping after their manner, with an intention to fall directly upon the Carthaginians. This sudden instance of courage so damped the spirits of Asdrubal's main body, with which he was advancing to attack Galbus's camp, that he thought proper to take post on an eminence, in itself of difficult access, but rendered more so by a river, which secured him from the enemy. Here he was rejoined by the two above-mentioned detachments, equally struck with terror at the enemy's approach; nay, under such terrible apprehensions were the Carthaginians at this juncture, that, notwithstanding their camp might have been looked upon as inaccessible, Asdrubal fortified it with an
- b intrenchment, in order to cover it the more effectually from all attempts of the barbarians. Some skirmishes happened whilst the two armies lay so near one another; but without any considerable loss on either side. Livy tells us, that the Numidian cavalry were not so good as the Carpesian; nor the Mauritanian dartmen as the Carpesian targeteers; who, in activity, were equal to them, and in strength, as well as courage, excelled them. Galbus, finding it impossible either to draw the enemy out of their camp, or force the intrenchment that covered it, seized upon Afena, a town where Asdrubal had fixed his principal magazine, when he first entered upon the Carpesian frontiers, and easily made himself master of the open country round about it. Asdrubal, finding the enemy, not a little elated with their late success, soon after to
- c disperse themselves in small parties over the country, and to lay aside all discipline, both in their detachments and their camp, advanced out of his trenches, with his army drawn up in order of battle, and immediately fell upon them. The Carpesians, not expecting so sudden an onset, being in confusion, and having a good part of their forces then roving about the country, were easily routed by the Carthaginians, who continued the slaughter a great part of the day. In fine, the whole body of the barbarians in the camp, except a small party, that escaped, by a vigorous sally, to the mountains and woods, was put to the sword; which threw the Carpesii into such a consternation, that the next day the whole nation submitted to Asdrubal. Soon after a courier arrived from Carthage, with orders to Asdrubal to begin his march
- d for Italy without delay. This changed the face of affairs in Spain; for the Spaniards, upon the publication of this news, considered the Carthaginians as not in a condition to protect them; and of course began to turn their eyes towards the Romans. Asdrubal therefore dispatched an express to Carthage, giving the republic an account how prejudicial the bare rumour of his departure had been to it; at the same time adding, that if the late orders were put in execution, the Romans would be masters of Spain, before he had passed the Iberus. To support what he advanced, he declared, that after he had drawn the forces assigned him out of the Carthaginian provinces there, neither garrisons nor a general would be left capable of giving any opposition to the Romans; that, besides this, the natives were not well affected to the Carthaginians;
- e and that therefore it would be at least proper for him to defer his march, till a successor arrived in Spain, with a strong body of forces, to preserve the Carthaginian acquisitions there; since, whatever success might attend their arms against the Romans, the disposition of the Spaniards themselves would require no small number of troops to be distributed amongst them. But, notwithstanding this just remonstrance, the state of Carthage persisted in its former resolution, looking upon it as a matter of the utmost consequence to support Hannibal. However, it so far complied with Asdrubal's request, as to send Himilco, with a competent army, and a considerable naval reinforcement, into Spain, to watch the motions of both the natives and the Romans.
- f Himilco, having transported his forces to Spain, took care immediately to put himself into a situation not to fear any insults of the Spaniards. He fortified his camp, drew his ships on shore, and surrounded them with a ditch and a wall. After this, he hastened with the utmost expedition through the territories of several cantons, either open enemies to the Carthaginians, or disposed to be so, to Asdrubal's camp, escorted by a choice detachment of horse. After he had imparted the orders of the senate to that general, and received from him instructions how to carry on the war in Spain, he returned to his own camp in safety, the extreme celerity, with which he posted through the territories of the above-mentioned Spanish cantons, not giving any of them an opportunity of discovering him. Before Asdrubal began his march for

Italy,

Italy, he furnished himself with large sums of money, which he exacted from the a Spaniards subject to, and in alliance with Cartbage, being sensible, that Hannibal could never have reached the Alps, had he not been powerfully supported by gold. At last, having got all things in readiness for the enterprize he was going upon, he assembled all his forces, and advanced to the Iberus. In the mean time he received intelligence, that the Romans, apprised of his approach, had laid siege to Ibera, a town deriving its name from the river on which it stood, and the richest in all that part of Spain. To induce them therefore to raise that siege, he sat down before another town, which had lately submitted to the Romans. This had the desired effect; for the Romans, leaving Ibera, immediately moved towards him, and encamped upon a spot about five miles distant from him. The consequence of this action was a decisive battle, wherein Asdrubal gave proofs of an extraordinary military genius, though fortune declared against him. The Spaniards in his army, not relishing an Italian expedition, took to their heels at the first onset; the Mauritanian and Numidian horse made but a faint resistance; so that the rout was general, and the slaughter dreadful. Asdrubal did all that could be expected from the most consummate general; he continued to give his orders with the greatest presence of mind, and to animate his men by his example, till all things became desperate; but, not being able to rally his troops, he found himself obliged to leave the field of battle and his camp to the enemy, together with the vast sums of money he had amassed for the Italian expedition. According to Eutropius and Orosius, the Carthaginians had twenty-five thousand men killed, and ten thousand taken prisoners, in the action. Zonaras intimates, that Cneus was so posted with a body of troops, that very few of the Carthaginians found it possible to make their escape. After this blow, all the Spaniards, who had before been wavering in their fidelity to Cartbage, declared for the victors. Asdrubal, in the mean time, collecting the remains of his shattered army, was so far from being in a condition to attempt succouring Hannibal, that, with great difficulty, he maintained himself in Spain ^u.

Livy partial in his relation of the transactions in Spain.

OUR readers will easily perceive, that this account of the Spanish affairs, during the period we are now upon, is chiefly extracted from Livy; though they may at the same time discover, that we have inserted several circumstances not taken notice of by that historian, with which we have been supplied by other antient writers. They are not therefore to be surpris'd, if they should meet with several improbabilities, and even inconsistencies, in the relation; since Livy must be allowed to have been most unreasonably prejudiced against the Carthaginian republic, as well as in favour of his own. Fabius Pictor, Valerius Antias, and others, from whom he compiled his history, were of the same disposition with himself in this particular. What truth therefore can be expected from them in a description of any great transactions, wherein the Carthaginians bore a principal part? The improbabilities and inconsistencies just hinted at are so glaring, that they cannot escape the eye of any attentive reader; for which reason it is superfluous, would the nature of our design permit, to recite them. However, thus much is apparent from what the above-mentioned authors have transmitted to posterity in the point before us, viz. that the defeat of Asdrubal, in a great measure, ruined Hannibal's affairs in Italy, though it was not attended with such fatal consequences in Spain as Livy suggests. That historian himself puts this last observation beyond dispute, in some subsequent parts of his work. How greatly then are we to regret the loss of that part of Polybius's excellent history treating of these campaigns in Spain! This, had it been extant, would undoubtedly have set us right in every important particular relating to them. But to return to the Carthaginian affairs in Italy ^w:

The Carthaginians reduce Petilia.

Himilco, who commanded the Carthaginian forces before Petilia, carried on the siege of that place with great vigour, battering the walls with the utmost fury, and harassing the garrison by continual assaults. However, the Petilian defended themselves in a very gallant manner, destroying great numbers of the besiegers, though they were but a handful of men. But what not a little contributed to the defence of the place, was the bravery of the women, who distinguished themselves as much as the men on this occasion. They made frequent sallies, burnt the enemy's works, and then retired triumphantly into the town. Notwithstanding which, Hannibal, having cut off all communication betwixt them and the neighbouring country, they

a were so greatly pressed by famine, that they found themselves obliged to send all the useless people out of the city, who, according to Appian, were immediately butchered by the Carthaginians in the sight of the garrison. At last, they resolved to make a sally with their whole force, which they accordingly did; but the greatest part of them, through hunger and fatigue, not having strength enough either to make use of their arms, or retire into the town, were put to the sword. However, eight hundred of them cut their way through the enemy, and escaped in a body to the Romans, who, after the conclusion of this war, reinstated them in their former possessions, and always took care to distinguish them by such marks of esteem, as their singular fidelity intitled them to ¹.

b AFTER the reduction of Petilia, Hannibal, having been rejoined by Himilco's detachment, advanced to Consentia; which soon surrendered to him. Locri opened its gates upon the first summons, the principal citizens having, for some time, kept a secret correspondence with the Brutii, who had united themselves with the Carthaginian army. Croton, which was, in a manner, deserted by its inhabitants, and several other cities of Magna Græcia, did the like. Rhegium, though attacked by Hannibal with all his forces, held out bravely, and baffled all the efforts of the Carthaginians. Sicily in the mean time wavered in its fidelity to the Romans, the defeat at Cannæ giving it such an idea of the Carthaginian power, that it could not avoid discovering an inclination to follow the example of the Italians. Even the family of Hiero was not intirely free from this disposition; for Gelon, the heir apparent to the crown of Syracuse, despising Hiero's old age, declared for Hannibal; and had not death taken him off so opportunely, that Hiero himself was suspected of hastening his late, he might have made a powerful diversion in favour of the Carthaginians ².

Zonaras intimates, that somewhere about the period we are now upon, the dictator Junius, with a powerful corps, attended Hannibal, and mimicked all his motions. He encamped, decamped, refreshed his troops at the same time, and in the same manner, the subtle Carthaginian did; insomuch that the movements of both armies corresponded in every particular. Hannibal, observing this, immediately began to consider, how he might reap some advantage from the whimsical conduct of the dictator. He was not long at a loss for a stratagem on this occasion: the first dark, tempestuous night that happened, he detached a good body of forces out of his camp, ordering them to take post in some place at a small distance from it, and to harass the Romans all night with continual skirmishes and alarms, if Junius made the same movement. With the other part of the army he reposed himself in the camp till morning, and then recalled the above-mentioned detachment, commanding every man of it immediately to take his natural rest. This artifice, according to our author, had the desired effect; for Junius, at the beginning of the night, observing a large body of troops to march out of Hannibal's camp, and perceiving every thing there still afterwards, imagined the whole Carthaginian army to have been in motion; and therefore drew all the forces out of his own camp, to observe the enemy. The commander of the Carthaginian detachment, in pursuance of his orders, kept the Romans in action the whole night, and then retired into the camp, to repose his troops. Upon Junius's doing the same, Hannibal, with his fresh corps, fell upon the wearied Romans, now asleep, and not dreaming of any attack, forced their camp, put great numbers of them to the sword, and dispersed the rest. The darkness of the night, as well as the tempestuous weather, did not a little contribute to the happy success of this stratagem, since the Roman general was thereby rendered incapable, either of discovering the number, or penetrating the design, of the Carthaginians ³.

f IN the mean time a courier arrived at Carthage from the army in Spain, with letters from Asdrubal, importing, that he had received a total defeat, and that the greatest part of Spain had revolted to the Romans. The senate and people were thunder-struck at this melancholy advice, which, for the present, disconcerted all their measures. Mago was upon the point of setting out for Italy, with a reinforcement of twelve thousand foot, fifteen hundred horse, and twenty elephants, besides a pecuniary supply of a thousand talents in silver; but his departure, upon the reception of this mortifying news, was countermanded, and he ordered to hold himself in readiness to embark for Spain at a minute's warning. Carthage, ambassadors arrived there from Sardinia, inviting the Carthaginians, in the name of Harfiscora, who, at that time, bore the chief sway there, and the other Sardinian prime nobility, to send over a body of troops, in order to take possession of that island. These ambassadors insinuated, That the Romans had scarce any forces there; that the prætor Cornelius, a person of distinguished merit, had left the island; that a new one, perfectly raw and unacquainted with the genius of the Sardi, as well as their manners and constitution, was expected; that the Sardi were tired of the Roman government, and extremely incensed against their imperious and avaritious masters, for their grievous exactions the last year; in fine, that nothing was wanting to induce them to shake off the Roman yoke, but an encouragement thereto from some powerful state, that would take them under its protection. This embassy a little revived the drooping spirits of the Carthaginians, who thereupon immediately sent Mago to Spain with the abovesaid succours, and dispatched Asdrubal, surnamed Calvus, with the like number of forces to support the Sardi.

Hannibal concludes a treaty with Philip king of Macedon.

WHILST the two potent republics of Carthage and Rome were thus contending for superiority, the eyes of all the neighbouring states were fixed upon them. Amongst the rest, Philip, king of Macedon, had observed, with great attention, the progress of this war. This, in point of prudence, he thought himself obliged to, as he was a neighbour to Italy, being separated from it only by the Ionian sea. At first, he was equally inclined to both parties; but finding Hannibal the favourite of fortune, he came to a resolution to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with the Carthaginians. To this end he sent an embassy, with Xenophanes, one of his ministers, at the head of it, to Hannibal's camp in Campania. This embassy happened to fall into the hands of the Romans, and was conducted to the prætor Valerius Levinus, in his camp at Nuceria; but Xenophanes, by his address, pretending he came to propose a treaty of friendship to the Romans, found means to pursue his route; and, upon arriving at Hannibal's head-quarters, concluded a treaty with him, which, together with the preamble to it, was couched in the following terms: “ Copy of the “ treaty concluded between Hannibal, general of the Carthaginian army, Mago, Africanus, Barmocar, all the senators of Carthage, together with the whole body of forces
“ then present, on the one side; and Xenophanes, son of Cleomachus, an Athenian, “ minister plenipotentiary of Philip, son of Demetrius, king of Macedon, the Macedonian nation, and their allies, on the other. The articles of this treaty are “ agreed upon in the most solemn manner by both the contracting powers, in the “ presence of Jupiter, Juno, and Apollo; of the Dæmon of Carthage, Hercules, and “ Iolaus; of Mars, Triton, and Neptune; of those divinities who are confederates “ with Carthage; of the Sun, Moon, and Earth; of the Rivers, Meadows, and “ Waters; of the tutelary deities of Carthage, Macedon, and Greece; and lastly, of “ those deities, who, presiding in war, assist at, and superintend, the signing of the “ present treaty. Hannibal, general of the Carthaginian forces, the senators above-“ mentioned, and the whole Carthaginian army, declare this, according to the “ mutual intention of both parties, to be a treaty of amity, by virtue of which the “ contracting powers are, from henceforth, obliged to treat each other as friends “ and brethren. In consequence therefore of this convention, king Philip, the Macedonian nation, and the Greeks their allies, engage themselves to defend and support, to the utmost of their power, the lords the Carthaginians (P), Hannibal “ their general, all the senators and forces with him, all governors of provinces under “ the dominion of Carthage, who govern by the same laws, the people of Utica, and “ all other cities and nations subject to the Carthaginian empire; all who bear arms

(P) We have translated here the ΟΙ ΚΥΡΙΑΙΟΙ ΚΑΡΧΗΔΟΝΙΟΙ of Polybius, the lords the Carthaginians, and not the Carthaginian lords; since the last expression seems to refer only to the senate and the suffetes; whereas the former includes likewise the people, who, at the signing of this treaty, were the most powerful part of the republic of Carthage; and that this alliance was concluded by Philip's ministers with the whole republic of Carthage, not with the senate and suffetes, in exclusion of the plebeians, no one can doubt. So we see in the treaty of Utrecht, to omit several others of late date, the states general are styled the lords the states general. However, we do not pretend to insist upon the truth of this translation, only offer it as a conjecture to our learned readers, leaving it to them either to admit of it, or reject it, as they shall think proper (22).

- d THIS copy of the articles of the offensive and defensive alliance concluded betwixt the Carthaginians and Philip king of Macedon, preserved to us by Polybius, is a most curious and valuable fragment of antiquity, as serving not only to give us a good idea of the most noted objects of the Carthaginian worship, but likewise to exhibit to our view the form and manner in which that nation drew up their treaties; for it appears pretty plain from Polybius, that the Carthaginians were looked upon as the chief party concerned in this engagement; and that the preparing of the instrument we have given our readers here a translation of, was intirely left to Hannibal. It likewise further appears, that Livy has not so much given us the articles of this treaty, as certain inferences and conclusions drawn from those articles, some of which were, e in all probability, false, taken from Fabius Pictor, Valerius Antias, and others, who,
 in few particulars relating to the Carthaginians, paid the greatest regard to truth.
 For these reasons, we could not prevail upon ourselves to omit the insertion of a translation of the copy above-mentioned in this work, which, we doubt not, will oblige all the curious and inquisitive among of our readers c.

- WHEN the Macedonian ambassadors returned home, Hannibal sent three ministers Philip's embaf-sadors intercepted by the Romans. with them, viz. Gisco, Bostar, and Mago, in order to bring him king Philip's ratification of the above-mentioned treaty. They had a vessel waiting for them, privately stationed near the temple of Juno Lacinia in Calabria; but were scarce got out to sea, when they were descried by the Romans. Some light galleys of Corcyra, f being detached from the Roman squadron, then cruising off the coasts of Calabria, soon came up with them, and obliged the vessel they were on board immediately to surrender. In this emergency, Xenophanes had recourse to another falshood, asserting, That all the passes and high ways in Campania were so guarded by the Carthaginian parties, that he found it impossible to go to Rome, as he was ordered, but without effect; for the Carthaginian ministers were betrayed by their language and habits, by which means the Romans discovered the whole secret, sent both the Carthaginian and Macedonian ambassadors prisoners to Rome, and diverted the impending storm this formidable league threatened them with, in the manner related by us in a former part of this history ^d.

The Carthaginian affairs go to decay both by sea and land.

ABOUT this time Hannibal received intelligence, that the Campanians, who had assembled an army of fourteen thousand men to act in favour of the Carthaginians, had been intirely defeated by Gracchus at Hamæ, to which place they had advanced, in order to seize upon Cumæ, with the loss of above two thousand men, together with Marius Alfius their commander, and thirty-four colours. He therefore, without loss of time, marched to Hamæ; but, upon his arrival there, found only the carcasses of the Campanians who fell in the last action, with which the ground was strewed, the enemy having retired, immediately after the battle, to Cumæ. For the present, Hannibal re-occupied his former camp upon mount Tifata; but, at the solicitation of the Campanians, after having ravaged all the country about Cumæ, he laid siege to that city. Having applied a high moveable tower to the walls of the place, he made a vigorous assault; but the Roman consul, who had thrown himself into the town, having raised one upon the walls, that overtopped this, and posted some men in it, who discharged a great number of flaming torches, besides a vast quantity of other combustible materials set on fire, upon the besiegers, the Carthaginians were put into disorder; which being observed by the garrison, a strong party sallied out of the town, put them to the rout, and pursued them as far as their camp, which was about a mile distant. Livy tells us, that Hannibal lost fourteen hundred men on this occasion upon the spot, besides forty taken prisoners. However, the next day the Carthaginian drew up his army in order of battle betwixt his camp and the town, in order to draw the Romans to an engagement; but the consul declining this, he immediately decamped, and took post again upon mount Tifata. Whilst these things happened, Hanno was defeated at Grumentum in Lucania by T. Sempromnius Longus, and lost four thousand men upon the field of battle, besides forty-one colours. After this blow, Hanno abandoned Lucania to the enemy, and retreated into the country of the Bruttii. Upon these repeated instances of ill success, three towns of the Hirpini revolted from the Carthaginians to the Romans, who took a thousand prisoners there, and caused them all to be sold under the spear. A little before these disasters happened, Asdrubal, surnamed Calvus, set sail from Carthage, with the armament under his command, for Sardinia; but received great damage from a storm he met with in his passage, and was obliged to put in at one of the ports of the Baleareic islands. Here he staid a while, in order to refit his fleet; which gave the Romans time to make head against the Carthaginians in Sardinia, and consequently not a little contributed to the signal overthrow Asdrubal soon after received in that island ^e.

Marcellus gains another considerable advantage over Hannibal.

Philip, king of Macedon, being informed, that his ambassadors, together with the Carthaginian ministers sent by Hannibal, had fallen into the hands of the Romans, sent Heracitus Scotinus, Crito Berræus, and Sofitheus Magnes, three noblemen he could confide in, to conclude a fresh treaty with that general. This they happily performed; but, as the summer was spent in this negotiation, Philip could not put himself soon enough in motion to make any diversion in favour of the Carthaginians. Hannibal therefore now began considerably to lose ground. Fabius, having passed the Vulturnus, in conjunction with his colleague, took the cities of Combulteria, Tre-lu'a, and Ansticula, by assault, making the Carthaginian garrisons therein prisoners of war. In the mean time Hannibal kept a secret correspondence with the populace of Nola, who were at his devotion, engaging them to deliver the city into his hands; which being communicated to Fabius, he sent the proconsul Marcellus with a body of troops thither, to garrison the place, and protect the nobility, who were in the Roman interest; and, in the mean time, posted himself betwixt Nola and the Carthaginian camp upon mount Tifata, in order to cut off all communication betwixt them. Marcellus likewise made frequent incursions into the territories of the Hirpini and the Samnites Caudini, where he committed great depredations. This induced the Hirpini and the Samnites to send deputies to Hannibal, reproaching him with his indolence, and telling him, That Marcellus seemed rather to be the conqueror at Cannæ than Hannibal. To whom Hannibal replied, That as the blow given the Romans at Cannæ had eclipsed all his other victories, so they should soon see the glory of that obscured by another more illustrious achievement; and then, dismissing them with a magnificent presents; he advanced towards Nola, after having left a sufficient body of troops to guard his camp on mount Tifata. Upon his approach, he sent Hanno, with a detachment of the forces, to persuade the Nolans to surrender their city to the Carthaginians. To which end, by Marcellus's permission, he had a conference with Herenius Bassus, and Herius Petrius, two persons of the first distinction in the place; but without effect. Hannibal therefore, sitting down before the city, made the necessary dispositions for attacking it with the utmost vigour; which Marcellus observing, sallied out upon his forces with such fury, that the action then had become general, had not the combatants on both sides been obliged to draw off by a violent storm. On this occasion the Carthaginians, according to Livy, lost thirty men; but the b Romans not one. Two days afterwards, a bloody engagement happened within a mile of Nola, wherein the Carthaginians were worsted, being driven out of the field of battle, with the loss of a thousand men killed, and sixteen hundred made prisoners, besides nineteen military ensigns, two elephants, &c. taken, and four of the last-mentioned animals slain. A body of near thirteen hundred Spanish and Nuni-dian horse, immediately after this defeat, deserted to the Romans; which was a great loss to Hannibal, as these were some of his veteran troops, that had attended him in all his expeditions. Fabius, now laying aside his usual caution, penetrated into the very heart of Campania; and hearing of Hannibal's retreat into Apulia, moved towards Capua, destroying all the country, as he advanced, with fire and sword; which concluded the operations of this campaign in Italy f.

In the mean time, Asdrubal being detained in one of the ports of the Balearic islands by the accident above-mentioned, Manlius landed his forces at Caralis, and, upon taking a review of them, found them to consist of twenty-two thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse. At the head of this army he marched into the enemy's territories, and encamped near Harficora, the Sardinian general, who, being gone into the district of the Pellidi Sardi, to assemble all the youth there able to bear arms, in order to reinforce his troops, had left his son Hiossus to command in his absence. Hiossus, being a rash young man, ventured an engagement with Manlius, wherein he had the misfortune to be overthrown, having thirty thousand of his men killed
d upon the spot, and thirteen hundred taken prisoners. The body assembled by Harficora, upon this melancholy news, immediately dispersed itself over the fields and woods; but, at last, retired to a city called Cornus, the capital of the aforesaid district. Sardinia now must have been totally lost, had not Asdrubal arrived in the critical moment with the forces sent from Carthage for the support of the Sardi. Harficora soon joined him with all the Sardinian troops he could draw together; and, immediately after this junction, the confederates advanced into the territories of the Roman allies, laying waste the whole country through which they moved. Their intention was to have marched directly to Caralis, and seized upon that capital; but e Manlius came up with them before they could put their design in execution. After some slight skirmishes betwixt the advanced guards of the two armies, a general action ensued, wherein the Sardi were soon put to the rout; but the Carthaginians continued the fight with extraordinary bravery, insomuch that victory hung in suspense for above the space of four hours. However, they were at last intirely defeated, and dispersed beyond a possibility of rallying. Twelve thousand of the Sardi, and three thousand Carthaginians, fell in this battle; seven hundred of both nations were made prisoners, and nineteen colours taken. Mago, a near relation of Hannibal, Hanno, another Carthaginian nobleman, the chief fomenter of all these troubles in Sardinia, and Asdrubal the general, were in the number of the latter; but Hiossus, the son of Harficora, in that of the former, which threw his father into f such an excess of grief, that he laid violent hands on himself. The shattered remains of the Carthaginian and Sardinian army fled to Cornus, and, upon the first summons of the conqueror, surrendered at discretion. All the cities and fortresses likewise, either in the Carthaginian jurisdiction, or that of Harficora, in a few days made their submission to Manlius; who soon set sail from Caralis for the coast of Italy, with the prisoners, as well as vast booty, he had acquired in this successful expedition.

The Carthaginians
at sea.

Asdrubal had no sooner landed his troops in Sardinia, as already related, than he sent the fleet back to Africa, the admiral of which, in his passage, was attacked by a Roman Squadron of fifty sail, under the command of T. Otacilius the prætor; who, having ravaged the maritime part of the territory of Carthage, was steering his course towards Sardinia, in quest of this very fleet. The Romans took seven Carthaginian galleys, with their crews, the rest escaping by sheering off in time, and by favour of a tempest, that arose during the heat of the action. About this time Bomilcar arrived at Locri with a reinforcement of troops, forty elephants, and a considerable supply of provisions and military stores, from Carthage. After a short stay here, he joined Hanno, who, at that time, lay encamped in the country of the Brutii, having narrowly escaped being cut off by Appius, who, having suddenly passed the straits of Reggio, unexpectedly advanced to the gates of Locri, in order to have surprised him. Appius took post in the neighbourhood of Locri immediately after Bomilcar's departure; so that the city, being abandoned by the Carthaginians, opened its gates to him. However, he missed his principal aim, and, without making any new attempts, soon after returned to Messana ^b.

in Spain.

THE Carthaginians, according to Livy, sustained this year a very considerable loss in Spain. Asdrubal, Mago, and Hamilcar the son of Bomilcar, three Carthaginian generals, laid siege to Illiturgi, which had revolted to the Romans. The Romans, with no small difficulty, forced their way through the enemy's three camps, and supplied their allies with all things necessary, when they were upon the point of surrendering for want of such a supply. This encouraged the Scipios to venture a battle with the Carthaginians, whose army consisted of sixty thousand men, though theirs did not amount to above sixteen thousand. Asdrubal's camp, being by far the most considerable, was first attacked by the Romans; which being observed by Mago and Hamilcar, they advanced, each of them at the head of his respective corps, to support him. But, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, according to the same author, all the Carthaginian camps were forced, and their army overthrown, with the loss of above sixteen thousand men upon the spot, three thousand made prisoners, five elephants slain, besides a thousand horses, sixty military ensigns, and five elephants taken. The consequence of this defeat was the raising the siege of Illiturgi, from whence the Carthaginians retired with great precipitation to Incibi, and in a short time found means so to recruit their forces out of the Spanish provinces, that they ventured another engagement with the Scipios; but their unhappy fate still attending them, they were routed again, and driven out of the field of battle, with the loss of thirteen thousand men killed in the action and the pursuit. Three thousand prisoners, above forty colours, and nine elephants, fell into the hands of the victors. After this battle, adds Livy, all the different nations of Spain revolted to the Romans ^c.

OUR readers will be beforehand with us in observing with what improbabilities, not to say absurdities, this narration of Livy is clogged. How can it be supposed possible for Asdrubal, after the complete defeat he met with in Spain only the last year, to assemble another army of sixty thousand men so soon in the same country, especially since the Carthaginians had reinforced their troops in Italy, and sent a very considerable body of forces to invade Sardinia? If Asdrubal, after the terrible blow he received last year, could scarce maintain himself in any part of Spain, as this author himself expressly asserts, what probability is there, that, in the space of a very few months only, he should have become so prodigiously superior in strength to his conquerors the Romans, especially since the Spaniards in general had declared against him? Lastly, admitting all this to be true, can it be imagined, that immediately after the second fatal overthrow mentioned here by our author, the Carthaginian general could form so numerous an army out of the Spanish nations, who had before espoused the Roman interest? The inconsistencies couched in these queries are certainly so glaring, that it would be intirely needless to expatiate upon them; and therefore we shall content ourselves with having barely hinted at them here, as thinking this sufficient to confirm what we have elsewhere observed of the partiality of this historian, or at least of those he extracted his materials from ^d.

a Locri, allies of the Carthaginians, after the conclusion of the campaign. Hannibal took up his winter-quarters at Arpi, and the consul Sempronius his at Luceria. Each commander kept a watchful eye upon his antagonist, and endeavoured to animate his men, the Carthaginian and Roman parties frequently skirmishing with one another¹.

ABOUT this time Hannibal found means to raise commotions in Sicily; which turned out not a little to his advantage. After the death of Hiero, by several artful steps, he fixed his grandson Hieronymus, who succeeded him in the kingdom of Syracuse, in the interest of the Carthaginians. Some authors relate, that this young prince reigned only thirteen months; that, after he came to the crown, he shewed a most abandoned disposition; and that many prodigies at Syracuse preceded his accession. Polybius however differs from these authors, in relation to his character; though he allows, that he was a weak and unjust prince. Soon after he had entered into a league with Hannibal and the state of Cartbage, he was assassinated by the direction of Indigemines, one of the officers of his guards. But, for the particulars of this horrid action, as well as the effect it had upon the affairs of Cartbage and Syracuse, we must refer our readers to a former part of this history^m.

Hannibal raises commotions in Sicily.

THE Capuans, hearing of the vast preparations made in all the Roman provinces for the vigorous prosecution of this war, no less than eighteen legions being destined for the service of the current year, were thrown into a great consternation, especially as they knew themselves to be, above all others, obnoxious to the Romans. They therefore, in the most pressing terms, intreated Hannibal to move immediately to their assistance, and prevent the Romans from taking post before their city. Hannibal, in compliance with their request, advanced with all expedition to mount Tifata near Capua, where the former year he had encamped; and, after leaving one body of Spaniards and Numidians to defend the advantageous spot of ground he had then possessed himself of, and another to reinforce the garrison of Capua, he marched to the lake Avernus, under the pretence of sacrificing to the gods, but, in reality, to attempt making himself master of Puteoli, into which Fabius had, some time before, thrown a body of troops. Having ravaged the territory of Cumæ, as far as the promontory of Misenum, he presented himself before Puteoli, and summoned the garrison, consisting of six thousand men, to surrender; but finding the Romans determined to defend themselves to the last drop of blood, and that the place was, in a manner, impregnable, he thought proper to retire. Soon after this repulse, the populace of Nola, upon his approach towards their city, sent to Hannibal, desiring of him some forces to defend them against the senate, who were friends to the Romans. But Marcellus, having with great difficulty passed the Vulturnus, reinforced the garrison of Nola with six thousand foot, and three hundred horse, and thereby prevented the Carthaginian from being admitted into the place. In the mean time Hanno, marching out of the country of the Brutii, encamped within three miles of Beneventum, upon the river Calor; which Gracchus being informed of, moved at the head of a large detachment, consisting chiefly of slaves, and pitched his tents within a mile of him. This vicinity of the two camps soon brought on a general action, wherein the Carthaginians were defeated, with very considerable loss. During these transactions in the neighbourhood of Beneventum, Hannibal appeared again before Nola; but Marcellus, having joined the proprætor Pomponius, and ordered Claudius Nero, with a strong body of horse, to fall upon the enemy's rear, attacked him. After a brisk dispute, the Roman gained the advantage, and might have intirely overthrown the Carthaginian, could Nero have executed his orders; but that commander having, by some unforeseen accident, been hindered from coming up with the enemy in time, nothing decisive happened on either side. Hannibal soon after drew off his forces from before Nola, and retreated towards *Tarentum*ⁿ.

The Romans gain some advantages over Hannibal.

Hanno, after the disgrace he had received near Beneventum, retired into Lucania, where meeting with a body of Romans sent by Gracchus to ravage the country, he soon dispersed them, putting a great number of them to the sword; which made him some amends for his former disaster. Fabius and Marcellus now jointly carried on the siege of Casilinum, which they pushed so vigorously, that it was at last obliged to capitulate. Fabius granted them a capitulation, the chief article of which was, that they should have leave to retire to Capua; but Marcellus, Roman like, broke this, a massacring many of them, and sending all the rest, except fifty, that escaped to Fabius, prisoners to Rome. After this exploit, the Romans, in a very heroic manner, destroyed with fire and sword the whole country of the Caudine Samnites, carried off from thence an immense quantity of plunder, and took by storm the cities Compulteria, Telesia, Compsa, Mela, Fulfula, and Orbitanium. Blande in Lucania, and Anca in Apulia, likewise underwent the same fate. Hanno, with the booty he got in the late action, arrived safe in the country of the Brutii, the Roman forces in those parts not being strong enough to intercept him *.

Hannibal advances to Tarentum, but without any effect.

WHILST Hannibal was encamped on the lake Avernus, five young Tarentine noblemen, that had been taken prisoners in the battles of the lake Thrasymenus and Canna, and dismissed, with great politeness, by that general, arrived there as ambassadors from the city of Tarentum. They told him, "That, in return for his kindness to them, they had prevailed upon the Tarentines to prefer his friendship to that of the Romans; and that they would open their gates to him upon his presenting himself before the town." Hannibal, relying upon this assurance, soon after advanced into the neighbourhood of Tarentum; but finding that nobody offered to stir, the prætor Valerius having thrown a body of troops into the place just before he bent his march to Salapia, ordering vast quantities of provisions, amassed in the territories of Metapontum and Heraclea, to be brought thither. Having an intention to fix there his winter-quarters, he likewise sent detachments of Moors and Numidians to carry off every thing valuable, that could be found in the district of Salentum, and the adjacent woody parts of Apulia. Amongst other things, that were the produce of the country, they brought off a large number of wild horses, four thousand of which, being tamed, were very serviceable to Hannibal in the remounting of his cavalry †.

FROM the continent of Italy, we should now pass over to the island of Sicily, which was the theatre of very considerable transactions during this period, according to Polybius, Livy, and Plutarch. But as so full and ample an account of these transactions has been given in a former part of this work, that not a single circumstance of note relative thereto has been omitted, we cannot so much as touch upon them, without being guilty of a repetition. We hope therefore it will be deemed sufficient for us to have hinted to our readers, that the affairs of Sicily, however interwoven with those of other nations, do most properly belong to the history of Syracuse ‡.

NOTWITHSTANDING the losses the Carthaginians sustained the last year in Spain, Asdrubal and Mago, the beginning of this campaign, defeated a strong body of Spaniards; which might have been of bad consequence to the Romans, had not Publius advanced with all expedition to the Iberus, in order to support his confederates. The Romans encamped at Castrum Altum, a place famous for the death of the great Hamilcar. Though this was a fortress of great strength, and abundantly stored with provisions, Publius, finding all the adjacent country possessed by the enemy, and his troops greatly harassed by their horse, soon decamped, and posted himself on a spot not so much exposed to their insults. The Carthaginians cut off above two thousand Romans, in various rencounters, during Publius's short stay at Castrum Altum. Publius, soon after his arrival in his new camp, which he immediately fortified with a retrenchment, went, with a detachment of his light-armed troops, to reconnoitre some of the neighbouring places; which being observed by the Carthaginian general, he advanced, at the head of his forces, to attack him, and had surprised him in a plain, had he not had the precaution to retire in time to an eminence, where he defended himself, till his brother Cneus came to his relief. Castulo, a strong and noble city of Spain, and so strictly allied with the Carthaginians, that Asdrubal had taken him a wife from thence, now revolted to the Romans. The Carthaginians, not discouraged at this, laid siege to Illiturgi, wherein was a Roman garrison, which was in great danger of surrendering to them for want of provisions. Cneus, hearing of this, forced his way through the enemy's camp into the town, supplied it plentifully with every thing needful, and the next day sallying out upon the enemy, killed so many of them, that, in the two actions, they lost twelve thousand men upon the spot, and took above ten thousand prisoners, together with thirty-two colours; and all this with a single legion only. The Carthaginians, being thus obliged to abandon

- a the siege of Illiturgi, marched from thence to attack Bigerra, another city in alliance with Rome; but Cneus forced them to raise this likewise, without striking a stroke. Afterwards the Carthaginian general moved to Munda, whither he was followed by the Romans. Here both armies engaged for four hours, when the Romans would have been victorious, had not Scipio been wounded in the thigh by a javelin; which so disheartened his troops, that he was obliged to sound a retreat. In this action the Carthaginian troops, according to Livy, as well as the elephants, were driven back to their retrenchment, where thirty-nine of those huge animals perished by the enemy's darts. Twelve thousand Carthaginians lost their lives on the field of battle, and three thousand of them, with fifty-seven military ensigns, fell into the enemy's hands. Then the Carthaginians retreated with great precipitation to Oriris, and were pursued by the Romans. There Cneus, being carried in a litter, again attacked Asdrubal, and intirely routed him; but did not make such a carnage as in the former engagements, because the Carthaginian forces were not at that time so numerous. Notwithstanding all these disasters, Mago speedily raised such a number of recruits, as enabled his brother to look the Romans again in the face. Another battle ensued, wherein the Romans met with their usual success. Above eight thousand Carthaginians, with eight elephants, were slain, and about one thousand, with fifty-eight military ensigns, and three elephants, taken. Manicapo and Civismaro, two famous kings of the Gauls, who came to assist their allies the Carthaginians, likewise fell in this battle. A vast number of gold rings, chains for the neck, bracelets, and other Gallie spoils, also came into the possession of the victors. The Romans, having now driven the enemy out of the field, advanced to Saguntum, forced the Carthaginian garrison to abandon it, and then restored it to the ancient inhabitants, that had survived the calamities of their country. As for the Turdetani, who had been the occasion of this bloody war, Cneus caused them to be sold by auction, and afterwards razed their city. Such is the account Livy has given us of the military operations this year in Spain; which is just as consistent with itself, as that extraordinary relation of the action near Syracuse, in the beginning of the first Punic war, Philinus vouchsafed his countrymen, according to which, the conquered were victors, and the conquerors vanquished; or, as the conduct of some of our neighbours in a late war, when they sung Te Deum for a defeat. In short, our readers will, from a cursory view of this account, be fully convinced, that consistency and impartiality are qualifications not essential even to those, who are reputed the best Roman historians.

- THE following spring Hannibal received intelligence, that one Cassius Altinius, ^{The campaign in Italy.} who abandoned the Roman interest after the battle of Cannæ, had offered to deliver up Arpi into the hands of the Romans for a sum of money. This news did not at all displease the Carthaginian, who had long suspected Altinius of holding a correspondence with the enemy; since such a conduct could not fail of giving him an opportunity of seizing upon the immense treasures that wealthy citizen of Arpi possessed; but, that he might seem not so much influenced by avarice as resentment, as soon as he got Altinius's riches into his coffers, he burnt his wife and children alive. This story depends upon the authority of Livy, and is as probable as some of the preceding. Appian calls this traitor Dasius, and tells us, that he was descended from Diomedes of Argos, the founder of Arpi. According to the same historian, he had like to have been destroyed by the Romans, for making such a villainous proposal to them, and afterwards wandered about as a vagabond, in continual fear of being cut off either by the Carthaginian or Roman parties. Hannibal immediately put a garrison of five thousand Carthaginians into the city above-mentioned, who were joined by a body of three thousand citizens, in order to secure it against any attack of the Romans. However, the Fabii, having guarded all the avenues to it, surprized it in the manner already related. About a thousand Spaniards, at the beginning of the attempt, went over in a body to the Romans, and prevailed upon them to permit the Carthaginian garrison to retire. In pursuance of the capitulation, those troops were conducted by a Roman escorte to Hannibal's camp at Salapia, without the least injury offered them. This is Livy's account. But Appian relates, that the Fabii did not reduce Arpi by force, but, by means of some traitors, had it delivered to them; and that they put all the Carthaginians found therein to the sword. Nothing further very material, except what has been already taken notice of in the Roman history, ^a happened this campaign in Italy *.

Some motions
in Africa.

THE Romans this year entered into an alliance with Sypbax, a Numidian prince, who had suddenly conceived an aversion to the Carthaginians. In consequence of the treaty concluded betwixt the two powers, the Romans sent Q. Statorius into Africa, to train up a body of Numidian infantry after the Roman manner. This, above all things, Sypbax desired, the Numidians having, till that time, brought only cavalry into the field; which rendered them incapable of coping with the Carthaginians. Statorius, upon his arrival in Numidia, soon inrolled a considerable body of foot out of Sypbax's youth. These he taught to keep their ranks, follow their colours, advance or retreat with order and swiftness, and, in fine, to form all the evolutions ^b and movements of the military art after the Roman model; so that in a short time Sypbax had a body of infantry, which he could intirely depend upon. The Carthaginians, finding their Numidian forces beginning to desert in great numbers, and fearing the fatal effects such a formidable union might produce, dispatched ambassadors to Gala, king of the Massyli, another Numidian prince, to propose an offensive and defensive alliance to him. They insinuated, "that, out of regard to his own safety, he ought to join them without loss of time, before either Sypbax could transport any troops into Spain, or the Romans into Africa; that Sypbax was, at present, void of all support from the Romans, and might therefore be easily crushed." Gala, at the instigation of his son Masiniissa, then but seventeen years of age, closed ^c with the proposal, and sent an army to assist his new allies. Masiniissa, to whose conduct that army was committed, gave Sypbax two such total overthrows, the first in conjunction with the Carthaginians, and the second with the Massylian forces only, that he found it impossible to make a diversion afterwards in favour of the Romans ^d.

take a body of Celtiberians
into their service.

THE transactions in Spain this year are scarce worth relating. Nothing of the least moment passed there, except that the Romans took a body of Celtiberians into their service, and sent three hundred persons of the most distinguished families in Spain to Italy, to encourage a desertion amongst their countrymen in Hannibal's army. Appian relates, that this scheme took some effect; but at the same time intimates, that Hannibal himself made use of the same method of acting, in order to draw off ^d the Spaniards incorporated with the Roman forces, with equal success. The Celtiberians, who took on in the Roman service, were allowed the same pay, that their countrymen received from the Carthaginians ^e.

Tarentum delivered up to him.

THOUGH Hannibal stood upon the defensive the last campaign, towards the close of it, some inconsiderable cities of the Salentines surrendered to him. However, to compensate this, the Thurians and Consentini revolted from him to the Romans. This revolt might have been attended with more fatal consequences, had not Hanno overthrown a body of Roman forces under the command of L. Pomponius Veientanus in Lucania, after they had made dreadful incursions into the country of the Brutii, pillaging and laying waste all before them. The commander himself was taken pri- ^e soner in the action, and a great part of his men cut off; which prevented several petty states from abandoning the Carthaginian interest, though a few small towns of Lucania, after that defeat, opened their gates to Sempronius. In the mean time Phileas, who had a long time resided at Rome as minister from Tarentum, a man of a turbulent and restless disposition, retired privately from Rome, with some Tarentine hostages, whom he had assisted to make their escape; but being closely pursued, they were all taken near Tarracina, brought back to Rome, whipped publicly there in the comitium, and afterwards thrown headlong from the Tarpeian rock. This barbarity extremely incensed the Tarentines, who before were far from being well affected to the Romans. Some of their young nobility therefore, the principal of ^f whom were Nicon and Philomenes, formed a design to massacre the Roman troops in garrison, and deliver the city up to the Carthaginians. Hannibal, being informed of this, moved with his forces towards Tarentum. As soon as the approach of the Carthaginian army reached the ears of the conspirators, Nicon and Philomenes, with a party that they could confide in, went privately by night out of the city, under pretence of being engaged the next day in a hunting-match. Nicon and Philomenes, as had been before concerted, rode up so near Hannibal's lines, that they were seized by one of his advanced guards, their associates having taken care before to disperse them-a selves in the neighbouring woods. At first they refused to give any account of themselves; but only intimated, that they had something of moment to impart to the general. Being therefore conducted to him, they desired to have a private conference with him; which was immediately granted. They then gave him a full account of the disposition of the Tarentines, exclaiming bitterly at the same time against the Romans. Hannibal received them with great kindness, commended their resolution, loaded them with promises, and agreed to have a second conference with them. In order to blind the Romans, as well as the people of Tarentum, and conceal the true end of this excursion, he ordered several head of cattle to be driven out of the camp, that they might fall into the hands of his new friends, and be carried by b them into the town; which being done, both the Romans, and the citizens, were extremely pleased at the success that had attended the supposed hunting-match, as well as excursion upon the enemy (for this likewise Nicon and Philomenes related to them); inasmuch that neither of them entertained the least suspicion of what had been really transacted. So considerable a booty as they brought with them, enabled them to invite both their countrymen, and the Romans, to frequent entertainments; which not only paved the way to a second hunting-match, but likewise excited great numbers of the citizens to turn marauders, in hopes of meeting with the same success; and this served to render the design of the Tarentine leaders still more impenetrable. At the second conference, Nicon and Philomenes concluded a treaty with Hannibal on c the part of the Tarentines, the terms of which were to the following effect: "That the " Carthaginians should not exact any tribute from the Tarentines, nor exercise any " dominion over them; but, on the contrary, maintain them in the possession of all " their privileges; that they should send a garrison into the city, to deliver the inha" bitants from the Roman yoke; that it should be lawful for them to plunder all the " Roman houses in Tarentum, and put every Roman they could meet with to the sword;

" and lastly, that the Tarentines should have free access to Hannibal, whenever they " approached his camp, in order to confer with him." By virtue of this last article, Nicon and Philomenes often visited Hannibal; which they found it no difficult matter to do, as Philomenes had contracted an intimacy with Caius Livius, the Roman command-
d ant, by the venison he gave him, as well as the splendid manner in which he frequently regaled him, and won over to his interest the captain of the Roman guard posted at the gate called Temenis. That he might effectually secure that guard, his constant practice was to make a present to the captain, as well as the soldiers, either of some venison he took in hunting, or some cattle, that he was supplied with by Hannibal; inasmuch that he had ingress and egress at pleasure, the gate being opened to him whenever he approached it, upon a whistle, or some other signal given. The heads of the conspiracy receiving intelligence, that Livius had appointed a day for a feast, to which all his officers and friends were invited, in the museum, a place near the forum, they, after having held a consultation with Hannibal, pitched upon that day
e for the execution of their design. According to the plan of operations agreed upon between the Carthaginian and his new allies, when the time drew nigh, he ordered a body of ten thousand men, horse and foot, to hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's warning. To hinder the Romans from conceiving any distrust from the long stay he made in his present camp, he caused it to be given out, that he had, for some time, laboured under an indisposition, which had detained him there. At last, his troops having supplied themselves with provisions for four days, began their march at the fourth watch of the night, with their general himself at the head of them. He detached a party of Numidians to reconnoitre the enemy, with orders to advance thirty stadia before the rest, to scour the country as far as the gates of *Taren-
f tum*, in order to prevent the enemy from discovering his forces, and to make them believe, that an inconsiderable party only had advanced out of the Carthaginian camp for the sake of plunder. This had the desired effect; for advice being brought to Livius, then in the height of his entertainment, that a detachment of Numidians were laying waste the country within sight of the town, he commanded some of his troops to drive them from thence the next morning, without giving himself any further trouble, for the present, about them. In the mean time Hannibal contrived matters so, as to take post before the town about midnight, on the side of the gate Temenis. Whilst affairs were in this situation, Tragiscus and Nicon, Philomenes serving as a guide to Hannibal in this expedition, found means to secure all the avenues lead-g ing to the forum; which it was no difficult matter to do, Livius having so intoxicated himself, himself, that he could think of nothing but taking his repose. Hannibal advertised ^a his friends in the city of his arrival by a great fire, which he caused to be lighted; and was informed by them, that the plot within doors was ripe for execution, by the same signal, as had been before concerted betwixt them. Upon this, he sent Philomenes, with a thousand Africans, to possess himself of the gate Temenis. Philomenes acquainted the guard posted there, that he had brought them a wild boar, and therefore desired a speedy admission. Upon their opening the gate, the Africans entered, and put them all to the sword; whilst Hannibal, with the main body of his troops, found a passage through another gate, by Nicon's assistance, into the town. All the Carthaginian and Tarentine forces met, as had been appointed, in the forum; from whence Hannibal sent a detachment of two thousand Gauls, divided into three bodies, ^b each commanded by two Tarentine captains, into three different parts of the town, to secure every post of importance. After this disposition, he issued out an order, injoining all the citizens not to stir out of their houses; at the same time assuring them of his protection. The Tarentines, finding the Carthaginians entered, were at first thrown into the utmost consternation; but when some of their own nobility told them, that Hannibal was come to deliver them from a proud and insulting enemy, and to restore them to their former liberty, their fears soon subsided. Livius, upon the first alarm, being so drunk, that he was incapable of giving out his orders at so critical a conjuncture in a proper manner, withdrew himself, with his family, into the port, notwithstanding the conspirators had taken care to place a guard before his ^c house, where getting on board a Roman vessel, he made his escape to the citadel. In the mean time Hannibal commanded every Tarentine to post over his door the word TARENTINI, that the citizens might be distinguished from the Romans, and then gave up all the Roman houses to his soldiers to be plundered, with a permission to put to the sword every Roman, that should fall into their hands. That the Romans might be struck with the greater terror, as well as the more effectually massacred, Philomenes had caused Roman trumpets to be blown towards the citadel, which stood in the mouth of the harbour, as well as in other parts of the town, imagining, that this artifice would draw them thither, where troops were prepared to fall upon them. A considerable number of Romans lost their lives by this device; but many of them ^d retired into the citadel, which Hannibal immediately blocked up. As he had drawn up his forces in order of battle, to support the detachments sent to plunder the Romans, if they met with any resistance, there was little blood shed on the Carthaginian side. When he found the city intirely at his devotion, he ordered the citizens to appear before him unarmed, and made them a speech, filled with assurances of his kind intentions towards them; which was answered with the loudest acclamations. In order to secure the city from the insults of the Roman garrison in the citadel, Hannibal surrounded the former with a line, which, in a manner, cut off all communication betwixt it and the latter. However, he could not effect this without a considerable opposition from the enemy. During the time his men were at work upon ^e it, one very brisk action happened, wherein the Romans were defeated, and lost a great number of men. Hannibal, after this, carried on the siege of the citadel with inconceivable vigour; but the Romans, receiving a strong reinforcement from Metapontum, made a furious sally upon the besiegers, and destroyed the greatest part both of their works and military machines. This made the Carthaginians despair of taking it at present by force; so that they drew off from before it. Hannibal, upon this disappointment, assembling the Tarentines, told them, they would never become masters of the citadel, unless they could cut off all supplies from the Romans by sea. This they were sensible of; but as the Romans kept their ships blocked up in the port, they thought it would be impossible to exclude them from the dominion of the ^f sea. But Hannibal, by dint of genius, surmounted this difficulty; for observing, that ships of a moderate size might be drawn on shore, and conveyed through the middle of the city into the sea on another side, he made use of this expedient to annoy the enemy. The Tarentines therefore, shutting up the citadel on all sides, both by sea and land, soon reduced the Roman garrison to great extremities. Hannibal then, leaving some troops in the city, to support the Tarentines against any attack or surprize of the enemy, returned to the camp he had marked out upon the Galesus immediately after he was admitted into the town. Here he continued in a state of inaction, till the commencement of the next campaign.

- a ACCORDING to Appian, the name of the person, who introduced the Carthaginians into Tarentum, was Cononeus, and that of the Roman commandant Junius. Cononeus, says the same author, being extremely fond of hunting, prevailed upon the guard posted at one of the gates to let him out and in whenever he pleased in the night, under the pretence, that he was obliged to pursue his favourite diversion in the night-time, for fear of the enemy's parties. By this artifice, he found means frequently to confer with Hannibal, and at last enabled a body of Carthaginians, dressed like hunters, but with coats of mail and swords under their hunting habits, to take post in the town; who, being soon joined by a greater number of forces, that lay concealed in a neighbouring wood, easily made themselves masters of the place. Five thousand Romans, together with a body of Tarentines in the Roman interest, retired into the citadel. These troops, being reinforced by half of the garrison of Metapontum, repulsed the besiegers in all their attacks, burnt their works and military machines, and destroyed many of their men in the frequent successful sallies they made. This so discouraged Hannibal, that he retired into Apulia, leaving Hanno, with a body of forces, to keep the place blocked up. But the Romans, being masters of the sea, received copious supplies of all things necessary, and streightened both the town and the Carthaginian camp in such a manner, that Hannibal, upon his return, which happened soon after, found them almost reduced to the last extremity for want of provisions. He therefore put them into a method of conveying their ships out of the port into the sea on the southern side of the city. After this, the Tarentines and Carthaginians intercepted the Roman convoys by sea, and greatly distressed the garrison. At last receiving intelligence, that the troops in the citadel expected a large supply of corn from the Tburians, they posted a squadron of galleys at a proper place in ambuscade, which, without much difficulty, seized upon the Tburian vessels, and made all the crews prisoners. The people of Tburium therefore sent deputies to Hannibal to redeem the captives, who, being by the Tarentines introduced to that general, found a most kind reception, and had their prisoners released without ransom. This made such an impression upon the minds of the deputies, that soon after they put Hannibal into possession of their city, tho' against the consent of the inhabitants, the garrison, upon the approach of the Carthaginians, retiring privately to Brundisium. As the reduction of the city of Tarentum was an event of the utmost importance to Hannibal, and what, in all probability, not a little contributed to the protracting of this destructive war, we thought ourselves obliged to give our readers, in this place, a circumstantial account of it, though, prolix as this may seem to be, it is but an abridgment of that to be found in Polybius, Livy, and Appian.*

Appian's account of the reduction of Tarentum.

- WHILST Hannibal lay encamped in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, the consuls, towards the beginning of the following year, threatened Capua with a siege. This greatly alarmed the Capuans, who were under dreadful apprehensions of a famine, as the Romans had prevented them from cultivating their lands the preceding year. They therefore intreated Hannibal to send them a supply of provisions, before the Romans had cut off the communication betwixt their city and the places, where the Carthaginians, and their allies, had erected magazines. Whereupon Hanno, in pursuance of an order received from Hannibal, moving out of the country of the Brutii, encamped upon an eminence about three miles from Beneventum; and, having amassed a vast quantity of corn, appointed a day for the Capuans to send a proper number of waggons thither to carry it off. The consuls being informed of this, Fulvius marched with all expedition to Beneventum, and from thence to Hanno's camp, which he immediately attacked, and, by the bravery of Vibius, a centurion of the Pelignian troops, Valerius Flaccus, tribune of the third legion, and T. Pedanius, the first centurion of it, carried, after an obstinate resistance. Of the Carthaginians, above six thousand were slain, and seven thousand taken prisoners. A great number of Campanian peasants, together with their waggons, and the corn Hanno had collected for the use of the Capuans, as well as an immense quantity of other plunder, fell into the hands of the Romans. Hanno himself was not in the action, but at some small distance from the camp, when it happened; but, being informed of it by one Cominius Ceritus, he retired, with great precipitation, into Brutium, attended only by a few of his horse. This blow so terrified the Capuans, that the principal of them seemed afraid the enemy would as easily possess themselves of Capua, as they had before done of Arpi.

Hanno defeated by the Romans

* APPIAN. in Hannib.

However, in order to animate them to a vigorous defence, and protect their territory a from the incursions of the Roman parties, Hannibal sent the garrison a reinforcement of two thousand men. In the mean time the Carthaginian garrison at Tarentum, in conjunction with the inhabitants, continued the siege of the citadel there, Hannibal, with his army, pursuing all the measures, that he thought necessary to facilitate the reduction of that place ⁷.

The Carthaginians admitted into Thurium.

THE body of troops left to defend Metapontum being so weakened by the large detachment sent to the citadel of Tarentum, that the Romans there were not in a condition to make head against the citizens, who were well affected to the Carthaginians, Hannibal found means to make himself master of that city. Appian tells us, that the Metapontini put all the Romans to the sword; and that Heraclea, a town situated b between Metapontum and Tarentum, followed the example of those two cities. The Thurians likewise, being nearly related to the people of the two last-mentioned cities, as descended from the Achaïans, and highly resenting the cruel treatment of the Tarentine hostages, meditated a revolt from the Romans. They therefore sent a deputation to Hanno and Mago, who then commanded a Carthaginian army in Brutium, inviting them to come and take possession of Thurium. Atinius, the commandant, had but a small garrison, his chief dependence being upon the townsmen, whom he had armed and disciplined, that they might be the better enabled to support him, in case of a visit from the enemy. Hanno first presented himself before the town with a body of infantry, whilst Mago, with the cavalry, lay in ambuscade by favour of some c eminences, which concealed him from the enemy's parties, that were sent to reconnoitre the Carthaginians. Atinius therefore imagining, that he should be attacked only by a body of foot, and being ignorant of the conspiracy the Thurians had entered into, did not in the least doubt but that he should easily repulse the enemy. Hanno, as matters had been before concerted, retired upon the approach of the Romans, drawing both them and the Thurians insensibly to the foot of the eminences possessed by the Carthaginian horse; who immediately rushing down upon them with a great shout, the Thurians, according to agreement, took to their heels, and were received by the conspirators into the city. The Romans in the mean time, notwithstanding they were charged in front, in flank, and in rear, behaved with great bravery; d but being at last likewise put to flight, upon their arrival at the town, they found themselves denied admission, the conspirators on the walls crying out, That the Carthaginians, being mixed with the Romans, would certainly enter, unless the gates were immediately shut. They were all therefore cut to pieces, except Atinius, with a few of his principal officers, whom the Thurians saved from the general carnage, out of the great personal regard they had for that commandant, on account of his mild and gentle government. After they had sent these on board a galley, prepared for that purpose, to the next port belonging to the Romans, the conspirators delivered Thurium into the hands of the Carthaginians. In the mean time the consuls moved towards Capua, in order to form the siege of that important place ². e

The proconsul Sempronius betrayed and killed.

WHILST the Romans were thus preparing to attack Hannibal in the most sensible part, they sustained an almost irreparable loss by the death of Sempronius Gracchus. That excellent commander, having made the necessary dispositions for marching out of Lucania into the neighbourhood of Capua, with a body of Volones, to prevent the enemy from throwing any succours into the place, was, by the treachery of Flavius Lucanus, drawn into an ambuscade, and cut off, with all the small party that attended him. Livy tells us, that authors do not intirely agree in their accounts of that general's death, some affirming, that he was massacred by two troops of Nu- midians, as he repeated a sacrifice, which had been attended by a very bad omen, at some distance from the camp, before he left Lucania; others, that a Carthaginian f detachment put him, and three lictors, with some servants attending them, to the sword, near the river Calor, in the territory of Beneventum, as they were going to bathe themselves; and lastly, others, that he fell in the manner first related. The Roman writers differ likewise as much in the accounts they give us of his interment; some intimating, that Hannibal celebrated his funeral obsequies with great pomp and magnificence, the Spaniards distinguishing themselves above any other nation in the Carthaginian army on that occasion; and others, that he sent the body to the Roman

a camp, to be interred there. Be that as it will, Hannibal reaped considerable advantage from this accident, since it, for some time, retarded the attack of Capua.

HOWEVER, the consuls at last approached that city, with an intention to invest it; of which the Capuans being informed, they ordered a detachment of foot out of the town, to make a sally upon the enemy. As the Romans plundered all the country, through which they moved, that detachment, supported by a body of Carthaginian cavalry, under the command of Mago, fell in with a numerous party of them, ravaging the adjacent territory without any order or discipline. These troops Mago routed at the first onset, laid fifteen hundred of them dead upon the spot, took many prisoners, recovered a vast quantity of booty, and dispersed the rest. This action so intimidated the consuls, that, for the present, they thought proper to stand upon the defensive, and so encouraged the Carthaginians and Capuans, that they frequently insulted the enemy. Hannibal, upon advice of what had happened, immediately marched to Capua, and attacked the Romans. Soon after the beginning of the engagement, the questor Cornelius appeared with the body of troops formerly commanded by Sempronius, to the terror of both parties, each looking upon them as enemies. Under this apprehension, both armies drew off from the field of battle to their respective camps. The consuls, after the action, in which the Romans suffered most, divided their forces into two bodies, in order to oblige Hannibal to leave the territory of Capua. Fulvius, with one of them, retreated into the district of Cumæ, whilst Claudius took his march into Lucania. Hannibal pursued the latter; but was not able to come up with him. However, he met with a Roman corps of sixteen thousand men, under the conduct of M. Centenius Penula, who had signalized himself on many occasions as a centurion. This officer, being introduced to the senate by P. Cornelius Sulla the prætor, had the assurance to tell the conscript fathers, that, if they would trust him with only a body of five thousand men, he would turn the tables upon the Carthaginians, and give a good account of Hannibal. Instead of five thousand, they assigned him eight thousand, which, by the accession of volunteers in his march to Lucania, and many of the natives on his arrival there, he increased to double the number. Being a man of wonderful resolution, he engaged the Carthaginians upon Hannibal's first offering him battle; but, not being able to cope with that general, after a fight of two hours, he was intirely defeated. As Hannibal, by guarding all the passes and avenues in the neighbourhood of his camp, had taken care to cut off their retreat, all the Romans, except a thousand men, together with their general, were slain. Notwithstanding which, Claudius having taken a large compass, in order to get clear of Hannibal, arrived once more before Capua, and, in conjunction with his colleague, blocked up that city.

Hannibal, ever intent upon taking advantage of the foibles of the Roman generals, receiving intelligence from his emissaries in Apulia, that Cn. Fulvius the prætor, being elated with some late instances of success, despised the enemy, and permitted a total relaxation of discipline to take place amongst his troops, advanced to Herdonia, where the Romans lay encamped. Upon his arrival there, he distributed three thousand light-armed troops in a woody spot of ground, which concealed them from the enemy, and detached Mago, with two thousand horse, to block up all the passes and defiles on that part, where, he foresaw, the enemy would endeavour to make off, in case they were pushed. The prætor, being a man of a fiery temper, was easily drawn by Hannibal into the ambuscade; where being attacked in front, in rear, and in flank, and the retreat cut off, the whole Roman corps, consisting of eighteen thousand men, except the prætor, and two thousand, who fled as soon as they saw victory incline to the Carthaginians, were put to the sword. The two last blows coming, as it were, one upon the neck of the other, threw the Roman senate into a great consternation, and obliged them to send M. Miilius and C. Lælorius to the consuls, with fresh instructions.

NOTWITHSTANDING these misfortunes, the consuls, pursuant to an order received from the senate, made the necessary dispositions for forming the siege of Capua. Hannibal, after the defeat of the enemy at Herdonia, returned to Tarentum, where he attempted, both by force and persuasion, to bring the Roman garrison in the citadel to a capitulation; but all his endeavours proving ineffectual, he turned off to Brundisium, to excite the citizens there to a revolt; but being disappointed in this view, he entertained some thoughts of moving towards Capua, at the earnest desire of the citizens, who now^a sent a deputation to him. At this time the transactions in the island of Sicily were very considerable, and the Carthaginians exerted themselves there, notwithstanding the numerous armies they employed in Italy and Spain. However, as the particulars of these transactions do not fall under our province, we must refer our readers for them to the history of Syracuse, to which they properly belong^c.

Otacilius ravages the coasts of Africa.

ABOUT the time of the reduction of Syracuse, Otacilius sailed with eighty quinqueremes from Lilybæum to Utica; where entering the port in the night, he took a great number of vessels laden with corn. After which, he landed a body of forces, that ravaged all the adjacent territory; and then returned on board with a very considerable booty. The Carthaginians giving him no obstruction in this excursion, b either by sea or land, he arrived safe at Lilybæum three days after he left the harbour of Utica, with a hundred and thirty transports, that conveyed the corn, and other spoils he had acquired, into that harbour. By such a seasonable supply, he was enabled to relieve the people of Syracuse, who, as well as the Roman garrison there, were, at that time, threatened with a famine^e.

THE Carthaginians had this year three armies in Spain; one commanded by Asdrubal the son of Gisco, another by Mago, and the third by Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal. The two former generals encamped close together, about five days march from the Romans; and the latter posted himself at Anitorgis, a city much nearer the enemy. This obliged the Romans to divide likewise their forces. Cneus, with one third of the Roman troops, and a body of thirty thousand Celtiberian auxiliaries, c advanced into the neighbourhood of Anitorgis, to observe the motions of Asdrubal the son of Hamilcar. The two armies encamped on opposite banks of the same river, with an intention soon to come to an engagement. Asdrubal, having a perfect knowledge of the Spanish perfidy, and being besides well skilled in the Celtiberian tongue, easily found means to bribe the Celtiberian troops to a desertion; which obliged Cneus to pass the Iberus, and to secure himself, by keeping that river betwixt him and Asdrubal's army. In the mean time Mago, and the other Asdrubal, by the assistance of Masiniſſa, and Indibilis regulus of the Lacetani, gave the Romans a complete overthrow, d and killed Publius. The same generals and princes, with their united forces, afterwards going in quest of Cneus, met with him on the top of an eminence, where, after a bloody action, they defeated him, put him to the sword, with a great number of his legionaries, and forced the rest to fly to Publius's camp, which was guarded by a small body, under the command of one of his lieutenants called T. Fonteius. However, the Carthaginians, towards the close of the campaign, were unexpectedly overthrown by a young Roman knight named C. Martius, who had collected the remains of the Roman army, as we have elsewhere related. According to Claudius, who translated the Annales Acilianæ out of Greek into Latin, two Carthaginian camps were forced in twenty-four hours time by Martius, thirty-seven thousand Carthaginians killed, eighteen hundred made prisoners, besides many spoils taken, amongst which e was a silver shield, weighing an hundred and thirty pounds, with the effigies of Asdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, upon it. Valerius Antias relates, that only Mago's camp was taken, when seven thousand of the enemy were put to the sword; and that, in a pitched battle, Martius defeated Asdrubal, killing ten thousand of his men, and making four thousand three hundred and thirty prisoners. Piso affirms, that the Romans drew the Carthaginians into an ambuscade, and by that means cut off five thousand of them. In short, from this specimen, we may form a true idea of the authors Livy followed; which is the reason of our inserting these last particulars here. Their relations, in the point before us, are plainly refuted both by the preceding and subsequent operations of the Carthaginian and Roman armies in Spain, as may be f collected even from Livy himself; nay, that historian, partial as he is, allows some of these to have greatly exceeded the truth in their accounts of the numbers of the slain in the battles they have described; which is a tacit acknowledgment of his own partiality, and consequently a confirmation of what, in relation to the affairs of Spain during this period, we have so frequently observed^f.

The Roman generals push on the siege of Capua.

IN the mean time the consuls, and the prætor Claudius, having drawn a line round Capua, pushed on the siege of that important place with the utmost vigour. The Capuans at first made frequent sallies, especially upon the workmen employed upon

- a the said line, which was flanked with parapets and towers placed at proper distances. The Capuans, in this distress, sent messengers to Hannibal, complaining, "That they were deserted by him, and upon the point of surrendering to the Romans; at the same time conjuring the Carthaginian, by their fidelity to him, to send them speedy succours." This however could not induce Hannibal to abandon the blockade of the citadel of Tarentum; but being at last informed by a Numidian horseman, who had passed through the Roman camp undiscovered in the night, that Capua was reduced to the last extremity for want of provisions, with some regret he moved from his camp upon the Galesus near Tarentum, to the relief of his beloved city. Though for some time, after the arrival of the Numidian, he remained in a state of suspense, not knowing whether the reduction of the citadel of Tarentum, or the relief of Capua, would turn out most to his advantage, yet, out of the singular affection he bore the Capuans, he at last came to a resolution to succour them. It is probable likewise, that he took this step, in order to preserve his reputation amongst his allies; which, he imagined, could not be more effectually done, than by a vigorous support of those, who had so eminently distinguished themselves in his favour. Leaving therefore his baggage in Brutium, he advanced, with a strong body of light-armed troops, together with thirty-three elephants, towards Capua, taking post in a valley behind mount Tifala. Here he did not continue long inactive; for he first took a fort called Galatia by storm, and then, without loss of time, attacked the Roman camp, the Capuans at the same instant, as had been before concerted betwixt them and Hannibal, making a vigorous sally with their whole garrison; but, after a warm dispute, both the Carthaginians and Capuans were repulsed, with considerable loss. Livy tells us, that in the heat of the action, the Spaniards and Numidians, together with the elephants, broke into the enemy's camp; that those huge animals, by overturning the Roman tents, and frightening the beasts of burden there, scattered terror where-ever they moved; and that Hannibal, taking advantage of this confusion, ordered some of his men, who could speak Latin, to cry out, "That, since the Roman camp was taken, every soldier was at liberty to shift for himself as well as he could, and to fly to the neighbouring mountains."
- d However, the elephants being soon driven out of the camp by fire brought thither for that purpose, and Hannibal's artifice defeated, the Romans recovered themselves, and obliged the enemy to retire. After this action, Hannibal, not being able either to draw the enemy to a battle, or force a passage through their camp into the town, laid aside all thoughts for the present of relieving Capua.

HOWEVER, that general, ever active in forming of schemes for the annoyance of his enemies, at last hit upon an expedient, which, he doubted not, would infallibly answer his purpose. He proposed to march with such expedition to Rome, as to present himself at the walls of that metropolis, before the Romans could have any notice or suspicion of his design. In order to facilitate the execution of this project, Hannibal advances to Rome.

- e Hannibal ordered his troops to supply themselves with provisions for ten days, and to get ready as many transports as would waft them over the Vulturnus in one night. But, notwithstanding the privacy with which this whole affair was transacted, Fulvius, by means of his spies, received intelligence of Hannibal's intended motion, and dispatched a courier to Rome, to give the senate early notice of his approach. As the Carthaginian did not march directly to Rome, but took a large compass, and staid to ravage the countries, through which he moved, the Romans had time to make proper dispositions for the defence of their capital. However, many, even of the senators themselves, were struck with incredible terror at the appearance of the Carthaginian forces. Hannibal, having marched through the territories of Frusinum, Ferentinum, Anagnia, Laticum, Algidum, Tusculum, and Gabii, encamped on a commodious spot of ground within eight miles of Rome; his Numidian parties, that preceded the main body of the army, putting to the sword, or taking prisoners, all the Romans they met with in their route. After a short stay here, he moved to the banks of the Anio, about three miles from the enemy's capital; from whence, escorted by a choice detachment of two thousand horse, he advanced to the very gates of Rome, in order to reconnoitre the enemy, and take a view of the situation of the city. But not meeting with the desired success, either in this excursion, or the attempts he afterwards made, Hannibal retired six miles from Rome, where he pitched his tents upon the Tutia. From hence he went to the grove of the goddess Feronia, where stood a temple sacred to her, enriched with the valuable oblations and presents of the Cape-nates, a people inhabiting that particular district; which he plundered. Livy affirms, that, after Hannibal's departure, great heaps of brass were found in this grove, which his soldiers had left there, in the room of the treasure they had carried from thence, out of a religious motive. According to Strabo, a sacrifice was offered annually to the goddess Feronia, in the grove where she was worshipped, at the foot of the mountain Soracte, where her votaries walked unhurt over burning coals. On several Roman denarii, preserved in the cabinets of the curious, she is represented with a crown on her head. Hannibal, finding himself disappointed in his views, is said to have cried out, "That at one time his own will, and at another fortune, would not permit him to take Rome." Livy seems to intimate, that the routes Hannibal took in his passage to Rome and retreat from it, could not be ascertained, some authors confounding them, though one of these, he believes, in his time, was certainly known. We shall not further expatiate upon this remarkable expedition, since all the particulars of moment relating to it, omitted by us here, will be found in a proper place ^b.

Capua surrenders to the Romans.

Hannibal, instead of marching to the relief of Capua, the siege of which his late enterprize could not divert the enemy from, moved with such expedition to Rhegium, that he had like to have surprised that city. This little pleased the Capuans, who prevailed upon Bostar and Hanno, the commanders of the Carthaginian forces in Capua, to press Hannibal, in the strongest and most moving terms, to attempt raising the siege of that city. Their letters however had no effect; for Hannibal either being not able or willing to relieve the place, it was obliged to surrender to the Romans, Seppius Læsius being at that time the mediastuticus, or chief magistrate, there. Vibius Virius, who had been the chief author of the late revolt, put an end to his life by poison, as did twenty-seven other senators. In what a shocking and inhuman manner Fulvius treated the Capuan senators, both before, and even after, the conscript fathers at Rome had granted them mercy, may be seen in a former part of this work. Nothing can give us a more lively idea of the cruelties and enormities a thirst after power may make a state capable of, than what even the partial Livy himself has transmitted down to posterity on this occasion, except the late villainous and unchristian behaviour of a most christian prince, as famous for his observation of solemn treaties, as either the Romans or Carthaginians were. The success of this siege gave the Romans a visible superiority over the Carthaginians, and disposed the Italian states in general to declare for their former masters ^d.

State of affairs in Spain.

SOME time after the reduction of Capua, Asdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, being encamped at a place called Lapides Atri, in the country of the Ausetani, between Illiturgi and Mentissa, was informed, that Claudius Nero, who had been employed before Capua, was arrived in Spain with a strong reinforcement; and that the command of the army destined to act against the Carthaginians in Spain was given to him, in the room of L. Martius and T. Fonteius. Asdrubal soon after, by a false point of conduct, suffered himself to be shut up on an isthmus in such a manner, that he lay at the mercy of the enemy. However, he found means to extricate himself out of the difficulties, in which that error had involved him, though by none of the most honourable methods. This event so changed the face of affairs in Spain, that no person of distinction, except P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Publius, who had lately lost his life in Spain, offered himself a candidate for the proconsulate there. He was therefore chosen proconsul for Spain, and sent, with an additional body of troops, to carry on the war in that country. Soon after his arrival there, he received deputations from most of the Spanish nations, who discovered a greater inclination than ever to come to a close union with the Romans. When Scipio, amidst the applause and acclamations of all ranks and degrees of men at Rome, took upon himself the command of the army in Spain, he was scarce twenty-four years of age ^e.

Hannibal's affairs go to decay in Italy, Sicily, and Spain.

NOTHING of moment, except what has been already related, happened further this year in Spain. At the end of it, Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, extended his winter-quarters as far as Gades, and the ocean. Mago took up his above the Sallus Castulonensis, in the maritime parts; and Asdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, cantoned his body of troops in the neighbourhood of Saguntum. About this time the Carthaginians sent

- a a squadron to Tarentum, to cut off all supplies from the Roman garrison in the citadel there; but they incommoded their allies the Tarentines more than the enemy, since it was found impossible to convey, either by sea or land, a quantity of provisions, sufficient to support both the people of Tarentum, and the forces on board the Carthaginian galleys. Though the latter therefore for some time blocked up the citadel by sea, they could not carry their point, the Romans there being amply provided with all things necessary, and having a large train of military engines, wherewith to annoy the enemy. Hannibal, now finding the Carthaginian affairs going swiftly to decay in Italy, as well as Sicily and Spain, could not forbear cursing Hanno, and his faction, for the detention of those succours, which had so long been promised him. This, which was effected by their artifice, did not only prevent the conquest of Italy, but proved the total ruin of the African republic, the hitherto formidable rival of Rome, as will more clearly appear in the future course of this history ¹.

- The next campaign the Romans made themselves masters of Salapia, by the assistance of one Blasius, a Salapian, who had always been a secret well-wisher to the Romans. As the particulars of this action have been already related at large, we shall not dwell upon them here; but only observe, that Hannibal lost a body of his best horse in it, which proved much more fatal to him, than the loss of Salapia, since his cavalry could never after this blow, if Livy may be credited, make head against that of the Romans, to which it had always been before superior. About this time a Tarentine squadron, commanded by Nicon, defeated a Roman fleet sent to supply the citadel with provisions, under the conduct of D. Quintius, who was killed in the action. But, to make amends for this disaster, a Roman detachment, consisting of two thousand men, fell upon four thousand Tarentine foragers, and, through the conduct and bravery of their leader C. Persius, intirely defeated them, putting the greatest part of them to the sword ^m.

The Romans take Salapia; but are defeated at sea by the Tarentines.

- ABOUT this time, the Romans being resolved to chastise the Brutians for their attachment to the Carthaginians, Lævinus, the Roman general in Sicily, transported a body of four thousand men, consisting chiefly of robbers, from Agathyrna to Rhegium, in order to enable the garrison of this last city to lay waste the whole country of Brutium. As most of the men, of which this corps was formed, had been guilty of the most enormous crimes, and committed great depredations in Sicily for a considerable period of time, the Romans could not have pitched upon any troops more proper to execute such a design. Lævinus likewise served another wise end by sending this band of villains to Rhegium; for by this means he preserved the tranquillity and repose of the island of Sicily, which must have been greatly disturbed by the continuance of such a gang of banditti at Agathyrna ⁿ.

- Scipio*, having taken care to get his naval forces in readiness to put to sea early in the spring, and appointed Tarraco the place of rendezvous for the forces of his Spanish allies, upon their assembling there, ordered the main body of the army to defile from thence to the Iberus, himself following at the head of five thousand Spaniards. Here he harangued the soldiery, insisting largely upon all those topics, that, he thought, would be the most apt to inspire them with resentment and resolution. After this, leaving M. Syllanus, with three thousand foot, and three hundred horse, to prevent all disorders in those parts of Spain, he passed the Iberus, with an army of twenty-five thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse. As almost all the riches of Spain were deposited in New Carthage, a city situated, like Old Carthage, upon a peninsula, betwixt a noble port and a lake, which last served as a fence to the western and northern parts of the wall, he formed a design upon it. To the attack of this place he was likewise further excited by the commodiousness of its harbour, which was capacious enough to receive any fleet, and so near the coast of Africa, that the Romans, when in possession of it, might easily make a descent on the Carthaginian territories there. Upon his arrival here, Scipio made a speech to his troops, importing, "That as all the wealth of the enemy amassed in Spain, all their engines of battery and military machines, all the hostages of the Spaniards to the Carthaginians, which alone secured the fidelity of the former to the latter, together with the principal, if not only, granary the Carthaginians had in Spain, were lodged in that city, by the reduction of it they should, in a manner, terminate the war, at least in that part of the world, with their proud rival." Mago, who, according to some authors, commanded in the town, or, as Valerius Antias ^a will have it, Arme, upon Scipio's approach, made the necessary dispositions for a vigorous defence. He posted two thousand of the citizens in that part of the town which fronted the Roman camp, five hundred Carthaginians in the citadel, and five hundred more upon an eminence in the eastern part of the city. He likewise ordered another body to be ready to move, where-ever the efforts of the enemy should render their assistance necessary, at a moment's warning. The Romans did not only repulse the enemy in a sally they made upon them, but likewise pursued them with such ardour, that, had not Scipio caused a retreat to be sounded, they had entered pell-mell with the Carthaginians into the town. This so intimidated the troops in garrison, that they abandoned many of their posts, and, in a manner, deserted the ^b ramparts; which when Scipio observed, advancing to an eminence called Mercurius Teutates, he immediately ordered a vigorous attack to be made on those parts of the wall, which were most exposed, his fleet at the same time forwarding the operations of the land-forces, by assailing the town on the sea side. After a bloody and obstinate dispute, the Romans carried the place sword in hand, Scipio greatly animating his men, by flying from place to place to give his orders, as occasion required; and some fishermen of Tarraco enabling one of his detachments to enter the town on the side of the stagnum or morass, which seemed almost inaccessible. The commandant retired into the citadel; but was so vigorously pressed by the Romans, that he soon found himself obliged to surrender at discretion. Till the ^c surrender of the citadel, the slaughter was general; but afterwards quarter was given, the soldiers being chiefly intent upon plunder. The Romans made ten thousand freemen, besides a prodigious number of women, children, and slaves, prisoners, together with three hundred, or, according to others, seven hundred twenty-five Spanish hostages, whom the Roman general immediately dismissed. They found in the place an hundred and twenty of the greater catapults, two hundred eighty-one of the lesser sort; twenty-three of the larger balistæ, fifty-two of the smaller; an inconceivable number of darts, and other missile weapons; besides many of the machines called scorpions, together with seventy four military ensigns. An immense quantity of gold and silver, both in money and plate, fell into Scipio's hands. But as the authors ^d Livy followed, particularly Silenus and Valerius Antias, greatly differed in this point, as well as with regard to the strength of the Carthaginian garrison, the number of captives, the quantity of shipping seized in the port, and the provisions, naval stores, &c. found on board, we shall beg leave to refer our readers, for their further satisfaction on those heads, to that writer himself, and to the circumstantial account we have already given of this glorious action in a former part of our history.

The Carthaginians seem to despise the Romans, notwithstanding the progress of their arms.

THE Carthaginians, for some time, endeavoured to suppress the news of the blow they had received in Spain by the reduction of New Carthage, being apprehensive, that as soon as the Spaniards received intelligence of that unexpected event, they would, to a man, declare in favour of the Romans. But not being able long to conceal so remarkable a disgrace, they were obliged at last to own it, though they put ^e as good a face upon the matter as they well could, in the present melancholy situation of affairs, in order to palliate their own shameful behaviour at the late attack. They gave out, "That Scipio had stolen the town by surprize; that the conquest was of " little importance, notwithstanding the young commander affected to cry it up as " equivalent to a signal victory; and that, upon the approach of three Carthaginian " generals, at the head of three victorious armies, he would presently be thrown into " a panic, and have his mind intirely occupied by the frightful idea of the havock " lately made in his family." Notwithstanding which suggestions, they were perfectly sensible of the great loss they had sustained, and of the fatal influence the reduction of so important a fortress must necessarily have upon their affairs. The polite ^f as well as generous treatment the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, regulus of the Ilergetes, all the daughters of Indibilis, those of the principal Spanish nobility, a young lady of most attractive charms betrothed to Allucius, prince of the Celtiberians, and Allucius himself, met with from Scipio, will more naturally fall under our observ-

a ation, when we come to the history of Spain; for which reason we shall content ourselves with having barely mentioned it in this place ^P.

Marcellus, after the taking of Salapia, advancing into Samnium, made himself master of Maronea and Mela, two cities of that country, by assault. Three thousand Carthaginian soldiers, left there by Hannibal, were all either killed or taken prisoners. Two hundred and forty thousand bushels of wheat, together with an hundred and ten thousand of barley, and some plunder, that the troops partook of, were found in those fortresses; but this could by no means be deemed a sufficient compensation for the great defeat Hannibal gave the proconsul Cn. Fulvius at Herdonea about the same time. The Roman general, being apprised, that the citizens of Herdonea shewed a disposition to abandon the Carthaginian interest; moved that way, to encourage them to declare themselves. Hannibal, by his spies, receiving intelligence of this motion, as well as the reason of it, advanced likewise into the neighbourhood of that city, with such celerity, that Fulvius had no notice of his approach. However, upon Hannibal's offering battle to the Romans, an engagement ensued, wherein the legionaries behaved with great bravery, till the Carthaginian found means to surround them with his horse. Then they were soon thrown into confusion, and driven out of the field, with the loss of thirteen thousand men, the rest flying to Marcellus in Samnium by different routes. After this victory, Hannibal burnt the city of Herdonea; put to death as many of the nobility, who had kept a secret correspondence with Fulvius, as he could discover, and transplanted the body of the citizens to Metapontum and Thurii. Upon the first news of Fulvius's overthrow, Marcellus moved out of Samnium into Lucania, to give a check to the progress of the Carthaginian arms, and came up with Hannibal near the town of Numistro. Both sides immediately shewed a disposition to fight, and drew up their armies in order of battle without delay. Hannibal posted his right wing on an eminence, and Marcellus his left close by the town. The action was very sharp, but not decisive, the night obliging both sides to retire. Hannibal, not judging it expedient to renew the attack the next morning, decamped in the night, bending his march for Venusia; where, in a few days, the Roman army arrived. Some slight skirmishes happened here betwixt the advanced guards of both parties; but nothing of moment was undertaken by either of the generals, they being wholly employed in watching one another's motions. A conspiracy, formed against the Roman troops in Capua, being detected; the conspirators received condign punishment. Syphax, about this time, sent an embassy to Rome, notifying to the senate certain advantages he had lately gained over the Carthaginians, with a declaration, that no power was considered by him in a more hostile light, than the state of Carthage, nor in a more friendly one, than that of Rome. Towards the close of this campaign, Hamilcar, with a Carthaginian squadron, consisting of forty galleys, hovered about the coasts of Sardinia, and, not meeting with any Roman fleet to oppose him, ravaged all the country about Olbia and Caralis. The Sicilian banditti above-mentioned, about this time, did not only destroy with fire and sword a good part of Brutium, but likewise laid siege to the city of Caulonia ^q.

Hannibal, having taken up his winter-quarters near Canusium, used all possible means to excite the people of that city to a revolt from the Romans; which reaching the ears of Marcellus, he advanced to Canusium, encamped over-against Hannibal, and soon found means to draw him to a battle. The contending armies, being separated by the night, at first parted upon equal terms; but the next day, the encounter being renewed, Hannibal worsted the Romans. This extremely chagrined Marcellus, who hitherto had never received any disgrace from the Carthaginians; but now, besides the field of battle, lost near three thousand men, amongst whom were four centurions, and two military tribunes, together with six standards, that were taken by the enemy. Being therefore filled with indignation and resentment, he resolved to venture another engagement with Hannibal, who, on his part, seemed determined not to decline the challenge. Marcellus posted the left wing, and those cohorts, that, in the last action, had lost their colours, in front; the twentieth legion he placed to the right; and appointed Cornelius Lentulus and C. Claudius Nero to command both wings, whilst the main body was committed to his conduct. Hannibal posted the Spaniards in front, and disposed his other forces in the usual manner. The fight was obstinate and bloody; the Carthaginian elephants overthrowing many of the Roman a standards, breaking the enemy's ranks, and treading under foot such a number of them, that their army must have been absolutely ruined, had not Decimus Flavius, a military tribune, advanced boldly against them, at the head of a party of dart-men, who wounding most of those huge animals by a shower of their pila discharged upon them, they turned upon their own men with such fury, that they were thrown into disorder; which enabled the Romans to drive Hannibal to his camp, after they had laid eight thousand Carthaginians dead upon the spot. Marcellus however lost above three thousand men in the action, and had almost all the rest wounded; inso-much that he found himself not capable of pursuing Hannibal, when his spies informed him, that he was retreating into Brutium. During these transactions, the Hirpini, b Lucani, and Volscentes, submitted to the consul Fulvius, delivering all the troops Hannibal had left in their cities for garrisons, into his hands. Paſſius and Vitius likewise, two of the principal noblemen amongst the Brutii, endeavoured to procure for their countrymen the same terms, that had been granted to their neighbours. Q. Fabius, the other consul, about the same time, took by storm Manduria, a city of the Salentines, making four thousand men therein prisoners of war. After this instance of success, Fabius sat down before Tarentum. As the Carthaginians had then no fleet in those seas, having sent all their galleys to the island Corcyra, in order to assist king Philip, then at war with the Ætolians, he found no difficulty in making his approaches by sea as well as by land. Whilst these things happened, Hannibal c advanced with a strong body of troops to Caulonia; which obliged the Sicilian forces above-mentioned to retire to an eminence at some distance from that town.

Fabius had no occasion to push on long the siege of Tarentum. An accident, that could not be foreseen, threw that place into his hands. It happened, that the commandant of the Brutian garrison, which Hannibal left for the defence of that place, fell desperately in love with a girl, whose brother was a soldier in the Roman army. This person being informed by his sister, in a letter, of the great interest she had with the commandant, he immediately communicated the matter to Fabius, who ordered him to go into the city as a deserter, and to try whether he could not, by his sister's influence, prevail upon her gallant to introduce the Romans into the town. d This was happily effected, without any great effusion of blood, since the Tarentines found themselves not able to make head against the Romans, after the Brutians had deserted them. Nicox and Democrates, two of the Tarentine leaders, died gloriously, on the bed of honour, fighting for the liberties of their country; and Philomenes, by whose agency Tarentum had been betrayed to Hannibal, was supposed to have thrown himself headlong from off his horse into a well, after the end of the action. Carthalo, who commanded the body of native Carthaginians in the place, was put to the sword, together with a good number of his men, as well as the greatest part of the Tarentines, and many even of the Brutians themselves, who, one would have thought, had merited better treatment. All authors agree, that the plunder taken here e was immense, and even equal to what Marcellus found in Syracuse. The number of slaves made prisoners amounted to thirty thousand. Fabius took care to dismantle Tarentum, and to demolish the wall, that separated the town from the citadel. About this time Hannibal, having, for a considerable term, surrounded the body of Sicilian banditti posted on the eminence near Caulonia above-mentioned, forced them to surrender at discretion.

feated by Scipio in Spain.*

THE Carthaginians had this year three armies in Spain, commanded by three of their best generals, viz. Asdrubal the son of Hamilcar, Asdrubal the son of Gisco, and Mago. Edeco, or Edeſco, a general of great fame amongst the Spaniards, abandoning the Carthaginian interest about the beginning of the summer, came over to Scipio. f His wife and children had been, for some time, in the Roman camp; but a regard to their safety did not so much induce him to act the part he had done, according to Livy, as that sincere affection for the Romans, with which Scipio had inspired all the Spaniards, by his great humanity, politeness, and condescension. Indibilis, Mandonius, and most of the other Spanish reguli, charmed with the same amiable qualities, joined Scipio with all their forces. By this accession of strength, that general found himself enabled to hazard an engagement with Asdrubal the son of Hamilcar, who lay encamped near the city of Batula, or, as Polybius calls it, Bæcula. Scipio

a was impatient of delay, as fearing the junction of Asdrubal and his colleagues. The Carthaginian discovered the same eagerness for a battle on his part, as finding the Roman army to be daily reinforced by the accession of Spanish troops, and his own diminished in proportion, by the continual desertion of those troops. Scipio, upon his approach towards the Carthaginian camp, detached some parties of his velites to reconnoitre the enemy, who, having fallen in with some of their advanced guards, defeated them, pursued them to their camp, and then returned, without any loss, to their own army. Animated by this event, Scipio, the next day, attacked the Carthaginians, though Asdrubal had taken care to post himself upon an eminence in the midst of a plain, surrounded so by a river, as to form a peninsula, the preceding night, in a most advantageous manner. The Carthaginians, for some time, defended themselves with great bravery; but were at last totally routed, and forced to fly, according to Livy, with the loss of eight thousand men killed upon the spot, besides ten thousand foot, and two thousand horse, taken prisoners; though the same most consistent historian had just before informed us, that their retreat was cut off in such a manner, that it was impossible for any of them to escape. This blow, next to the bravery of the Roman troops, may be attributed to the violence of the Carthaginian elephants, which, being galled by the enemy's pila, recoiled upon the forces with which they were intermixed, and struck them with as much terror, as did the Romans. Scipio gave the Carthaginian camp up to his soldiers to be plundered, and released all the Spanish prisoners found there without ransom; but ordered the Africans to be sold for slaves. Asdrubal, rallying the remains of his shattered army, pursued his march towards the Pyrenees, having sent his elephants that way before the beginning of the engagement. The Spanish princes, who had entered into an alliance with Scipio, received considerable presents, for their gallant behaviour in the late battle; Indibilis in particular being ordered by the Roman general to pick three hundred horses out of those taken from the enemy, for his own use. Notwithstanding the glorious victory Scipio had gained, he thought proper to retire from Betula, and the Saltus Castulonensis; which gave the other two Carthaginian commanders an opportunity of joining Asdrubal. At a consultation held for that purpose, each of these generals had his particular province assigned him. Asdrubal, the son of Hamilcar, was to march into Italy, to assist Hannibal, with all the Spanish forces he could draw together; Asdrubal, the son of Gisco, was to take upon himself the command of the corps lately committed to Mago's conduct, and to retire into Lusitania; but industriously to avoid an engagement; and Mago was sent to the Balearic islands, with a large sum of money, to make new levies there. Massinissa had likewise a choice detachment of three thousand horse, being the flower of the cavalry, assigned him, in order to support the Carthaginian allies in Hispania Citerior, as well as to destroy the enemy's country there with fire and sword. As Scipio, by his generous and affable deportment, seemed to be in a fair way of winning the hearts of all the Spaniards, it was judged necessary to make these dispositions, that the Spanish soldiery, in the Carthaginian service, might be drawn immediately either into Gaul, or the remotest part of Spain, where the Romans had not, as yet, got any footing. This, it was hoped, would put an effectual stop to that general desertion, which then prevailed amongst those troops.

f ALL persons of penetration and attention, upon their perusal of the above account, will be naturally inclined to inquire, how it was possible for Asdrubal to have sent all the elephants away, with the train that attended them, towards the Pyrenees, if many of them remained in his camp, and occasioned a greater carnage amongst his troops there, upon the Romans forcing it; how these troops should have been hemmed in, and so surrounded on all sides, by a victorious enemy, that their retreat was intirely cut off, and yet that many of them, nay, the greatest part of them, should have made their escape; how Asdrubal's army should have been intirely ruined, and yet that Scipio, immediately after the action, should have been obliged to retire to Tarraco, which enabled the other two Carthaginian generals to join Asdrubal, and concert with him the operations of the remaining part of the campaign, which the Romans, above all things, ought to have prevented; lastly, what were the happy consequences of this defeat, which Scipio is said to have given the Carthaginians. In short, from the above-recited particulars, it appears, that, to use Sir

Walter Raleigh's witty expression, the Romans beat Asdrubal out of Spain into Italy, a there to join Hannibal with the most numerous Carthaginian army, that ever appeared in that country, (for so Livy represents it) had not a disaster prevented that junction. If Polybius countenanced such relations as these in any manner, (and even that most incomparable historian is not absolutely void of weakness and partiality) he is so far to be censured. But to proceed :

A party of Numidians cut off the famous Marcellus, and in per's the escorte that attended him.

THE next year, being the eleventh of the second Punic war, the Carthaginians threatened to ravage the coasts of Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia, with a fleet of above two hundred sail ; of which Scipio being apprised, he detached fifty galleys to cruise off the ports of Sardinia, and protect that island from all insults of the enemy. The consul T. Quinctius Crispinus sent for a large train of battering engines from Sicily, intending soon to form the siege of Locri, his fleet having already blocked that city up on the sea-side. But he laid aside that design on Hannibal's approach [to Lacinium, and on receiving advice, that his colleague Marcellus had drawn his forces from Venusia, in order to join him. Hannibal, being apprised, that both the consuls were encamped within three miles of one another, betwixt Bantia and Venusia, moved that way, pitching his tents at a small distance from them. Notwithstanding the summer was far advanced, the consuls wrote to L. Cincius, ordering him to come with a fleet from Sicily to Locri, a body of Romans from Tarentum being commanded to invest that city by land at the same time. This being discovered to Hannibal by some Thurians, he placed an ambuscade for that corps ; into which having drawn them, he put two thousand of them to the sword, took twelve hundred prisoners, and dispersed the rest. He afterwards decoyed the two consuls into another ambuscade of Numidian horse, together with M. Marcellus, son to one of them, and A. Manlius, both of them legionary tribunes, attended only by an escorte of two hundred and twenty horse, of which forty were Fregellani, and the rest Etruscans. The brave Marcellus, one of them, who had acquired such renown by the several advantages he got over Hannibal, lost his life, through the cowardice of the Etruscans, who fled at the first onset. But Crispinus, his colleague, with the two tribunes above-mentioned, L. Arennius, M. Aulus, two prefects of the Roman allies, and others, by their own bravery, and that of the Fregellani, made their escape in the manner we have already related ^a.

Hannibal obliges the Romans to raise the siege of Locri.

Mago, the Carthaginian commandant at Locri, found himself so pressed by Cincius, that he was upon the point of surrendering ; but receiving advice of the blow Hannibal had given the Romans, by the slaughter of Marcellus, he resolved to defend the place to the last drop of blood. Soon after, an express arrived from Hannibal, with an account, that the Numidian cavalry had already begun their march for Locri ; and that he himself, with the gross of the army, would follow them with all possible expedition. Upon the first appearance of the Numidians, Mago made a sally with his whole force upon the besiegers, and, after an obstinate dispute, the Numidians coming up in the nick of time, forced them to abandon their works, and leave all their battering engines, and other military machines, behind them ; so that Hannibal, upon his arrival at Locri, found no enemy to oppose him there. About this time, Valerius, the Roman admiral, after having ravaged the coast of Africa, attacked a Carthaginian squadron of eighty-three galleys off of Capua. The Carthaginians, not being able to withstand the efforts of the Romans, were soon obliged to sheer off, with the loss of eighteen ships ; which Valerius carried off in triumph. From thence steering for Sicily, he arrived in a short time, with an immense booty, at Lilybæum ^w.

The Carthaginians are guilty of a breach of faith with regard to Philip king of Macedon.

THOUGH the Carthaginians had lately sent a fleet to assist Philip against the Romans and Ætolians, which, in all probability, was at this time either cruising off of the island Corcyra, or riding at anchor in the port there, yet we do not find, that this fleet did any important service to that prince. It neither protected his coasts from the insults of the Roman and Ætolian privateers, nor enabled him to transport any forces to Italy, or any other country, that it might have been his interest to have invaded. The Carthaginians therefore by no means observed the treaty of alliance they had entered into with that prince ; which doubtless incensed him to such a degree, that he, for the future, broke off all correspondence with them. Be that as it will, it is certain he not only made a peace with the Romans exclusive of them, a which was an apparent infraction of the late treaty, provided they had paid any regard to it, but likewise left them to cope with the Romans alone, both before and after his accommodation with that people; which was also contrary to the late treaty, upon the aforesaid supposition. But as the discussion of this point belongs more properly to the history of Macedon, we shall at present pass by every thing farther relating to it, and proceed to the Carthaginian affairs in Italy ¹.

Asdrubal, as we have lately observed, being obliged to abandon his camp near Batula, had afterwards a conference with the other two Carthaginian generals, wherein the operations of the campaign were settled. In pursuance of the plan then formed, Asdrubal advanced towards the Pyrenees, at the head of the forces assigned him, with all possible expedition. The Pyrenees, as far as we can collect from history, he crossed, without any great difficulty, though, if Livy may be credited, Scipio had detached a body of troops to dispute the passage of that ridge of mountains with him. As the silver-mines (Q) near Batula had supplied him with a very considerable quantity of treasure, upon his arrival in Gaul, he not only prevailed upon the Gauls to grant him a passage through their territories, but likewise to furnish him with a proper number of recruits. The Ligurians received him in the same manner, as would also the Etruscans, could he have advanced to their frontiers. Asdrubal therefore, meeting with as little opposition, and as many favourable circumstances, to facilitate and expedite his march, as he could hope for, arrived at Placentia sooner than either the Romans, or even his brother Hannibal himself, expected. But sitting down before this place, contrary to the rules of sound policy, and continuing the siege of it, he gave the Romans an opportunity of assembling all their forces to attack him, and at the same time, by his too great security, as well as the enterprize he had undertaken, prevented Hannibal from joining him, as he had proposed to do, upon the first news of his having passed the Alps. This indolence of Hannibal proceeded from a notion, that Placentia would not be soon reduced, and that therefore, though they should unite their forces, they could not speedily enter upon any military operation. Thus Asdrubal not only lost all the advantages he might have reaped from the friendship of the Arverni, and other Gallie nations, who had so greatly expedited his passage to Italy, by this single step, but likewise totally ruined the Carthaginian affairs in that country, as will soon most evidently appear ².

As soon as Hannibal moved out of his winter-quarters, he ordered a body of troops to march into the country of the Salentines, with an intention to ravage it, before the consul Claudius could take the field; but this was prevented by the conduct and bravery of C. Hostilius Tubulus, who attacked the Carthaginians with a body of light-armed troops, and intirely defeated them, killing four thousand of their men upon the spot. After this disaster, Hannibal retired into Brutium, to prevent his being hemmed in by the enemy, who began now to advance against him from several parts. In the mean time Tubulus, with his forces, joined the consular army under Claudius at Venusia. Hannibal, having drawn all his garrisons out of Brutium, and by this means reinforced his army, marched to Grumentum in Lucania, in order to recover some towns, that, through fear, had revolted to the Romans. As, immediately after the late junction, Claudius had sent a detachment, under the command of Tubulus, to reinforce the proconsul Fulvius at Capua, and, with the remaining corps, consisting of forty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, had himself gone in quest of Hannibal, he arrived at Grumentum soon after the Carthaginian, and encamped within five hundred paces of him. Claudius, by the stratagem formerly mentioned, and the bravery of C. Aurunculeius, tribune of the third legion, gave Hannibal another defeat here, cutting off eight thousand of his men, and taking seven

(Q) Polybius tells us, that, near New Carthage, there was a silver mine so rich, that the Carthaginians extracted out of it every day twenty-five thousand drachms of silver. Alester, the discoverer of this mine, was, according to the same author, deified by the Spaniards after his death, for the service he thereby did his country. Aristotle and Posidonius intimate, that Spain, in the most early ages, abounded with silver; insomuch that the Phœnicians exported vast quantities of that metal from thence, which they purchased for oil, and other trifles; nay, the first author assures us, that the Phœnicians, by this means, had not only immense quantities of plate, but that even the very anchors of their ships were made of silver. But of this more, when we come to the history of Spain (23).

hundred prisoners. Four elephants were likewise killed, and two taken, in the action. Nine military ensigns, and some plunder, also fell into the hands of the Romans, who, according to Livy, lost only two hundred men on this occasion. Hannibal, soon after this blow, decamped in the night, and, by leaving a few Numidian horse in his intrenchments to amuse the enemy, made good his retreat to Venusia; but here the consul came up again with him. At this place, in another rencounter, the Carthaginians lost two thousand men; upon which Hannibal retired, with great precipitation, to Metapontum, where he was joined by Hanno, and from thence made the best of his way to Canusium.

The consul Claudius moves towards his colleague.

DURING these transactions, Asdrubal, being obliged to raise the siege of Placentia, began his march for Umbria. Of this the consul Claudius being informed by a letter, sent from that general to his brother Hannibal, which was intercepted near Tarentum, he put himself at the head of a detachment of seven thousand men, the very flower of his troops, and posted with incredible celerity to join his colleague Livius. Though no general was allowed to leave his own province, to go into that of another, by the Roman laws; yet in a conjuncture of so delicate and important a nature as this, when the safety, and even the very being, of Rome lay at stake, he thought himself at liberty to dispense with the established rules of war, for the welfare of his country. He had no sooner received the letter above-mentioned from L. Virginus, a legionary tribune, who had escorted the Carthaginian couriers with a Samnite detachment to him, and read it, than he sent it to the senate, at the same time dispatching his orders to the Larinates, Marrucini, Frentani, Pratutiani, &c. through whose territories he was to pass, to provide a sufficient quantity of provisions and carriages for his troops, that he might pursue his march without the least interruption. As nothing could save Rome, after the junction of the two Carthaginian armies, in order to prevent this, he judged it proper to strike such a bold and unexpected blow, as would terrify the enemy; which, he imagined, might be done, could he and his colleague vigorously charge Asdrubal with their united forces. This reflection determined him to make the movement mentioned here, after having left the command of the troops in the camp to Q. Cadius, one of his lieutenants.

Claudius gave not the least hint of his design to any of his officers, till he was got at such a distance from Hannibal, that the communication of it to the troops could not be of any ill consequence to him. He then only in general told them, "That he was leading them to certain victory; that his colleague wanted a reinforcement; that in war all depended upon reputation; that the bare rumour of their arrival would disconcert all the measures of the Carthaginians; and that the whole honour of this battle would fall to them." He marched with such expedition, that in six days he arrived at Sena, where Livius lay encamped within half a mile of the Carthaginians. Soon after his arrival, Asdrubal, taking a view of the Roman army, discovered several shields of an ancient make, that he had never seen before, many thin, lean horses, which had been greatly fatigued, and that the Roman army was apparently more numerous than the day before. By these, and several other circumstances, that able general suspected Claudius to have joined his colleague with a body of troops. This threw him into a sort of melancholy, as imagining, that Hannibal had been overthrown, and consequently that he came too late to support him.

defeat Asdrubal upon the banks of the Metaurus.

BEFORE the arrival of Claudius, the prætor L. Portius Licinus was encamped, with some forces, at a small distance from the consul Livius. Immediately after that important event, a council of war was held, in which the three commanders presided. Livius gave his opinion, that an action, for some days, should be deferred, that Claudius's troops might have time to refresh themselves, after so tedious and fatiguing a march. Claudius himself entertained different sentiments, imagining, that nothing could prove more fatal to the republic, than the least delay to give the enemy battle at this critical juncture. His advice was complied with, and the signal of battle accordingly given. However, Asdrubal, under the apprehensions above-mentioned, caused a retreat to be sounded, and his army began to march in great disorder. Night overtaking him, and his guides deserting him, he was uncertain what way to go. He marched at random along the banks of the Metaurus, now the Metaro, and was preparing to cross it, when the united forces of the enemy came up with him. In this extremity, he saw it would be impossible for him to avoid coming to an engagement, a and therefore did all things, which could be expected from the presence of mind and courage of a consummate warrior. He seized an advantageous post, and drew up his forces on a narrow spot, which gave him an opportunity of posting his left wing, composed of Gauls, and the weakest part of his army, in such a manner, that it neither could be attacked in front, nor charged in flank; and of giving his main battle, and right wing, consisting of Spaniards, all veteran troops, a greater depth than front. After this hasty disposition of his forces, he posted himself in the centre, and first moved to attack the enemy's left wing, commanded by the consul Livius, well knowing, that all was at stake, and that he must either conquer or die. The battle lasted a long time, and was obstinately disputed by both parties. Asdrubal b especially signalized himself in this engagement, and quite completed the glory he had acquired by a series of shining actions. He led on his soldiers, who were trembling, and quite despirited, against an enemy superior to them both in numbers and resolution. He animated them by his words, supported them by his example, and, with intreaties and menaces intermixed, endeavoured to bring back those who fled; till at last, seeing that victory declared for the Romans, and being unable to survive the loss of so many thousand men, who had quitted their country to follow his fortune, he rushed at once into the midst of a Roman cohort, and there died in a manner worthy the son of Hamilcar, and brother of Hannibal c.

c THIS victory, which Livy makes equal to that of Cannæ, was almost intirely owing to the bravery and activity of Claudius. That general flew like lightning from one part of the army to another, insomuch that he seemed to be in all places at once. Observing that the enemy's right wing, composed of Spaniards and Ligurians, the flower of Asdrubal's troops, charged the left of the Romans with such resolution, that fortune seemed to be on the point of declaring for the Carthaginians there, and that the enemy's elephants, after having thrown the Roman vanguard into confusion, and overturned the standards there, occupied the void space betwixt the two armies in such a manner, that it was difficult to discover to what party they belonged, their guides now not being capable of governing them, he cried out to his men in an angry tone, To what purpose then have we made so long a march with such expedition? d and immediately made an effort to possess himself of an eminence, that covered the Gauls, in order to penetrate to the enemy on that side; but, finding this impossible, he drew out a detachment of some cohorts from the right wing, with which wheeling about, in order to sustain Livius, he charged the Spaniards and Ligurians in front, in flank, and in rear, almost at the same time. This changed the face of affairs, especially as such an attack was unexpected, and made with the utmost fury. The Spaniards and Ligurians therefore, not being able to sustain so violent a shock, were soon put to the rout, and almost all cut to pieces; after which the Gauls were, for the most part, massacred without opposition. The leaders themselves destroyed most of the elephants, to prevent the destruction they would have occasioned amongst e their own troops, upon whom they turned all their rage, after they were wounded by the enemy. According to Livy, fifty-six thousand of Asdrubal's men fell in this bloody action, and near six thousand were taken prisoners; though Polybius makes the whole loss of the Carthaginians not to have exceeded ten thousand men. Be that as it will, the Romans seemed to have been weary of killing, since when a person told Livius, after the battle, that it would be an easy matter to cut off a body of Cisalpine Gauls and Ligurians, who had either not been in the fight, or escaped out of it, then flying in great confusion, with a small detachment of horse, he answered, It is fit that some should survive, to carry the enemy the news of their defeat, and our bravery. Livy affirms, that the Romans carried off an immense quantity of gold and silver, f as well as plunder of other kinds; but Polybius is silent on that head. This action proved decisive, since we may justly esteem it to have determined the fate of Italy, as the battle of Zama a few years afterwards did that of Africa d.

Hannibal received no intelligence of this blow, till Claudius advertised him of it, by throwing his brother Asdrubal's head into his trenches, immediately after he arrived at the Roman camp near Canusium. This inhumanity was the more inexcuse-

The victory almost intirely owing to the conduct and bravery of Claudius.

able, as Hannibal had given the Romans recent instances of a generous and noble disposition, by treating with the utmost decency, not to say tenderness and respect, the bodies of Gracchus and Marcellus. That treatment, in our opinion, demonstrates the great humanity of Hannibal, if not of the Carthaginians in general, on such occasions; as the savage barbarity of Claudius does that of the Romans. As Claudius sent two captives in chains, which, one should have imagined, would have been mortifying enough, to inform Hannibal of his brother's fatal overthrow, nothing can equal, vindicate, or even palliate, the ferity of that barbarian. All the glory he had acquired by his late conduct in the battle of Metaurus, which certainly ought not to be denied him, served only to render him more hateful and detestable, since nothing can be more monstrous, than such a contrast of qualities in the same person. ^b That the fact, here alledged against him, was real, is allowed by the most prejudiced Roman historians themselves, who seem to relate it with pleasure, and thereby reflect an eternal dishonour both upon themselves and their republic, as intimating, that they were all pleased with it, and consequently of the same disposition with Claudius. The justness of this reflection is confirmed by the high encomium Valerius Maximus passes upon the noble and humane behaviour of Hannibal hinted at, which ought to be looked upon as a severe reprehension of the conduct of Claudius. In short, we think, a more lively instance of the Roman disposition at this juncture, with regard to humanity and greatness of soul, than that just hinted at, does not occur in history. It is pity but we had the Carthaginian annals for this particular period; they would doubtless have set the Romans in their true and proper light ^c.

greatly affected at the news of his brother's defeat and death.

THE melancholy news imparted to him by Claudius, filled Hannibal with horror and sadness. He perceived, by this cruel stroke, the fortune of Carthage: It is done, said he, according to Horace, in that beautiful ode, where this defeat is described, I will no longer send triumphant messages to Carthage! In losing Asdrubal, I have lost at once all my hope, all my good fortune! After this fatal event, Hannibal retired to the extremity of Brutium, where, assembling all his forces, he remained, for a considerable time, in a state of inaction, the Romans not daring to disturb him, so formidable did they deem him alone, though every thing about him went to wreck, and the Carthaginian affairs seemed not far from the verge of destruction. ^d Livy tells us, it was a difficult thing to determine, whether his conduct was more wonderful in prosperity or adversity. Notwithstanding which, Brutium being at best but a small province, and many of its inhabitants being either forced into the service, or forming themselves into parties of banditti, so that a great part of it remained uncultivated, he found it a difficult matter to subsist there, especially as no manner of supplies were sent him from Carthage. The people there were as solicitous of preserving their possessions in Spain, and as little concerned at the situation of affairs in Italy, as if Hannibal had met with an uninterrupted course of success, and not the least disaster had befallen them since his first arrival in that country ^e.

were worsted
in Spain.

AFTER Asdrubal's departure for Italy, Hanno was sent to succeed him in Spain. ^e The body of troops this general brought from Africa, in conjunction with that Mago commanded in Celtiberia, formed a considerable army. These forces encamped in Celtiberia, and at some distance from them, in the same province, nine thousand Celtiberians had posted themselves. Scipio sent a detachment of ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, under the command of M. Syllanus the proprætor, to attack the enemy, if an opportunity offered. The proprætor, receiving ample intelligence of the situation and disposition of both camps from some Celtiberian deserters, who conducted him to that of their countrymen, was thereby enabled to gain a signal advantage over the enemy. He surprised the Celtiberians, being, for the most part, new-raised men, putting many of them to the sword, and obliging the rest to disperse in ^f the adjacent woods, from whence they retired to their respective habitations. Hanno and Mago, towards the end of the action, advancing to their relief, were likewise defeated, and Hanno taken prisoner. Mago, with the cavalry, and a good part of the veteran infantry, made his escape, and, ten days afterwards, joined Asdrubal the son of Gisco. These two commanders, with their united forces, continued, for some time, in the neighbourhood of Gades ^g.

- a ACCORDING to some authors, Scipio, being apprised of Asdrubal's march for Italy, The Carthaginian affairs go to decay in Spain. had before sent a considerable reinforcement to the consul Livius, to enable him to make head against the Carthaginian forces under Asdrubal and Hannibal, provided neither of the consular armies could hinder their junction. But the greatest part of the Roman historians have omitted this circumstance; which seems to invalidate the authority of those writers in this particular. Be that as it will, Scipio had no sooner received intelligence of the enemy's defeat in Italy, than he put himself in motion, and began to meditate the intire conquest of Spain. His brother, L. Scipio, being detached with a body of ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to take the city of Oringis, on the confines of Lower Bætica, executed his orders with great bravery, making the Carthaginian garrison, and three hundred of the inhabitants, who shut the gates against him, prisoners of war, with the loss only of ninety men. Livy says, that the Roman detachment killed two thousand of the enemy in the attack; and that Lucius, in order to ingratiate himself with the Spaniards, left the citizens in possession of the town, and all their effects. The territory of Oringis was extremely fruitful, and abounded with silver-mines. In the city itself, Asdrubal had long had a good number of troops, who had not a little harassed the Romans and their allies, by their frequent incursions into the mediterranean parts of the country. The Carthaginians therefore sustained a considerable loss by the reduction of that place. Scipio is said to have complimented his brother highly upon this conquest, telling him, that it was equal to the taking of New Carthage. That general, finding the season far advanced, and that he could make no impression upon the province in which Gades was seated, since Asdrubal had placed numerous garrisons in all the fortresses there, suspended the military operations till the following spring. However, M. Valerius Lævinus the proconsul, who commanded in Sicily, committed great ravages on the coasts of Africa, where he made a descent about this time. Having destroyed with fire and sword all the country about Carthage and Utica, he returned to Lilybæum, defeating, in his passage, a Carthaginian squadron of seventy galleys. Of these he took seventeen, sunk four, and dispersed the rest. Thus were the Romans victorious every-where this campaign, the Carthaginians not being able to cope with them either by sea or land^b.

THE next year, Hannibal sent a detachment of Numidians to observe the motions of the Roman army, under the command of the consuls Q. Cæcilius and L. Veturius, Lucania submits to the Romans. in the territory of Cosentia. That detachment, falling in with one of the enemy's parties, which had been plundering the country, after a short dispute, routed it, and carried off the booty to Hannibal's camp. But this small advantage did not make amends for the loss of Lucania, which submitted to the Romans. Nothing further worth relating happened this campaign betwixt the forces of the two contending republics in Italy^c.

- THE Carthaginian generals, that commanded this year in Spain, were Mago the son of Hamilcar, and Asdrubal the son of Gisco. These two commanders, in the spring, moved from Gades, where, it is probable, they had fixed their winter-quarters, with an army of fifty, or, as others will have it, seventy thousand foot, and four thousand five hundred horse. Advancing with all expedition towards the Romans, whom they were determined to engage, they at last took post in the plains of Silpia, at no great distance from them. Scipio, being extremely alarmed at the approach of so formidable a power, dispatched in all haste Syllanus to Colcas, a neighbouring prince, who had promised Scipio a body of auxiliary troops, to inform him of the enemy's motions. In the mean time he drew his forces out of Tarraco, and, being joined by some of his allies, advanced to Castulo, where he was soon met by Syllanus, with a reinforcement of three thousand foot, and five hundred horse, from Colcas. From thence he marched to Batula, or Bacula, with an army of forty-five thousand strong. Mago and Masinissa, at the head of the Carthaginian cavalry, fell upon the Romans as they were encamping, and had put them into disorder, had not Scipio placed some troops of his horse in ambuscade behind an eminence, near the spot upon which he intended to encamp. These, falling out upon the Carthaginians, obliged them at first to retire with precipitation; but, being afterwards duly supported, so pushed them, that they betook themselves to a downright flight. The light-armed troops on both sides, for some time after this, skirmished with one another; but ^a without any considerable loss. Both Asdrubal and Scipio, for several days together, drew their forces out of their lines, ranged in order of battle, though Asdrubal appeared first in the morning, and retired the last in the evening. At length Scipio, resolving to give the Carthaginians battle, ordered his men to refresh themselves before day-break; and then sent his horse and light-armed troops to brave the enemy. Asdrubal posted the Spaniards in the wings, the elephants in front, and the Carthaginians, intermixed with the other Africans, in the centre. After having made this disposition, he advanced towards the enemy, his cavalry in the mean time keeping their horse in play. Scipio took care to protract the fight till towards noon, imagining, that the Carthaginians must wax faint by that time, as being intirely void of ^b sustenance, and consequently that he should break them without much difficulty. Accordingly then ordering his wings to advance, he attacked Asdrubal's Spanish auxiliaries in front with the legionaries, and in flank at the same time with the velites, sustained by several cohorts, which were commanded to wheel about for that purpose. The Spaniards, after some resistance, were routed, the Carthaginian and African forces not being able to support them, since the Spaniards, that formed Scipio's main body, kept them in awe by moving towards them. The elephants, as had frequently happened of late, occasioned greater confusion in the Carthaginian army, than in that of the enemy. Notwithstanding therefore Asdrubal did his utmost to animate his men, they were defeated, and pursued by the Romans to their camp, ^c which had then been taken, had not a violent storm cooled the ardour of the victors, and put an end to the action ^k.

THE night after the battle, Asdrubal caused his camp to be strengthened by some additional works, as expecting the next day another visit from the enemy. In the mean time Attanes, regulus of the Turdetani, with a considerable body of troops, went over to the Romans. Many other reguli followed this example; and two fortresses of note surrendered to Scipio, who made their garrisons prisoners of war. As the victory lately gained by Scipio had intirely alienated the minds of the Spaniards from the Carthaginians, Asdrubal thought proper to abandon his camp, and retire with precipitation towards the ocean, though he had just before so fatigued his wearied ^d and hungry troops, in order to render his camp inaccessible to the enemy. Scipio, being informed of this, immediately detached his cavalry after the Carthaginian general, who so harassed him in his retreat, that the legionaries at last came up with him, and, after a faint resistance, put all his men, except seven thousand, to the sword. However these, with Asdrubal at their head, gained an advantageous post, where, for some time, they defended themselves, till at last Asdrubal, finding them to desert in great numbers, abandoned them, and made his escape to Gades. In the mean time Syllanus, whom Scipio had left, with a detachment of ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, to block up the enemy's troops in the post above-mentioned, found means to draw Masinissa their commander off from the Carthaginian ^e interest. This unexpected event proved the total ruin of the Carthaginians in those parts, as will hereafter more fully appear. Mago, after the example of Asdrubal, flying to Gades, the remainder of the African forces either gradually dispersed themselves in the neighbouring provinces, or deserted to the Romans. Masinissa, after his late conference with Syllanus, by the connivance of that general, passed over into Africa, with some of the leading men of the Massyli, in order to dispose that nation to second his views. However, this was done in such a manner, as not to give any umbrage to the Carthaginians, nor induce that crafty people to entertain the least suspicion of the measures he was going to pursue ^l.

Masinissa, to serve more effectually the party he intended soon to declare himself ^f in favour of, made but a short stay in Africa. Having prevailed on his subjects to concur with him in the execution of the project he had formed, he hastened to Gades, to confer with Mago and Asdrubal about the future operations. Syllanus likewise retired with his body of forces to Tarraco, where Scipio had fixed his head quarters. Scipio, soon afterwards passing into Africa with two quinqueremes, persuaded Syphax, king of the Massyli, to abandon the Carthaginians, and enter into an alliance with

- a Rome. Aldrubal was then at Syphax's court, and did his utmost to traverse the negotiation carried on betwixt the two powers; but without effect. The three chief cities of Spain, besides Gades, in alliance with, or subject to, Carthage, were Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa. Illiturgi the Romans took by storm, levelled it with the ground, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. Castulo, in which was a Carthaginian garrison, composed of the fugitives, that escaped the carnages in the late defeats, was betrayed by one Crdubellus to Marcus, and Himilco the commandant, with his whole corps, made prisoners of war. Marcus, then passing the Betis, which the Spaniards called Cirtius, possessed himself of two opulent towns, which surrendered at his approach. From thence he advanced to Astapa, and, after a warm dispute, made himself master of it in the manner already related. In the mean time Mago, having received a reinforcement from Africa, as well as of some Spanish troops levied by Hanno, made the proper dispositions for carrying on the war with vigour, notwithstanding the melancholy situation of his affairs. A body of Roman forces, encamped upon the Sucro, during these transactions, mutinied, a report of Scipio's death, that was industriously propagated, occasioning that commotion; but the mutineers being, by a seasonable punishment of some of their ringleaders, brought back to a sense of their duty, Marcus attacked four thousand of the enemy encamped upon the Betis, under the command of Hanno, forced their camp, and either took or killed the greatest part of them. The engaging Syphax to confederate with the
- c Romans, was a very considerable point gained, though this was not effected without some difficulty. Scipio first sent Lælius, with five quinquereines, to make proposals to that prince, which he ordered him to back with magnificent presents. Lælius executed his commission with great dexterity, putting Syphax in mind of the advantages he had reaped from a former alliance with the Romans. Notwithstanding which, Scipio, as we have just observed, found himself obliged to visit in person that prince's court, where, by his uncommon address, if we will believe Livy, he defeated the intrigues of Aldrubal, and put the last hand to the treaty ^m.

- Soon after the reduction of Astapa, some deserters arrived at Gades from Scipio's camp. These fugitives promised that general, not only to deliver the city, together
- d with the Carthaginian garrison and commandant, into his hands, but likewise to make him master of the enemy's whole fleet riding at anchor in the harbour there. Scipio therefore detached Lælius with a body of light-armed troops, assisted by a naval force of one quinquereine, and seven triremes, to put the conspirators in motion. In the mean time the conspiracy being discovered to Mago, before it was ripe for execution, he took care to seize the principals of it, and sent them on board a quinquereine, in order to transport them to Carthage. Aldrubal, the Carthaginian admiral, ordered the captain of this vessel to precede the rest of the fleet, he himself following at a small distance with eight triremes. Upon his approach to Carteia, he descried Lælius's squadron coming out of that port. The Carthaginian could not, for some
- e time, determine whether or no it would be proper for him to attack the Romans; but this state of suspense gave Lælius an opportunity of coming up with him, which obliged him to hazard an engagement; in which being worsted, he made the best of his way towards the coasts of Africa, with only five triremes. However, Lælius missed his aim, since Mago had taken care to give him a proper reception, if he advanced to Gades; of which being apprised by the prisoners, he returned to Carteia, from whence he dispatched an express to Marcus, who was moving with a powerful corps to support him, to inform him of what had happened. Both these commanders therefore, judging the siege of Gades too difficult an enterprize to be undertaken at present, laid aside that design, and, in a short time, rejoined Scipio at New Carthage ⁿ.

THE disappointment the Romans had met with in their design upon Gades, together with the rebellion of the Ilergetes, and revolt of the legions above-mentioned, gave Mago hopes, that he should still be in a condition to make head against the enemy. He therefore wrote to Carthage for a speedy reinforcement, assuring the senate, that, if they would be active and expeditious at this juncture, they might recover what they had lost in Spain. To excite them to make a vigorous effort, he greatly exaggerated the misfortunes of the Romans, giving a melancholy account of the dangers that threatened them. In the mean time Mandonius and Indibilis, being offended at the Romans, for not ceding to them the countries they had conquered, ^a and encouraged by the report of Scipio's death, pillaged the territories of the Sedetani and Suessetani, allies of Rome. Hearing afterwards of Scipio's severity to the ring-leaders of the revolting legionaries, who were Romans, they concluded, that Spanish revoltors must be excluded all hopes of pardon. Animated therefore by despair, they assembled a numerous army of Celtiberians, and advanced against Scipio. That general, moving at the head of his forces with great celerity towards them, at last found them posted in a plain, surrounded on all sides by mountains, and scarce capable of containing such a number of men. Having secured the defile leading into this valley, he detached Lælius, with the cavalry, to take a compass round the hills, and attack the enemy in rear, whilst he charged them in front with the legionaries. ^b This disposition being made, Scipio attacked the reguli, and gave them a total overthrow, putting almost their whole army to the sword. What became of them afterwards, our readers will find in a former part of this history ^c.

Mafiniffa.*

THOUGH Syllanus and Mafiniffa had settled the preliminaries, yet, by several intervening accidents, the conclusion of a treaty betwixt the Numidian and the Romans, was deferred to this time. The chief obstacle to the signing of it was, that Mafiniffa could find no opportunity of having an interview with Scipio, which he ardently desired. Scipio, being informed of this, and that Mafiniffa was at Gades, took a journey thither, with a good escorte, purely out of a desire to have a conference with him. Mafiniffa, receiving intelligence of this from Marcus, prevailed ^c upon Mago to send him, with a detachment from the island of Gades, to ravage the neighbouring part of the continent; which enabled him to confer with Scipio. At their first interview, Mafiniffa told the Roman general, "That, from the time he " had so generously and politely released his nephew, for which he was greatly " obliged to him, he had conceived a sincere affection for him; that, ever since, he " had wished for an opportunity of expressing his high regard for the people of " Rome, which now the gods had blessed him with; that no foreigner could be more " closely attached to them than he was; and that though he could not give sufficient
" proofs of this in Spain, where he was a stranger, yet if the Romans would transfer
" the war to Africa, where he had some interest, he would convince them of the ^d
" purity of his intentions, and at the same time answer for the success of the expedi" tion." Every thing being afterwards settled to the mutual satisfaction of both parties, Mafiniffa, in order to blind Asdrubal, plundered some part of the adjacent country, and then returned to Gades.

Gades surrenders to the Romans.

THE Carthaginians, being disappointed in the diversion they expected from the mutiny of the legionaries, and the rebellion of the Spaniards, ordered Mago to abandon Spain, and sail with all possible expedition to Italy. That he might be enabled the more effectually to succour Hannibal, he received a large sum of money to make levies in Gaul and Liguria. Before he left Gades, he did not only oblige the citizens to bring all their gold and silver to him, but plundered all their temples. In his ^e passage to Italy, he made an attempt upon New Carthage; but was repulsed with great loss. From thence he sailed to the island Pityusa, where he met with a kind reception, receiving a plentiful supply of provisions, and a good number of recruits. Then he steered his course to the largest of the Balearic islands, that had a commodious haven; where endeavouring to put in, he was attacked by the natives in so violent a manner with their slings, that he found himself obliged to sheer off with considerable loss. However, proceeding to the lesser one near it, that was extremely fertile, tho' not so populous and powerful as the other, he entered the port, landed his men, encamped in a place of great strength, and possessed himself of the whole island without opposition. As the season was far advanced, he wintered here; to which he ^f was the more strongly induced by the good disposition of the natives, who expressed all imaginable zeal and affection for the Carthaginians, supplying him, during his stay amongst them, with a body of two thousand men. We must not omit observing, that the people of Gades shut their gates upon Mago after his repulse at New Carthage; for which affront he whipped and crucified their suffetes, who were sent to excuse that conduct to him; nor that they surrendered to the Romans soon after he had abandoned them ^g.

- a THE next summer, Mago, landing in Liguria with an army of twelve thousand foot, and two thousand horse, surprised Genoa. From thence he sailed to the coasts of the Ligures Alpini, to try whether he could not raise some commotions amongst them. The Ingauni, one of their cantons, were then at war with the Epanterii, a sort of highlanders, who likewise belonged to them. This gave Mago an opportunity of seizing upon the town and port of Savo, and stationing ten of his long ships there. The rest of his fleet he sent to Carthage, upon a rumour, that Scipio was going to transport a body of troops to Africa, in order to attack that capital. Then he joined the Ingauni, whose friendship he preferred to that of the other contending party; and, in concert with them, made the necessary dispositions for invading the common enemy. As his army soon grew very numerous by the accession of a strong body of Gauls and Ligurians, the Romans were greatly alarmed, and made the motions already mentioned. About this time, Cn. Octavius, who commanded in Sardinia, took eighty Carthaginian transports, laden with corn, and other provisions, for Hannibal, as Cælius will have it, or with booty taken in Etruria, and Epanterian captives, according to Valerius Antias, off of the coasts of that island. As the plague made great havock both in the Carthaginian and Roman armies this year in Brutium, and Hannibal had besides a famine to struggle with, nothing material happened the campaign we are now upon in those parts. Livy tells us, that the Carthaginian general, during his inaction this summer, erected an altar near the temple of Juno Lacinia, (Polybius says, a column or pillar near the town of Lacinium) upon which he engraved an account of all his great achievements in Greek and Punic letters. Our readers will find some observations upon this monument of antiquity, which, Polybius assures us, was extant in his time, in two of our former notes.

THE following year, advice was brought to Carthage, that an army formed of the Ausetani, Ilergetes, and several other Spanish nations, under the command of Indibilis, Mandonius, &c. had been intirely overthrown by the Romans. Indibilis, it seems, being encouraged by Scipio's departure out of Spain, had excited the people above-mentioned to a second revolt, imagining, that now an opportunity offered of rendering himself, with all the other reguli, independent both of the Romans and Carthaginians. To that end he assembled, in a few days, an army of thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, with which he advanced into the country of the Sedetani. Here the Roman generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, gave them a total defeat, putting above thirteen thousand of them to the sword, in which number was Indibilis himself, and taking eight thousand prisoners. Mandonius, and the other authors of this revolt, being delivered up to the Romans, received capital punishment, after a confiscation of all their effects; and then a peace was granted to the Spaniards upon reasonable terms. The particulars of the last action, as well as a more circumstantial account of the transactions this year in Spain, our readers will find in Livy, to whom, for their further satisfaction, we refer them.

- e AFFAIRS were scarce settled in Spain, when Lælius made a descent in Africa at Hippo Regius, and pillaged all the neighbouring territory. This so alarmed the inhabitants, that they dispatched messengers in all haste to Carthage, with advice, that Scipio, with the Roman fleet, was arrived on their coasts, and had landed at Hippo a strong body of forces. As a rumour had, for some time, prevailed at Carthage, that Scipio had already passed into Sicily, the people and senate were thrown into the utmost consternation by this melancholy news. The great revolution, that had happened in their affairs, the destruction of all their veteran troops, the incapacity of their youth for war, the defection of Syphax, Masinissa, and all their other allies, together with the fickleness and inconstancy of the Africans, from whom their auxiliary forces were to be drawn, afforded them a most dismal prospect, now their metropolis was threatened with a siege. However, when they received intelligence, that only Lælius, with an inconsiderable force, had put in at Hippo, in order to make an incursion upon their territories on that side, their fears began to subside. As soon therefore as they had recovered themselves from the panic they were thrown into, they began to make the necessary dispositions for their defence: they sent an embassy to Syphax, to attempt recovering that prince, as well as to several other African reguli, who shewed an inclination to side with the Romans: they remitted a sum of two hundred talents of silver to Philip king of Macedon, in order to engage a him to make a diversion either in Italy or Sicily: they dispatched orders to their generals in Italy to make all possible efforts to keep Scipio at home; and they sent Mago a reinforcement of six thousand foot, eight hundred horse, seven elephants; and twenty-five long ships, together with a large sum of money to make new levies, that he might advance nearer Rome, and join Hannibal. Lælius, having had a conference with Masiniſſa, wherein that prince gave fresh assurances of his sincere attachment to the Romans, and expressed an ardent desire to see Scipio in Africa, set sail for Sicily, where he safely arrived, with the immense booty got in this expedition.

IN the mean time the vessels, with the body of troops destined for Italy to reinforce Mago, sailed from Carthage, and, after a happy voyage, put into the port of Savo,^b where they joined the other Carthaginian squadron. Mago, upon their arrival, acquainted the chiefs of the Gauls and Ligurians with the reinforcement and welcome dispatches he had received from Carthage. He took occasion from hence to assure them, "That the chief end of his coming to Italy was to secure to them the enjoyment of their rights and privileges." To this he subjoined, "That though the state of Carthage would exert itself to the utmost, in order to obtain this desirable end, yet the success of its endeavours would depend upon them, as it was in their power to enable him to make a greater or lesser figure in the field; that as Sp. Lucretius and M. Livius would soon unite their forces, a strong body of auxiliaries would be necessary to oppose so formidable an army." To which the Gauls replied,^c "That as one Roman army was hovering about their frontiers, and another in Etruria, at a small distance from them, they could not come to so vigorous a resolution as their inclination prompted them to, since this would expose their country to the ravages of the enemy; but that however, underhand, they would give him all the assistance in their power. As to the Ligurians, they added, they were at liberty to act as they should think proper, since the Roman armies were too remote from their borders to have any influence upon their councils; and therefore it was but just, that they should openly take part in the war, and supply him with what number of recruits he wanted." The Ligurians being of the same sentiments, provided he allowed them two months time to raise men in, every thing succeeded according to his desire; for the Gauls privately sent him provisions, and, by virtue^d of the Carthaginian money, the new levies went on briskly in Liguria. But, notwithstanding these happy beginnings, Mago met with the same fate in Italy, that Asdrubal had done before in Spain, as will in a short time appear.

Locri.*

BOTH Scipio, and the Roman soldiery, expressed great impatience to attack the enemy in the heart of their dominions. The intelligence Lælius brought from Masiniſſa, excited the general to this, as the plunder he carried off with him from Africa did the troops. However, they were prevented from undertaking this expedition for the present, by a successful attempt upon the city of Locri. Some workmen, who had served in the Carthaginian garrison of one of the citadels there, being taken by a Roman party, and brought to Rhegium, offered to deliver up the place^e to him, provided they received a proper reward for the danger to which they should expose themselves. This being agreed to, the Romans, by the assistance of these traitors, made themselves masters of that citadel, in which they were employed; but the Carthaginian garrison in the other, commanded by one Hamilcar, defended itself with great bravery, till Hannibal advanced from the river Butrotus to its relief. Upon his approach, a warm action ensued, and the Romans would have been totally routed, notwithstanding Scipio came from Masiniſſa to their assistance, had not the people of Locri supported them; but this happening, and Hannibal being wounded by a scorpion, the Carthaginians thought proper to draw off. Scipio, after the action, finding both the town and the other citadel abandoned by the enemy, placed garrisons^f in them; and then immediately made the proper dispositions for carrying the war into Africa.

Africa.*

DURING these transactions in Italy, the Carthaginians were under continual apprehensions of Scipio's making a descent in Africa. They had posted parties on every promontory and hill bordering upon the sea, to give them notice of the first appearance of the enemy, and were filled with terror upon the arrival of every express, for fear he should bring news of the enemy's landing. In this distress, it was the general

- a opinion, that all possible attempts should be made to detach Syphax from the Roman interest; since both the senate and people thought, that a prospect of assistance from him would be the chief inducement to the Romans to invade their dominions in Africa. In order to accomplish this, a lucky incident intervened: Asdrubal the son of Gisco, who was at Syphax's court with Scipio, in order to negotiate an alliance with that prince, had a daughter of exquisite charms, named Sophonisba. At that time Asdrubal offered this young lady in marriage to Syphax, thinking this would be a means of uniting him with the Carthaginians. He therefore now, with the same view, waited again upon Syphax; and having inflamed him with a description of the beauty he was to have for his consort, sent for her thither from Carthage, to hasten the marriage. Amongst other things, it was stipulated on this occasion, that an offensive and defensive league should be concluded betwixt him and the Carthaginians, in consequence of which he should assist them with all his forces. Asdrubal, not satisfied with this, as being no stranger to the alliance he had formerly entered into with Rome; nor of the variable temper of the African barbarians, thought proper to put him upon a measure, which would prevent Scipio's landing in Africa, and consequently hinder a future union betwixt him and the Romans. Whilst therefore he was in his first amorous transports, the Carthaginian, by means of his daughter's soothing arts and endearments, prevailed upon him to write a letter to Scipio in Sicily to the following effect: "That, as he had married Asdrubal's daughter, his interest was inseparable
c " from that of the Carthaginians; that, besides this, he had concluded a solemn " treaty with that nation; that he therefore advised him not to set his foot in Africa, " because, in such case, he could not dispense with being neutral; that, if he offered " to move with his army to Carthage, he should find himself obliged, both out of " regard to his own native country, and that of his wife, to oppose him with all his " forces." This letter did not however produce the desired effect; for Scipio having, in answer to it, admonished him " to take care how he violated the laws of hospi- " tality with him, and the engagements entered into with the people of Rome," set sail with a formidable force for Africa, and landed at the Fair Promontory without opposition.
d It is intimated by Appian, that Sophonisba was betrothed to Masinissa, who was educated at Carthage, and a prince of the finest accomplishments. Animated by the passion he nourished for a lady of such attractive charms, according to the same author, he eminently distinguished himself on all occasions in Spain against the Romans; but this poor prince being stripped of his kingdom, and not in a condition, as was apprehended, to give any considerable assistance to the Carthaginians, Sophonisba, for the reason hinted at above, though in defiance of justice, honour and public faith, was given to Syphax. Livy is silent as to this particular, though that seems to us no sufficient argument against the probability of it; since Masinissa's future long uninterrupted fidelity to the Romans, is a proof, that he was of a noble disposition, and therefore could not abandon his first friends the Carthaginians without some grievous provocation. Possibly the Roman historian's great regard for his hero Scipio, whose character, he might think, would a little suffer by a true relation of this fact, prevailed upon him to omit it. Be that as it will, Masinissa ever afterwards bore an implacable hatred to the Carthaginians, and contributed not a little to the destruction of their republic, as will most evidently appear in the sequel of this history. But to proceed to the war in Africa:

- As the Carthaginians had seen no Roman army in Africa for fifty years past, the alarm that Scipio's descent occasioned over the whole country, was inexpressible. Where-ever that general moved, he scattered terror. The inhabitants of the open
f country retired into the towns with their effects; and Carthage in particular was extremely crowded on this melancholy occasion. The gates there were shut in the utmost hurry, detachments posted upon the ramparts to defend them, and parties ordered to patrol every night all over the city, to prevent a surprize; in short, the same dispositions were made, as would have been proper in case of an immediate siege. They had no commander of any repute, but Asdrubal the son of Gisco, who had been defeated by Scipio in Spain, and was as unequal to that general in his military capacity, as his raw, undisciplined troops were incapable of opposing the Roman legionaries. Being apprised of Scipio's arrival at Utica, with his fleet and land-forces,

The Carthaginians thrown into a great consternation upon the news of Scipio's landing in Africa.

they detached Hanno, a young Carthaginian nobleman, to obstruct his landing, with a body of five hundred horse; who, falling in with a detachment of the Roman cavalry, sent by Scipio out to plunder, immediately attacked them; but, after a short dispute, he was cut off, with a considerable number of his men, and the rest dispersed. After this action, Scipio laid the country waste to the very gates of Carthage; and possessed himself of an opulent city in the neighbourhood of that place, which he pillaged, and made eight thousand of its principal citizens prisoners. These first instances of success greatly heightened the confusion, that had before begun to reign in Carthage, especially when it was known there, that Masiniſſa had joined Scipio with a body of two hundred, or, as others say, two thousand, Numidian horse. In this last article we have followed Livy; but, according to Appian, Ajdrubal and Syphax greatly caressed Masiniſſa at this time, in order to prevent the junction of his forces and the Romans, though, at the same time, they had resolved upon his destruction, as soon as Scipio should be driven out of Africa. This, continues the same author, Masiniſſa was not ignorant of, though, in order to overcome them at their own weapons, he pretended to be intirely reconciled to those two commanders, having been before at variance with them, for the reason above assigned. However, he privately informed Scipio of all their motions and designs. We might here give our readers an account of the family of Masiniſſa, as well as of the principal events that had happened to him before this period, together with a description of the kingdom his father governed; but all this we chuse to reserve for the history of Numidia.^c

In the room of the horse lately cut to pieces, or taken prisoners, a new and more numerous body of cavalry was raised with all possible expedition, and the command of it given to another Hanno, the son of Hamilcar, who advanced towards Utica, to observe the enemy's motions. But being too weak to undertake any thing against them, or even to prevent the adjacent country from being pillaged, he thought proper to remain inactive, till he was reinforced by some new levies, that his officers were making both in the Carthaginian territories, and those of the neighbouring princes independent of them. At last, finding his troops to amount to four thousand men, he took post in a town called Salera, fifteen miles from the Roman camp. Out of this place, Masiniſſa, who was sent to Salera, with a detachment of horse, by Scipio, for that purpose, found means to draw him; and then, in conjunction with a choice body of Roman cavalry, commanded by Scipio himself, that lay in ambuscade, charged him with such vigour, that he was put to flight, a thousand of his men falling in the action, and two thousand being either killed or taken prisoners in the pursuit. Most authors relate, that Hanno was slain; but Cælius and Valerius Antias affirm, that he fell into the enemy's hands. After this, Scipio put a garrison into Salera, and pushed on the siege of Utica. In the mean time Ajdrubal assembled an army of thirty thousand foot, and three thousand horse; but durst not approach the enemy, till the arrival of Syphax, who soon joined him with an army of fifty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse. Scipio, being informed of this junction, raised the siege of Utica, after he had carried it on ineffectually for the space of forty days, and fixed his winter-quarters in such a manner, as to fear no insults of the enemy. This a little revived the drooping spirits of the Carthaginians, who now saw their own forces, in conjunction with those of Syphax their ally, superior to the Romans in the field.^e

In Italy this year, Hannibal gained an advantage over the consul Sempronius; but was himself soon after defeated by that general. The loss the Carthaginians sustained on this occasion, was above four thousand of their men killed on the field of battle, about three hundred taken prisoners, besides forty horses, and seven standards, that fell into the victors hands. Hannibal, upon this disaster, retired with his army to Croton. The other consul Cetbegus in the mean time kept Etruria in awe, and prevented Mago from approaching his brother Hannibal. As the Etruscans were generally disposed to a revolt, and kept a close correspondence with Mago, Cetbegus found it a difficult matter to execute the province assigned him. The Brutians, hearing of the great success of Scipio in Africa, for the most part abandoned the Carthaginian interest. Some of Hannibal's garrisons amongst them they put to the sword, others they expelled; and, in many places, where they could not openly declare for the Romans, they found means to inform the senate of their aversion to the Carthagi-

^a nians. In the mean time Hannibal came to Petilia, and expostulated with the citizens upon their sending ministers to Rome; but pretended to be satisfied with their conduct, when they strenuously denied this charge. However, to cut off all future grounds of suspicion, he put the principal inhabitants under arrest, committing them to the care of a guard of Numidians; and, disarming the citizens, left the defence of the place to the slaves. He treated other cities likewise with equal severity, Thurii in particular, with its district, which he gave up to his soldiers to be plundered, sparing only three thousand of the citizens, and five hundred peasants, whom he knew to be closely attached to the Carthaginians. These he transplanted to Croton, where he fixed his head-quarters, erected his principal magazine, and took care effectually

Scipio having fortified his camp, the Carthaginians, notwithstanding their superiority, could find no opportunity of attacking him; so that both sides continued in a state of inaction, till the return of the spring. During the winter, Scipio attempted to draw off Syphax from the Carthaginians; but without effect. However, that prince offered to act in quality of mediator between the contending powers, provided Scipio would agree to this preliminary, viz. that both parties should recall their armies home; which, he intimated, would serve as a basis for a future treaty, and effectually secure the repose of their respective dominions. This proposal the Roman general, at first, rejected; but afterwards seemed to listen to it, in order to amuse

^c the enemy, till he could find an opportunity of carrying his point. During the negotiation, Scipio was informed, that the Carthaginian camp, which consisted chiefly of wooden barracks, covered with boughs, was but very slightly fortified; and that the Numidian quarters, which were at some distance from the other, were intirely defenceless, the soldiers being only covered with mats, hurdles, dry leaves, and other such-like combustible materials. To which his spies added, that the troops observed no order or discipline, but lay in a careless manner without their trenches. This intelligence excited him to attempt forcing their camp by some stratagem, since he found himself too weak to come to a pitched battle with them, especially as the spot they were encamped upon was a smooth and open plain, extremely proper for their cavalry,

^d much superior to that of the Romans, to act in. Having maturely weighed these particulars, he sent ambassadors to the camp, to renew, as was given out, the conferences, but in reality to make such discoveries, as would favour the execution of his scheme. These ambassadors were attended by some of his veteran soldiers, disguised like slaves, who had orders to move about the camp, and observe all the avenues leading to and from it, its form and situation, how far Asdrubal was from Syphax, how all the posts were occupied, and whether it would be easier to surprise it in the day-time, or by night. Having informed himself of all these particulars, he immediately broke off the conferences, letting Syphax know, "That as his officers had,

"in a council of war, declared themselves averse to all pacific measures, and pressed

^e "him to push on the war with vigour, he found himself obliged, in compliance "with their desire, to pursue the military operations." Such a declaration could not but extremely mortify both Asdrubal and Syphax, who looked upon the treaty to be as good as concluded. However, they soon recovered themselves, and resolved to draw, if possible, the enemy out into the plain, where, they doubted not, they should be able to give a good account of them; or, if they should fail in the execution of this project, their intention was to besiege their camp both by sea and land; which they imagined themselves capable of doing. But Scipio took his measures so well, that he surprised them in the manner already related. Lælius and Masiniſſa burnt Syphax's camp, as Scipio himself did that of Asdrubal. Their army was intirely

^f ruined, only two thousand foot, and five hundred horse, with the two commanders, escaping out of so great a multitude. According to Livy, this complete victory was, in a great measure, owing to the wise dispositions of Masiniſſa. The scene exhibited on this melancholy occasion, Polybius tells us, was inconceivably dreadful; which indeed may easily be admitted, if we consider the terrible havock made of the Carthaginian and Numidian troops. Appian relates, that Syphax, having, some time before, shamefully abandoned the Carthaginians, when he had advanced as far as Utica to their assistance, under the pretext of repelling a foreign invasion, returned soon after to succour them, and endeavoured to bring over Masiniſſa, by promising to give him which of his three daughters he pleased, and to fix him on the throne of the Masæyli.^a The same author tells us, that Scipio offered sacrifices to the deities Audacia and Pavor, that his troops might behave with bravery, and not be struck with any panic terrors in the night, since they were then to begin the attack. Asdrubal made his escape to Anda, where he rallied the remains of his shattered army, consisting chiefly of mercenaries and Numidians; and having, by his own authority, presented a good number of slaves with their freedom, and joined them to the others, he formed a considerable corps. Syphax retired to an advantageous post, about eight miles from the field of battle, which he possessed himself of. Appian relates, that Asdrubal was condemned to be crucified for his ill success; which is improbable, if what Livy says be true, viz. that, soon after the last disaster, he went to Carthage, in order to prevent the senate^b and suffetes from coming into any pacific measures. Be that as it will, the suffetes having convened the senate, three motions were made: first, that ambassadors should be sent to Scipio, to treat of a peace with that general; secondly, that Hannibal should be recalled out of Italy; thirdly, that, in imitation of the Roman resolution in adversity, they should depend upon themselves, and their allies, for the defence of their country, and therefore immediately reinforce their army, and apply to Syphax for further succours. This last, being backed by Asdrubal, and the Barchine faction,^c was carried; in consequence of which, the new levies went on briskly, and ministers were dispatched in all haste to Syphax, who was prevailed upon, by the intreaties and endearments of his beloved Sophonisba, to join Asdrubal with a large body of forces. In the mean time Scipio advanced to the walls of Carthage, and offered the citizens battle; which they thought proper to decline. As soon as Asdrubal had left Anda, it surrendered to the Romans. Two other towns of note likewise in that neighbourhood, which pretended to make resistance, Scipio carried by assault, and gave them up to his soldiers to be plundered. After this, he sat down again before Utica, and pushed on the siege of that place with the utmost vigour. In the mean time Asdrubal and Syphax, being joined by a good number of Celtiberian troops, upon a review of their army, found it to amount to thirty thousand strong, with which they moved towards Scipio, in order to attack him. That general, having received intelligence of their approach, and left a sufficient number of troops to defend^d his lines, rose from before Utica, and advanced to meet them. The Roman army was disposed in the usual manner. On the other side, Asdrubal posted his Carthaginian forces in the right wing, Syphax, with his Numidians, in the left, and the Celtiberians in the centre. The Carthaginians and Numidians were routed at the first onset; but the Celtiberians, being animated by despair, fought with such resolution, that they were almost all to a man killed upon the spot. As Scipio had treated them with the utmost lenity after their late revolt, they were sensible the black ingratitude to him, they were now guilty of, deserved no mercy, if they fell into his hands; and finding it impossible to escape by flight, they resolved to die in the field. The obstinacy with which they, for some time, maintained the dispute, gave many of the Cartha-^e ginians and Numidians an opportunity of saving themselves, who must otherwise have been inevitably cut off. The day after the battle, Scipio detached Lælius and Masiniissa, with the horse and light-armed troops, to pursue Syphax and Asdrubal; whilst he himself, with the main body, reduced most of the towns in the neighbourhood of Carthage.

Tunes abandoned as the approach of Scipio.

THE Carthaginians now looked upon their condition as desperate, expecting every moment to be besieged by Scipio with his victorious army. They therefore repaired the wall of the city, filled their magazines, and made all the other necessary dispositions for a vigorous defence. In the mean time the garrison of Tunes abandoned that city at Scipio's approach. Soon after the loss of this place, the Carthagi-^f nians sent a squadron of galleys to destroy the Roman fleet in the port of Utica; which they might have easily effected, had they not put into the harbour of Ruscino by the way, and staid a whole night there; which, together with their slow sailing, and the useless precaution of drawing up their fleet in order of battle, as though they had been to engage some formidable enemy, gave the Romans an opportunity of frustrating, in a great measure, their design. The great consternation the Carthaginians were thrown into by their late losses, prevented them from pursuing this enterprize with the expedition necessary to render it successful, since they imagined the Romans

a to be invincible by sea, as well as by land. However, they carried off six of the enemy's galleys; which, in the present situation of affairs, elated them as much, as formerly an important victory would have done. We are told by Appian, that Hamilcar, the Carthaginian admiral, surprising the Roman fleet at Unca, took one trireme, and six transports; that, immediately after this, Hanno, with a body of forces, attempted to raise the siege of Utica; but was repulsed with considerable loss; that however, Scipio, being tired with the long siege, or rather blockade, of that place, transported all his military machines to Hippo; and that having ineffectually played them upon that city likewise, he burnt them all as useless, ravaged some parts of the neighbouring provinces, and entered into an alliance with others. The same author b likewise intimates, that the Carthaginians attempted to corrupt the Iberian troops in the Roman service; but without success, their indirect practices being discovered to Scipio by the aruspices at repeated sacrifices. We might here give our readers all the particulars, besides those already mentioned, relating to the tragical exit of Sophonisba, as well as the great progress made by Laelius and Masinissa at this time in Numidia, did we not apprehend them more properly to belong to the Numidian history ^d.

IMMEDIATELY after the last defeat, the senate and suffetes of Carthage came to a resolution to recall Hannibal from Italy, upon whose veteran troops, and their fleet, together with the powerful assistance of Syphax, they were convinced, their preservation did absolutely depend. Their fleet therefore having, in the main, failed in c the important enterprize above-mentioned, Syphax being taken prisoner, his country conquered, and Hannibal as yet at a great distance, they had no other resource left, than to sue to Scipio for peace. To this they were farther excited, by that general's encamping again at Tunes, within sight of their capital. They therefore deputed thirty of their principal senators, who were selected for that purpose out of the centumvirate, to wait upon Scipio. Being introduced into the Roman general's tent, they all threw themselves prostrate on the earth, kissed his feet, (in conformity, as Livy observes, to the practice of their ancestors the Tyrians) and spoke to him in the most submissive terms. They accused Hannibal, and the Barchine faction, as the authors of all their calamities; they confessed themselves to have broken the peace concluded d betwixt them and the Romans, and that they deserved whatever punishment that nation should think proper to inflict upon them. They begged however, that their city, which had twice merited destruction, by the temerity of its citizens, might remain a monument of the Roman clemency, promising at the same time an implicit obedience to his commands. Scipio replied, "That though he had come into Africa, " not for peace, but conquest, which he had, in a manner, effected, yet, that all " nations might see the strict justice of the Romans, both in undertaking and con- " cluding their wars, he would grant them a peace upon the following terms:" that they should deliver up all the Roman prisoners and deserters to him; that they should recall their armies out of Italy and Gaul; that they should never set foot again in Spain; e that they should retire out of all the islands between Italy and Africa; that they should put the victors in possession of all their ships, twenty only excepted, which they should be allowed to keep for their own use; lastly, that they should give to the Romans five hundred thousand bushels of wheat, three hundred thousand of barley, and pay five thousand talents, or, as others will have it, five thousand pound weight of silver. He gave them three days to consider of these conditions; which they feigned a compliance with, in order to gain time till Hannibal's arrival. A truce being granted the Carthaginians, they immediately sent deputies to Rome, and at the same time dispatched an express to Hannibal, to hasten his return to Africa. Appian intimates, that, besides the articles above-mentioned, Scipio insisted upon a compliance with the two following: that Masinissa should not only keep possession of his own kingdom, but as many of Syphax's territories, as he should be able to conquer; and that the Carthaginians should not extend their dominions beyond the Fossa Punica. But these, and other points, wherein that author differs from Livy and Polybius, seem not so agreeable to truth, as what has been transmitted to posterity by those two celebrated historians ^e.

The Carthaginians sue to Scipio for peace.

DURING these transactions, Mago advanced into Insubria, where he met with the Roman forces under the command of M. Cornelius and P. Quintilius Varus. A general action soon happened between the two armies, wherein the Carthaginians were defeated. ^{Mago or thrown in Insubria.}

However, Asdrubal's elephants, by their noise, smell, terrible appearance, &c. with the Numidian horse, so pushed the Roman cavalry, and his Carthaginian infantry charged the legionaries with such bravery, that, had his corps de reserve, which consisted of Gauls, done their duty against the triarii, the Romans must have been overthrown. Mago performed the part of a consummate general, distinguishing himself greatly throughout the whole action; but being wounded in the thigh, he was obliged to be carried out of the battle, which threw his troops into such confusion, that a good part of them betook themselves to flight. Five thousand Carthaginians fell on the field of battle, and eighteen of their standards were taken. But this victory cost the Romans dear; for they lost two thousand three hundred men, besides the best part of the twelfth legion. Mago, after having made an excellent retreat by favour of the night, returned into the country of the Ingauni, which was one of the maritime parts of Liguria, where he met a courier bringing him orders to return directly to Carthage. The Ligurians, being informed of this, received the Romans with open arms; and Mago, embarking his troops, immediately set sail for Carthage; but his wound growing worse, upon his arrival on the coast of Sardinia, he expired^f.

Hannibal recalled from Italy.

THE Romans being thus every-where victorious, Consentia, Uffugium, Vergæ, Besidia, Hetriculum, Syphaum, Argentanum, Dampetia, and other towns of less note in Brutium, opened their gates to the consul Cn. Servilius. This was the situation of affairs, when Hannibal was commanded to return to Africa. Valerius Antias wrote, that, just before his departure, Hannibal was defeated by Servilius not far from Croton, and that, on this occasion, he lost five thousand men. But Livy, partial as he is, looks upon this as little better than a downright fiction. When the messengers from Africa informed Hannibal of the senate's pleasure, he expressed the utmost concern and indignation, groaning, gnashing his teeth, and being scarce able to refrain from tears. "Now, said he, those persons, who have long endeavoured to drag me out of Italy, by denying me proper supplies, send me direct and explicit orders to return home. Hannibal is not vanquished by the Romans, but by the senate of Carthage. Scipio has not so much reason to exult and plume himself at my being forced from Italy, as Hanno, who, for want of other means of effecting it, has completed the ruin of my family by the destruction of Carthage." As he had foreseen what would happen, he had prepared a proper number of vessels to transport his forces to Africa; which he did, after having massacred a body of Italian troops, that refused to accompany him, in the temple of Juno Lacinia. Such an instance of cruelty, at that time, was not so much to be wondered at, since Hannibal must have been exasperated almost to madness to see himself thus forced to quit a country he had been so long contending for. Never banished man, according to Livy, shewed so much regret in leaving his native country, as Hannibal did in going out of that of the enemy. He often turned his eyes wishfully to Italy, accusing gods and men for his misfortunes, and calling down a thousand curses, if we will credit the same author, upon himself, for his not having, after the battle of Canna, advanced to the walls of Rome at the head of his army, still reeking with the blood of its citizens. Appian writes, that Asdrubal, the Carthaginian admiral, committed unparalleled cruelties in all the cities allied with Carthage, before Hannibal's departure, permitting his men to ravish their virgins and matrons, and behaving in all respects to them, as the most inhuman enemy does to the inhabitants of all towns carried by assault. But as Livy, whose authority, in the main, we prefer to that of Appian, is silent as to this particular, we own ourselves inclined to pay no great regard to it.

The Carthaginians break the treaty Scipio granted them.

THE Carthaginian ambassadors, about this time, arrived at Rome, where they met with but a very indifferent reception. The conscript fathers, greatly dissatisfied with the excuses made by these ambassadors, in vindication of their republic, and the ridiculous offer of their adhering, in its name, to the treaty of Lutatius, thought proper to refer the decision of the whole to Scipio, who, being upon the spot, could best judge what suited the welfare of the state. However, the Romans plainly discovered, from the conduct of their ministers on this occasion, as well as the recalling of their troops home, that, notwithstanding their pretended desire of peace, the Carthaginians would be averse to an accommodation, as soon as they received intelligence of Hannibal's landing in Africa. They were confirmed in the sentiments they had entertained, by the news, which, in a few days, arrived at Rome, viz. that the Cartha-

^a ginians, in violation of the truce which they themselves had so earnestly desired, had seized a great number of ships on the coast of Africa, near the island Ægimurus, and even attacked the galley that carried the Roman ambassadors to Carthage, in the river Bagrada, within sight of Scipio's camp. Such a procedure could not but exasperate the two nations one against the other more than ever; the Romans, from the strong desire they must have had to revenge so black a perfidy; and the Carthaginians, from a persuasion, that they were not now to expect a peace. For the particulars of those infamous actions, as well as Scipio's great generosity and politeness to the Carthaginian ambassadors, notwithstanding such a flagrant violation of the law of nations, we must refer our readers to the Roman history ^b.

^b Hannibal had no sooner landed in Africa, than he sent out parties to get provisions for the army, and buy horses to remount the cavalry. He entered into a league with the regulus of the Areacida, a Numidian tribe not far from Adrumetum. Four thousand of Syphax's horse, then in the service of Masinissa, came over in a body to him; but as he did not think it proper to repose any confidence in them, he put them all to the sword, and distributed their horses amongst his troops. Vermina, one of Syphax's sons, and Mesetulus, another Numidian prince, likewise joined him with a very considerable body of horse. Most of the fortresses in Masinissa's kingdom either surrendered to him upon the first summons, or were taken by storm. Narce, a city of considerable note there, he made himself master of by a stratagem. Tychæus, a Numidian regulus, and faithful ally of Syphax, whose territories were famous for an excellent breed of horses, reinforcing him also much about the same time with two thousand of his best cavalry, Hannibal advanced to Zama, a town about five days march from Carthage, where he encamped. He thence sent out spies to observe the posture of the Romans. These being brought to Scipio, he was so far from inflicting any punishment upon them, which he might have done by the rules of war, that he commanded them to be led about the Roman camp, in order to take an exact survey of it, and then dismissed them. Hannibal, admiring the noble assurance of his rival, sent a messenger to desire an interview with him; which by means of Masinissa he obtained. The two generals therefore, escorted by equal detachments of horse, met at Nadagara, where, by the assistance of two interpreters, they held a private conference. Hannibal, after having flattered Scipio in the most refined and artful manner, and expatiated upon all those topics, that, he thought, could influence that general to grant his nation a peace upon tolerable terms, told him, that the Carthaginians would willingly confine themselves to Africa, since such was the will of the gods, in order to procure a lasting peace, whilst the Romans would be at liberty to extend their conquests to the remotest nations. He farther added, that, with regard to the sincerity of his intentions, since the Romans had lately, not without reason, suspected the Punic faith, he desired him to be fully convinced of it, and to rest assured, that the same constant and uniform disposition Hannibal had shewn in the prosecution of this bloody war, as long as the gods permitted it, would as eminently appear in the strict observation of a future peace; and that the Romans had the less reason to doubt of this, as the interest of the Carthaginians itself rendered such a conduct on their part absolutely necessary. Scipio answered, That the Romans were not prompted by ambition, or any sinister views, to undertake either the former or present war against the Carthaginians, but by justice, and a proper regard for their allies; that the Carthaginians had, before his arrival in Africa, not only made him the same proposals, but likewise agreed to pay the Romans five thousand talents of silver, restore all the Roman prisoners without ransom, and deliver up all their galleys; that the late perfidious actions of the Carthaginians ought to be so far from procuring them more favourable terms, that the Romans thought themselves authorized from thence to impose more rigorous conditions upon them; which if he would submit to, then a peace would ensue; if not, the decision of the dispute betwixt them must be intirely left to the sword ^c.

THIS conference betwixt two of the greatest generals the world ever produced thus ending without success, they both retired to their respective camps, where they informed their troops, that not only the fate of Rome and Carthage, but that of the whole world, was to be determined by them the next day. Accordingly in the morning, both commanders drew up their armies in order of battle ; and, after endeavouring a to animate their men to make their utmost efforts, by all the motives to bravery that could be offered, they advanced towards each other with great resolution in the plains of Zama. Scipio posted the hastati, divided into small battalions, with proper spaces between them, in front ; after them, the principes divided in the same manner ; and the rear was brought up by the triarii. The Italian horse, under the conduct of Lælius, he placed in the left wing ; and the Numidian, commanded by Masiniſſa, in the right. By this disposition, which differed something from that which the Romans usually made, a proper precaution was taken against the violence of the enemy's elephants, which would otherwise have undoubtedly born down the principes. He ordered his light-armed troops, who were to begin the fight, to retire b into the void spaces between the battalions, if they found themselves overcharged by the enemy, or pushed by their elephants, the most expeditious part of them continuing their retreat, till they came behind the army, thereby giving an opportunity to their wounded, or more slow companions, of saving themselves in the interval between the hastati and principes, or that between the principes and triarii. Hannibal, on the other side, posted his elephants, eighty in number, in front ; behind them he placed his vanguard, consisting of Ligurian, Gallic, Balearic, and Mauritanian mercenaries ; then followed the main battle, composed of four thousand Africans and native Carthaginians, sustained by a body of four thousand Macedonian veterans, sent him by king Philip ; and, at a furlong's distance from them, moved those brave troops, that had served under him in Italy, forming his rear, in whom he reposed his chief confidence. The Carthaginian cavalry were opposed to Lælius ; and the Numidian, under Tycheus, Meſetulus, &c. to Masiniſſa ^k.

Zama.

SOME time before the beginning of the action, the Numidian horse on both sides skirmished with inconsiderable loss. After which, pursuant to Hannibal's orders, the elephants advanced against the enemy ; but those distributed in the left wing, being frightened by the sound of the trumpets, and the other martial music, fell foul upon their own Numidian horse, and put them into disorder. Masiniſſa immediately took advantage of this confusion, and, without giving them time to recover themselves, charged them with such fury, that he drove them out of the field. The elephants, that d attacked the Roman light-armed troops, being likewise repulsed, and many of them wounded, recoiled in like manner upon the Carthaginian horse posted in the right wing, and made such an impression upon them, that they met with the same rough treatment from Lælius, that the Numidians had before done from Masiniſſa. In the mean time the infantry on both sides engaged with unparallelled bravery. Hannibal's mercenaries at first repulsed the legionaries ; but these last, being duly supported by the principes, not only recovered themselves, but routed the mercenaries, and pushed them on the Carthaginians ; which occasioned the defeat of both bodies, and, in a great measure, determined victory to declare for the Romans. The corps de reserve, formed of Hannibal's veterans, that had served under him in Italy, behaved with e inexpressible intrepidity and resolution ; but Lælius and Masiniſſa, returning from the defeat of the enemy's horse, bore down all before them, and obliged this phalanx, which before seemed impenetrable, to give way. They were therefore put to the rout, and the ground strewed with their dead bodies, most of them being killed either in the battle or the pursuit. Appian relates, that, during the heat of the action, Hannibal first engaged Scipio, and afterwards Masiniſſa, in single combat, wherein he had the advantage. According to the same author, the Carthaginians had twenty-five thousand men slain, and eight thousand taken prisoners. Livy and Polybius affirm, that twenty thousand of Hannibal's men were killed, and as many taken prisoners ; as likewise, that an hundred and thirty standards fell into the enemy's f hands. Some say, the Romans lost only two thousand men ; others, that two thousand five hundred Romans, and a greater number of Masiniſſa's soldiers, fell in this engagement. Be that as it will, Scipio got a complete victory, and made himself master of Hannibal's camp, where he found ten talents of gold, two thousand five hundred of silver, and an immense quantity of other booty. All the remarkable particulars of this action, omitted here, our readers will find in a former part of this work ^l.

- a Hannibal, having escaped to Thon, was soon joined by some Brutian and Spanish fugitives, who had been too swift for their pursuers; but not caring to trust himself in their hands, he fled privately to Adrumetum. The surprising military genius of that most renowned general never more eminently displayed itself than at the battle of Zama, as we learn from Polybius, who greatly celebrates his conduct on that occasion. Scipio himself likewise, according to Livy, passed a high encomium upon him, on account of his uncommon capacity in taking advantages, the excellent arrangement of his forces, and the manner in which he gave his orders during the engagement; but being vastly inferior to the enemy in horse, and the state of Carthage obliging him, at no small disadvantage, to hazard a battle with the Romans, he met with the fate above-mentioned. Some consolation however it must have been to him to hear, that Scipio not only approved of his conduct, but openly declared, that he outshined himself in this glorious, though unfortunate, action ^m.

Hannibal's excellent conduct at that battle.

- THE senate of Carthage, hearing of Hannibal's arrival at Adrumetum, dispatched messengers to him, with orders to return to Carthage. He obeyed these orders, and advised his countrymen to conclude a peace with the Romans upon the terms they should think proper to prescribe them. To this they were the more strongly excited by the news they received of a defeat given Vermina, the son of Sypbak, their ally. This blow was very considerable, fifteen thousand of that prince's men being laid dead on the field of battle, twelve hundred made prisoners, and fifteen hundred Nu- midian horses, together with seventy-two military ensigns, taken. After this overthrow, the Carthaginians sent ten of their principal citizens, as ambassadors, to implore Scipio's clemency, who told them, with a haughty air, That they might meet with him at Tunes. However, thirty Carthaginian senators, selected out of the centumvirate, waiting upon Scipio, and suing for peace in the most submissive terms, that general thought proper to dictate to them the following conditions: 1. The Carthaginians shall be governed by their own laws, and remain in possession of all their African dominions. 2. The Carthaginians shall deliver up to the Romans all their deserters, fugitive slaves, prisoners of war, and all the Italians, whom Hannibal forced to follow him. 3. This shall be done within thirty days after the treaty is signed. 4. They shall also deliver up all their ships of war, except ten triremes, and all their tame elephants, and shall train up no more of those animals for the service. 5. The senate and people of Carthage shall not engage in any war, without the consent of the Romans. 6. They shall supply the Roman troops with corn, and pay their auxiliaries, till the return of the ambassadors they shall send to Rome. 7. They shall pay the Romans, in the space of fifty years, ten thousand Euboic talents, at equal payments. 8. They shall deliver up to Scipio an hundred such hostages as he shall chuse, the youngest of whom shall not be under fourteen, and the oldest above thirty years of age. 9. Neither the peace nor truce shall take place, till the Carthaginians have restored to the Romans the ships and effects taken from them during the last truce. 10. The Roman armies shall leave Africa within fifty days after the conclusion of the treaty. 11. The Carthaginians shall restore to Masinissa all they have usurped from him and his ancestors, and even enter into an alliance with him. 12. They shall never for the future make any levies in Gaul or Liguria. 13. They shall assist the Romans both by sea and land, whenever they are called upon so to do. These terms, which Scipio thought proper to grant the Carthaginians, in case the senate and people of Rome would ratify them, appeared so intolerable to the populace of Carthage, that they threatened to plunder and burn the houses of the nobility. But Hannibal, having assembled a body of six thousand foot, and five hundred horse, at Maribama, prevented an insurrection, and, by his influence, completed the accommodation. f However, Gisco, an enemy to the Barchine faction, made a speech to the senators, in order to dissuade them from accepting such a shameful peace. Hannibal, being highly incensed at his presumption, dragged him from his seat; which giving great offence, in order to vindicate, or, at least, to palliate, so precipitate an action, Hannibal made an apology for it to the following effect: "As I left your city at nine years of age, and did not return till after thirty-six years absence, I had full leisure to learn the military art, and flatter myself, that I have made good improvement in it; but, with regard to your constitution, it is no wonder that I am a “stranger to it, and therefore I must desire you to instruct me in every branch of it.” a

 He then insisted upon the necessity of concluding a peace; adding, “that they ought “to return the gods thanks for having disposed the Romans to grant them such “favourable conditions.” He likewise represented to the senators the importance of uniting in their suffrages; intimating, that it might be of fatal consequence to the state, if, by their divisions, they should throw more weight into the popular scale, which already did but too much preponderate. That whole venerable assembly therefore, in order to prevent the people from taking such an affair under their cognizance, came over to his opinion, and the terms proposed by Scipio were accepted.
 Ample satisfaction having been made the Romans for the outrages offered their ministers, and the infraction of the late truce, the Carthaginians dispatched an embassy, at b the head of which was Ajdrubal, surnamed Ilædus, or The Kid, to Rome. As he was an irreconcilable enemy to Hannibal and his family, he endeavoured to excuse the people of Carthage, by imputing the late rupture to the ambition of the Barchine faction, and extolled his own conduct, as well as that of Hanno, towards the Romans.
 He likewise expatiated upon the generosity, magnanimity, wisdom, and humanity of the Romans; whilst his companions endeavoured to move the senate to compassion, by exhibiting to their view the calamitous state of Carthage in the most lively colours.
 By these methods of persuasion, they not only prevailed upon the conscript fathers to grant them their request, but likewise to send two hundred of their prisoners then at c Rome to Scipio, with orders that they should be restored, without any pecuniary consideration, as soon as he should receive from the Carthaginians their ratification of the treaty. The late truce for three months, which the Carthaginians obtained of Scipio, upon the return of their ambassadors, was changed into a perpetual peace, upon the terms that general had prescribed. They then, in pursuance of the treaty, delivered up to Scipio above five hundred ships, all which he burnt in sight of Carthage, to the inexpressible mortification of the inhabitants of that unfortunate city. They likewise delivered up into the hands of the Romans all their elephants, all the slaves, deserters, and prisoners of war. The number of these last amounted to above four thousand men. Scipio treated both the Latin and Roman deserters with extreme severity, ordering all the heads of the former to be struck off, and the latter to be crucified. d
 The public funds at Carthage being exhausted by so long and expensive a war, the senate found it vastly difficult to raise a sum sufficient for the payment of the first tax imposed by the treaty. This threw them into a melancholy silence, and many could not even refrain from tears. Livy tells us, that Hannibal, laughing on this occasion, was reproved by Ajdrubal Ilædus, for insulting his country in this the time of its affliction, which, he insinuated, was owing to his conduct. Hannibal, in reply, according to the same author, spoke to that august assembly to the following effect :
 “Were my heart as visible as my countenance, you would perceive, that this laugh“ter, which has given such offence, flows not from an excess of joy, but from a “mind almost distracted with the public calamities; nor is even this laughter so e “unseasonable as your absurd and indecent tears. Then you ought to have wept, “when your arms were taken from you, your ships burnt, and you were prohibited “from engaging in any foreign wars. This was the mortal blow, that laid us pro“strate. Do not imagine, that the Romans, out of any particular aversion to you, “have formed a scheme for your destruction. No great city can long enjoy any “repose. If it has no foreign, it will soon meet with a domestic enemy; as the “most robust constitutions, when free from all external morbid causes, are born “down by their own strength. You are only sensible of the public calamities, as “far as you have a personal concern in them; and the loss of your money only gives “you the most pungent sorrow. When therefore Carthage was made the spoil of f
 “the victor, when it was left disarmed and defenceless amidst so many powerful “African nations, who had at that time taken the field, not a groan, not a sigh “was heard. But now, when a capitation-tax is demanded, you lament and bewail, “as if all were lost. Alas! I greatly fear, that the subject of this day’s anxiety “and concern will soon prove the least of your misfortunes.” Thus ended the second Punic war, one of the most remarkable mentioned in history, both on account of the vicissitudes of fortune discernible in it, and the immense quantity of blood and treasure it occasioned the consumption of. Zonaras, from some authors not now extant, tells us, it lasted only sixteen years; but Livy and Polybius, whose authority is more to be depended upon, make it to have included eighteen campaigns, and intimate g it

- a it to have been terminated eighteen years after Hannibal came to a rupture with the Romans^a.

THE year after the conclusion of the last treaty, Hamilcar, a Carthaginian captain, left in those parts either by Ajdrubal or Mago, excited the Insubres, Cænomani, and the Boii, together with the Salvi, Ilvates, and other cantons of Liguria, to make an irruption into the territories of the allies of Rome. Of this the senate immediately informed the state of Carthage, threatening at the same time to renew the war, if that infringer of the late treaty was not delivered up to them. What answer the Carthaginians returned to this menace, we no-where find; but the death of Hamilcar, who was soon after killed in a battle he fought with Fulvius Purpureo the prætor, put an end to all farther dispute betwixt the Carthaginians and the Romans on this head. The peace betwixt Carthage and Rome was scarce signed, when Masinissa, at the instigation of the Romans, unjustly made himself master of part of the Carthaginian dominions in Africa, under pretence, that those territories formerly belonged to his family. The Carthaginians, through the villainous mediation of the Romans, to which, by an article of the late treaty, they were obliged to have recourse, found themselves under a necessity of ceding those countries to that ambitious prince, and entering into an alliance with him. The good understanding afterwards betwixt these two powers continued many years; but at last Masinissa, through the intrigues and dark cabals of the Romans, as there is great reason to believe, violated the treaties subsisting betwixt him and the Carthaginians, and not a little contributed to the subversion of the African republic, as will soon most evidently appear^b.

THE following year, in the consulate of Cornelius Lentulus and P. Villius Tappius, the Carthaginians sent fifty Euboic talents of silver to Rome, in pursuance of the late treaty; but the silver not being good, the quæstors refused it; and, upon examination, it being found wanting one fourth part, the Carthaginian ministers were obliged to borrow a sum of money at Rome, to make up the deficiency. At their request, an hundred of their hostages were released, and hopes given them, that the other hundred should soon be returned, provided they inviolably adhered to their late engagements. In the mean time, the remaining hostages desiring leave to be removed from Norba, which they represented as a place very inconvenient for them to reside in, the senate immediately sent them to Signia and Ferentinum. From hence they were removed to Setia, where their domestics occasioned a commotion, which had like to have proved of ill consequence to the Romans; but how this accident affected the state of Carthage, is no-where said. According to Appian, the trade of the Carthaginians began, even at this time, to flourish, notwithstanding all their shipping had so lately been, in a manner, destroyed. A glaring instance this of the surprising genius of that people for commerce, even in their most depressed and miserable condition^c.

NOT long after the transactions just hinted at, Livy tells us, that one Hamilcar, a Carthaginian general, commanded an army of Gauls, that was defeated by Celbegus, and that this general himself was taken prisoner in the action; but whether any, or how many, Carthaginian troops assisted the Gauls on this occasion, or what influence that event had upon the Carthaginian affairs, history informs us not. In the mean time Hannibal kept up his credit at Carthage. Notwithstanding he had failed in the execution of his grand and favourite scheme, the republic gave him the command of an army destined to act against some neighbouring African powers; and from Cornelius Nepos it seems probable, that he made some campaigns after the conclusion of the second Punic war. This gave such umbrage to the Romans, that, notwithstanding the Carthaginians made them a present of a golden crown, and thanked them in a most polite manner for the peace they had granted them, they refused to release the Carthaginian prisoners still detained in Italy. The senate indeed, at the request of the ambassadors, who came with the compliment to Rome, gave leave to the Carthaginian hostages still with them to reside in what city of Italy they pleased; and assured the ambassadors, that this instance of their republic's friendship was very acceptable to them. But, with regard to the prisoners, the conscript fathers frankly told them, that they could not dismiss them, as long as Hannibal, their most avowed and inveterate enemy, was at the head of an army in Africa. Upon this remonstrance, the Carthaginians recalled Hannibal home, and conferred upon him the office of præ-tor ; which seems to have been an employment of great consideration and authority. ^a In this post Hannibal behaved so as to gain universal applause. He regulated the finances in such a manner, that, notwithstanding the deplorable state to which Car- thage was reduced, considerable sums were laid up yearly for the public service, after the payment of the tax to the Romans imposed by the last treaty, and all other deductions made. As such a laudable conduct must have been founded upon a reformation of many abuses, it undoubtedly drew upon him the hatred of many persons concerned in those abuses ; but neither this, nor the animosity of the old Hannonian faction, which was far from being extinguished, prevented him from pursuing the measures he thought necessary for the service of the republic with zeal and resolution. But he was not satisfied with putting the management of the finances upon a good footing. ^b

 He was equally impatient of rectifying the irregularities, which had crept into the administration of justice. As the judges exercised the most cruel rapine with impunity, disposing, in an arbitrary manner, of the lives, properties, and reputations of the citizens, without the least controul, since they held their offices for life, and mutually supported one another, Hannibal resolved to redress so crying an evil. He therefore, by his integrity, courage, and popularity acquired thereby, effected the passing of a law, whereby it was enacted, that the judges should be chosen annually ; with a clause, that none should continue in office beyond their year. This step greatly irritated the nobles and grandees, but extremely pleased the populace, of Carthage.
 His reputation and authority amongst the latter were raised to a higher pitch by the ^c method he made use of to complete the regulation of the finances above-mentioned.
 The public revenues had been embezzled by those, who had the management of them, and some of the leading men in the city. This obliged the senate and suffetes to think of levying the annual tribute due to the Romans upon the people ; which scheme Hannibal prevented from being put in execution, by detecting the frauds of the officers concerned in every branch of the public revenues, as well as the collusions of those possessed of the other lucrative posts. It is no wonder therefore, that persons of this complexion should exert their utmost malice to ruin a man, however laudably disposed to the public, who, they had the assurance to pretend, deprived them of their lawful property ; for in that light they considered their long continued peculation. ^d
 In order to gratify their resentment, they excited the Romans to pursue Hannibal to destruction. Accordingly C. Servilius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Q. Terentius Cul- leo were sent to Carthage, as was pretended, to accommodate all differences betwixt the Carthaginians and Masiniſſa, but, in reality, to ruin Hannibal, who, they asserted, carried on a secret intelligence with king Antiochus, in order to concert with him the proper measures for prosecuting the war against the Romans. Hannibal, upon their arrival, notwithstanding their specious pretexts, knew the subject of their commission, and thought it prudent to submit to the necessity of the times. Having therefore made all the proper dispositions for his departure, in order to blind his countrymen, in the dusk of the evening, he went out of the city in a foreign dress, attended ^e only by two companions, ignorant of his design. That he might travel with the greater expedition, he had before ordered relays at proper places, by the assistance of which, passing the Vocanian district, he arrived at a castle, or palace, of his own between Aebolla and Thapsus. From hence he was waſted over in a vessel, that waited for him, to the island Cercina. Here he had recourse to a stratagem, to conceal his retreat from Carthage ; which had the desired effect. The populace of Carthage, the morning after his departure, were in a great ferment upon his abandoning the city.
 Some thought he was fled, others, that he had been assassinated by the Roman faction.
 However, at last time discovered the truth, the senate receiving certain intelligence, that he was seen in the island Cercina. No sooner did this news come to hand, than ^f the Roman ambassadors insisted upon the Carthaginians making a public declaration of their dislike of the project he was gone upon. In order to impose upon the masters of ships at that time in the island Cercina, he gave out, that the republic of Carthage had sent him their ambassador to Tyre. Livy tells us, that he was not so much affected with the prospect of his own unhappy fate, as with that of the calamities, which threatened his country. From Cercina he steered his course for Tyre, where, upon his arrival, he was treated with all the marks of distinction due to his exalted merit.
 After staying some days here, he set out for Antioch, and had a conference with Antiochus's son at Daphne, where he was celebrating some solemn diversions. From hence he posted to Ephesus, where he met with a most kind reception from that ^g prince

- a prince himself, whom he determined to enter upon a war with Rome, after he had been, for some time, in a fluctuating condition on that head. Tully informs us, that, during his residence here, a philosopher, named Phormio, esteemed the best orator in Asia, expatiated in an harangue on the duties of a general, and the rules of the military art, before him; which charming the audience, Hannibal was asked his opinion of it. To which the Carthaginian frankly replied, "That, in his time, he had seen many old dotards, but none that came up to Phormio." Stobæus informs us, that this Phormio was a Stoic philosopher; and that when he undertook to prove, that a wise man only was fit to be a general, Hannibal laughed, as being convinced, that a skill in martial affairs was to be acquired, not by theory, but by practice.
- b The Carthaginians, being apprehensive, that, by Hannibal's intrigues, they might be embroiled with the Romans, thought proper to send them advice, that he was withdrawn to the court of Antiochus. This news not a little alarmed them; and the king might have turned so lucky an accident greatly to his advantage, had he known how to make a proper use of it.

- Hannibal's* constant opinion was, that Italy should be made the seat of the war. To enforce this, he observed to Antiochus, that Italy would supply a foreign invader both with a sufficient quantity of provisions, and a proper number of recruits; and that if the Romans were permitted to transport their Italian forces into any foreign country, no prince or state in the world could make head against them. He offered to sail to Carthage, and did not doubt but he should persuade his countrymen to take up arms against the common enemy, provided the king would trust him with the command of a fleet of an hundred ships, and a body of seventeen thousand land-forces on board. With these troops, he proposed making a descent in some part of Italy; whilst the king himself should assemble a numerous army, and put himself in a condition to advance to his relief, whenever it should be thought convenient. Had this salutary advice been followed, Antiochus would not have been obliged soon after to submit to such conditions of peace, as the Romans thought fit to impose upon him. But, notwithstanding that prince's wrong conduct, at first he approved very much of Hannibal's proposal; which induced that general to dispatch one Ariston, a Tyrian, to Carthage, in order to engage the senate there more strongly in his interest. To secure the fidelity of this person, Hannibal made him some valuable presents, after he had furnished him with proper instructions, and promised him great rewards in Antiochus's name, in case he happily executed his commission. Ariston was no sooner arrived at Carthage, than the people began to suspect the errand he came upon. As he associated only with the members of the Barbantine faction, the suspicions, that had been entertained, were turned into a violent presumption of his guilt; so that he was seized, and called upon to clear himself; but not having the good fortune to do this to the satisfaction of the dominant party; great debates arose in the senate concerning him. Some members of that august assembly were for treating him as a spy; but others thought this might be a bad precedent, as nothing could be proved directly against him; insinuating further, that as such an action could be considered in no other light than as a violation of the laws of hospitality, the Tyrians would not fail making reprisals upon the Carthaginians residing at Tyre, and other trading cities in their dominions. However, the determination of this affair was deferred till the next day; which gave the crafty Tyrian an opportunity of making his escape in the night, after he had fixed, in several public places, papers, which fully declared the occasion of his coming to Carthage. The senate, to shew how religiously they intended to observe the last treaty, immediately sent advice of this to the Romans.

- THE Romans, soon after the arrival of the express with this news, nominated P. Sulpicius and P. Villius their ambassadors to Antiochus, ordering them to take Pergamus in their way, that they might confer with Eumenes, who resided there, a violent enemy of Antiochus. Sulpicius was detained at Pergamus by an indisposition; but Villius, in pursuance of his orders, came to Ephesus, where he found Hannibal. He had many conferences with him, paid him several visits, and speciously affected to shew him a particular esteem on all occasions; but his chief aim, by all this insidious behaviour, was to render him suspected, and lessen his credit with the king; in which he succeeded but too well, as afterwards manifestly appeared. This we learn both from Livy and Polybius; the latter of which historians represents this application of Villius to Hannibal as a premeditated design, in order to destroy his interest with king Antiochus; and the former owns, that the affair took the same turn as Villius might have had in view by the execution of such a design. However, the first author, for a very obvious reason, tells us, that the only end of Villius's conversation with Hannibal was to sound that general, and to remove any fears or apprehensions he might be under from the Romans. Claudius, and the Libri Græci Aciliani, according to Livy, affirmed, that Scipio was joined with Sulpicius and Villius in this embassy, and even transmitted to posterity some of the particulars that passed in conversation betwixt the Roman ministers and Hannibal. According to these authors, Scipio desired Hannibal to tell him, who, in his opinion, was the most celebrated general in history. To which the Carthaginian general replied, Alexander king of Macedon, because, with an inconsiderable body of troops, he had defeated most numerous armies, and extended his conquests into countries so widely distant, that it seemed impossible for any man even to traverse them. Being then asked, who was the next to him, he answered, Pyrrhus, who first understood the art of encamping to advantage; neither did ever any commander, continued he, make a more judicious choice of posts, or better understood how to draw up his forces, or was more happy in conciliating the affections and favour of mankind to him, as evidently appeared from the disposition of the Italian troops, who were more desirous of being under his government, than that of the Romans, though they had so long been subject to them. Scipio then demanding of him, whom he looked upon as the third captain, he made no scruple of mentioning himself. Here Scipio not being able to refrain from laughing, But what would you have said, added he, had you vanquished me? I would, replied Hannibal, have ranked myself above Alexander, Pyrrhus, and all the generals the world ever produced. Scipio was not insensible to this artful and delicate flattery; which, by giving him no rival, seemed to insinuate, that no captain was worthy of being put in comparison with him. This answer of Hannibal is much more probable and ingenious, than that mentioned by Plutarch, who makes that general to have given the first place to Pyrrhus, the second to Scipio, and to himself the third; which is low, jejune, and quite destitute of that elegance and vivacity, which Livy's relation, in conformity to Hannibal's character, is seasoned with.

Hannibal removes some suspicions Antiochus had entertained of him.

Antiochus, having entertained a suspicion of Hannibal, ever since his late conferences with Villius, would not, for some time, admit him into his councils. This slight, at first, Hannibal took no notice of; but afterwards, judging it expedient to inquire into the cause of such a sudden change in the king's conduct towards him, that he might have an opportunity of clearing himself, if any ill offices had been done him, he intreated that prince to discover to him the reason of his late coldness; which having learnt, he addressed himself to Antiochus in the following terms: "My father Hamilcar, Antiochus, obliged me, in my tender infancy, at the altar, to take an oath always to bear an implacable aversion to the Romans. Animated by this hatred, I have waged war with them six-and-thirty years; prompted thereto by it, I have abandoned my native country in times of peace, and taken sanctuary in your dominions; fired by it, should you frustrate my expectations, I will fly to every part of the globe, and endeavour to rouse up all nations against the Romans. If any of your favourites therefore would incense you against me, let him accuse me of some other crime. I hate mortally the Romans, and am equally hated by them. For the truth of this I appeal to the manes of my father Hamilcar, and all the deities, who were witnesses of my oath. So long therefore as you are disposed to come to a rupture with the Romans, you may rank Hannibal amongst your best friends. But, if any considerations should incline you to peace, I desire to be intirely excluded your councils." This speech, uttered with such force and energy, and expressive of so much sincerity, removed all the prejudices the king had imbibed; so that Hannibal was not only restored to favour, but preparations made to execute the scheme he had formed.

Antiochus deserts Hannibal.

THOUGH the king had come to a resolution to give Hannibal the command of part of his fleet, yet, by the intrigues of his ministers, the equipment of it was not only at first retarded, but even the expediency of putting the Carthaginian in that post debated in council. Thoas the Ætolian suggested, "That it was improper to weaken

- a " the king's fleet at that juncture, by undertaking, with part of it, an expedition
 " to Africa; that, in case his majesty's interest had rendered necessary such an expedition, no one would have been more improper than Hannibal to have conducted
 " it; that it was imprudent to repose so much confidence in an exile, a Carthaginian, whose fortune or genius might put every day into his head a thousand different projects; that the same Hannibal had already acquired, and which he considered as his peculiar inheritance, was too great for one, who acted under the king;
 " that the king alone ought to be looked upon as the general and conductor of the war; that, if Hannibal should lose either a fleet, or an army, the loss would be as great, as if a commander of less note had occasioned it; that if success attended
 b " his arms, not Antiochus, but Hannibal, would have the glory of all the victories ascribed to him; that supposing he should conquer the Romans in this war, what hopes could be entertained of Hannibal's living peaceably as a subject under him; when he was scarce satisfied with the supreme power at Carthage? that his behaviour from his youth, having always in his mind grasped at universal empire, had not been such as could induce them to believe, that he would tamely submit to any superior in his old age; that however, if he could not overcome his fondness for Hannibal, he might make use of him as a counsellor and companion, but not as a general, &c." These malicious suggestions, the pure effect of envy, made such an impression upon Antiochus's low and groveling mind, in which a sordid jealousy had extinguished all noble and generous sentiments, that he dropt the above-mentioned laudable design, an immediate execution of which only could, at that juncture, have effectually embarrassed the Romans. In the mean time the Carthaginians offered to supply the Romans with a thousand bushels of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, as a free gift; to equip a fleet at their own expence for their service; and to remit to Rome the whole remaining part of the sum imposed upon them by the late treaty immediately, though it would not have been due for many years to come by one of the articles of that treaty. The Romans gave their ambassadors a kind reception, and told them, " That they should only require from their
 c " principals the ships, that their late engagements obliged them to furnish; that they would pay ready money for whatever supplies of corn they should send them; and that the sum, due to them from Carthage, should be paid at equal payments, in the manner stipulated at the conclusion of the last peace." From this incident, we may form some sort of an idea of the incredible industry of the Carthaginians, as well as of their surprising genius for trade; since from hence it appears, that, notwithstanding they had been intirely exhausted by a long, bloody, and most expensive war, notwithstanding they had been stripped of the best part of their dominions by the Romans and Masiniſſa, notwithstanding they had been deprived, in a manner, of all their ships, and almost rendered incapable, to outward appearance, of applying themselves to any single branch of commerce, they yet found d " means, in ten or twelve years time, to become wealthy and powerful; which could only have been the effect of a flourishing and extensive trade. At what an exalted pitch of power therefore must they have arrived, had Hannibal either been duly supported in Italy, or contended with a nation of not such an inflexible resolution for the dominion of the world!

SOME time after this, Antiochus found his affairs in such a perplexed situation, that he was at a loss what measures to pursue. In this emergency, his ministers were obliged to have recourse to Hannibal, who, in abilities, infinitely outshone all other persons at his court, notwithstanding the late affront put upon him. That renowned general, forgetting the ill usage he had met with, appeared as much disposed to assist the distressed prince with his advice, as he would have been capable, had his plan of operations been executed, of supporting him before by his conduct, and personal bravery. In proof of which, he addressed himself to Antiochus in the following terms: " Had I been admitted into your councils ever since our arrival in Greece, I should have declared my sentiments, when an alliance with the Achaëans, Boeotians, and people of Eubœa, was brought upon the carpet, in the same manner as I shall this day, when we are to consider the expediency of a treaty with the Thessalians. You are, above all things, to invite Philip king of Macedon to enter into an alliance with you. As to the Eubœans, Boeotians, and Thessalians, they are not to be

Hannibal's advice to him,

" regarded, since they court your friendship through fear. Upon the first appearance a
 " of a Roman army, they will change sides, and will be well received, as pretending " to have been over-ruled by a superior power, and acted against their natural incli" nations through compulsion. Besides, the assistance those people can afford you, if
 " well affected, is inconsiderable; whereas Philip has lately shewn himself a match " for the Romans. You will likewise have the Ætolians, a state, that, in the late " war betwixt Philip and the Romans, caused the scale to preponderate in favour of " the latter, to act for you. I can therefore, provided you succeed in your negotia" tion, insure you success. But, if Philip cannot be prevailed upon to join his arms " with ours, we may however prevent him from assisting the enemy. Your son b
 " Seleucus is now at Lyfimachia; let him advance, with the troops under his com" mand, through Thrace to the confines of Macedonia, and lay them waste; which " will oblige the Macedonian monarch to employ all his forces in the defence and pro" tection of his own dominions. You have now my opinion with regard to Philip.
 " And as to the war in general, had my advice been listened to, the Romans would,
 " before this time, have heard of greater exploits than the reduction of Chalcis, and
 " the castle of Euripus; even that Etruria, Liguria, and all Cisalpine Gaul, were in " a flame, and Hannibal, a name terrible to them, once more in Italy. However;
 " your affairs may still be retrieved; assemble all your land and sea forces, station
 " part of your fleet at Corcyra, in order to prevent the Romans from approaching
 " your frontiers; order the other part to hover about the coast of Italy facing Africa c " and Sardinia; and do you, at the head of your army, march into the territory of " Byllis. By these dispositions, you will provide for the security of Greece, and not " only make the enemy believe, that you have an intention to pass over thither, but " likewise be able actually to land all your troops there, should the situation of " affairs require it. However deficient I may be in other points, the vicissitudes of " fortune I have met with amongst the Romans, enable me to point out to you the " most effectual way of distressing them. In the execution of the plan I have sub" mitted to your consideration, you may depend upon my assisting you with the " utmost zeal and activity. As to the rest, may the gods give you success in this;
 " and all your other undertakings!" The speech was received with general applause; d but none of his salutary admonitions listened to.

Hannibal defeated in a sea engagement.

AFTER Antiochus was forced to abandon Europe, by the victorious arms of the Romans, he retired to Ephesus. Here he, for some time, took up his residence, without any apprehensions of danger, his flatterers persuading him, that the enemy never durst pursue him into Asia. Hannibal, being now in great esteem at that prince's court, thought it but just to undeceive him in a point of such importance.
 He therefore told him, " That he did not so much doubt of an invasion of his Asiatic
 " dominions, as wonder, that the Romans were not already there; that it was easier " to transport an army from Greece into Asia, than from Italy into Greece; that the " Romans were as powerful by sea as by land; that a Roman squadron was seen, e
 " some time before, hovering about the promontory Malea; that he had received " intelligence of the departure of a fresh reinforcement of ships, and a new general, " from Italy." From whence he inferred, " That Antiochus must resolve either " to abdicate his throne, or oppose vigorously a people, who grasped at the empire " of the world." As this discourse of Hannibal, who was both the most able and faithful counsellor at the Syrian monarch's court, not a little affected the prince to whom it was directed, he made the necessary dispositions for his defence; but all his efforts proved unsuccessful. Even his fleet, under the conduct of the great Han- nibal himself, was defeated by that of the Rhodians, commanded by Eudamus, off of Sida, on the coast of Pamphylia, and miserably shattered. However, the Rhodians f suffered extremely in the action, sustaining almost as great a loss of men and ships as Hannibal. The bad success of this engagement was intirely owing to the ill conduct of Apollonius, one of Antiochus's admirals, who fled, with the squadron he commanded, almost in the beginning of the fight. Notwithstanding which, Hannibal made an excellent retreat, the enemy not being in a condition to pursue him. However, the Rhodians detaching Chariclitus with twenty beaked ships to Patara, and Megiste, a small island, with a commodious port, in the sea of Lycia, prevented the junction of Hannibal's shattered galleys with another Syrian squadron; which was a great mortification to the Carthaginian. In short, after a series of misfortunes, Antiochus found himself obliged to send Zeufis, the governor of Lydia, and his son Antipater, with a g carte

a carte blanche, to the Roman camp, in order to procure a peace upon any terms. The article chiefly insisted upon was, that Hannibal should be delivered up to the Romans; with which Antiochus, being unable to defend himself, was forced to comply. However, Hannibal, foreseeing what would happen, had taken care to retire in time to the island of Crete. It appears from Scipio Nasica's speech in Livy, that Hannibal was a general in the Syrian army at the battle of Magnesia; from whence, as well as from other circumstances, we have reason to believe, that he was present in all the principal actions, that happened between the Romans and Antiochus *.

Hannibal, upon his arrival in Crete, took sanctuary amongst the Gortynii; but having brought great treasure with him, and considering the avarice of the Cretans, b he judged it would be proper to have recourse to some stratagem, in order to secure himself, especially as he had reason to apprehend, that the Cretans were advertised of the riches he brought with him. He therefore filled several vessels with molten lead, just covering them over with gold and silver; which he deposited in the temple of Diana, in the presence of the Gortynii, with whom, he said, he trusted all his treasure. Justin tells us, that he left this there as a security for his good behaviour, and lived for some time very quietly in those parts. He however took care to conceal his riches in hollow statues of brass, which, according to some, he always carried along with him, or, as others will have it, exposed to view in a place of public resort, as things of little value. At last he retired to the court of Prusias king of Bitbynia, c with whom he found means to unite several neighbouring princes and states, and so formed a powerful confederacy against Eumenes king of Pergamus, a professed friend of the Romans. A rupture soon commenced betwixt them, which was followed by a great effusion of blood on both sides. During this war, Hannibal employed a stratagem of an extraordinary kind, in a sea-fight, to destroy Eumenes, which, he thought, would be of the utmost consequence to him. He put into earthen vessels a vast number of the most venomous serpents, which he ordered to be collected for that purpose, commanding the greatest part of his captains to attack Eumenes's ship, and throw these vessels on board him, whilst the rest stood on the defensive. The admiral-galley Hannibal discovered, by sending out a boat, with a letter to Eumenes; d which enabled the officers above-mentioned to attack it with great fury. Eumenes would have been either killed or taken, had he not sheered off, and been too swift for his pursuers. However, the other ships of Pergamus sustained the fight with great vigour, till the earthen vessels were thrown into them. At first they only laughed at this, and were very much surprised to find such weapons employed against them; but being surrounded with the serpents, which flew out of these vessels when they were broken, they found themselves seized with such horror, that they retired in confusion to their camp on the shore. Nepos tells us, that Hannibal promised a great reward to the person, that should kill Eumenes; that when the officer, whom he sent to him, came on board the admiral-galley, it was imagined he brought proposals of e peace; that Eumenes, instead of this, receiving a letter full of ridicule, could not conceive what was the end of such a commission; and that, irritated hereby, he immediately began the engagement. The same author likewise intimates, that Hannibal gave that prince several overthrows by land, and reduced him to great straits, more by force of genius, or dint of conduct, than superiority of strength *.

The Romans, receiving intelligence of the important services Hannibal had done Prusias, and of the influence he had at that prince's court, sent T. Quintius Flaminius f And poisons himself, in order to avoid falling into the hands of the Romans. thither as their ambassador. Flaminius, at his first audience, complained of the protection Prusias gave Hannibal, representing that famous general "as the most inveterate and implacable enemy the Romans ever had; as one who had ruined both his own country and Antiochus, by drawing them into a destructive war with "Rome." Prusias, in order to ingratiate himself with the Romans, immediately sent a party of soldiers to surround Hannibal's palace, that he might find it impossible to make his escape. The Carthaginian, having before discovered, that no confidence was to be reposed in Prusias, had contrived seven secret outlets in his palace, to evade the machinations of his enemies, even if they could carry their point at the Bitbynian court; which he was actually meditating, when the above-mentioned detachment arrived. Perceiving no possibility of escaping, he had recourse to the poison, which he had long kept for this melancholy occasion ; which taking in his hand, “ Let us, a “ said he, deliver the Romans from the disquietude, with which they have long been “ tortured, since they have not patience to wait for an old man’s death. Flaminius

 “ will not acquire any reputation or glory by a victory gained over a betrayed and “ defenceless person. This single day will be a lasting testimony of the degeneracy “ of the Romans. Their ancestors gave Pyrrhus intelligence of a design to poison “ him, that he might guard against the impending danger, even when he was at “ the head of a powerful army in Italy; but they have deputed a person of consular “ dignity to excite Prusias impiously to murder one, who has taken refuge in his “ dominions, in violation of the laws of hospitality.” Then he denounced dreadful imprecations against Prusias, and his kingdom, and invoked the gods presiding over b the sacred rights of hospitality ; after which, drinking off the poison he had prepared, he expired, at seventy years of age. Cornelius Nepos intimates, that Hannibal destroyed himself by a subtle (R) poison, which he carried about with him in a ring for that purpose. Plutarch relates, that, according to some writers, he ordered a servant to strangle him with a cloak wrapped about his neck ; and others will have it, that, in imitation of Midas and Themistocles, he drank bulls blood. Be that as it will, his death reflected an eternal ignominy and disgrace upon the Romans, whose insatiable thirst after empire had extinguished all generous sentiments, and every spark of virtue, in their minds *.

Thus died Hannibal, the greatest general perhaps, notwithstanding his misfor- c tunes, that any age ever produced ; a general, who would have utterly subverted the haughty Roman republic, had he not been sacrificed to the resentment of an envious, wicked, and most abandoned faction. Polybius seems to make him a pattern for all succeeding commanders ; and Livy, notwithstanding his partiality, owns himself astonished at his wonderful conduct, after the defeat of his brother Asdrubal. No other general could have found means, after so terrible a blow, of maintaining himself in one of the poorest spots of Italy, for several years, without any reinforcement of troops, or supplies of provisions, from Carthage. The perfect harmony kept up in his army, composed of such a variety of nations, viz. Greeks, Africans, Spaniards, Gauls, Carthaginians, Italians, &c. differing in laws, manners, language, genius, and d almost every other particular, even after fortune had declared against him, and when they were in want both of money and provisions, was a full demonstration of his consummate abilities. The inviolable attachment of his new allies to him, when he was reduced to the necessity of making them sustain almost the whole burden of the war, by quartering his army upon them, and levying contributions in their respective countries, clearly evinces the same thing. Polybius observes, that he over-reached most of the generals that opposed him ; but was himself never outwitted by any of them ; and seems to insinuate, that it would have been much more fatal to the Car- thaginians to have lost him, than any of the armies he ever commanded : and indeed it sufficiently appears, from the preceding part of this history, that he was the life e and soul not only of the army, but likewise of the Carthaginian state. In fine, by his own surprising capacity, he carried on a war against the most martial people in the world many years, in a remote country, in spite of the violent opposition made by a powerful domestic faction, which refused him supplies of every kind, and thwarted him on all occasions. With regard to his political character, we shall only observe, that the secret intelligence he held with Philip king of Macedon, the wise counsels he gave Antiochus, the double regulation he introduced at Carthage, the potent confederacy he formed in favour of king Prusias, besides many other instances, that will occur to our readers, evidently prove him to have made as great a figure in the cabinet, as the field. What we have already observed of his facetious disposition, and f

(R) Zonaras relates, that Hannibal was under no apprehension of a sudden violent death, though he took such precautions to secure himself. This was occasioned by an answer the oracle gave him, when consulted on a certain emergency, viz. that he should die in Libya. However, adds that author, the prediction was fulfilled ; since the spot of ground, on which he took the fatal draught, was called Libya.

Aurelius Victor tells us, that Hannibal died in a village of Bithynia called Libyssa, situated near the sea, where he was buried in a wooden coffin, with this inscription upon his tomb, Here lies Hannibal, and that this was still remaining in his time (24).

- a. love for the muses, is confirmed by Gellius and others. His religious and moral conduct Livy paints in the blackest colours; but the testimony, as to this point, Polybius has given of him, the humanity with which he treated the bodies of Marcellus and Sempronius Gracchus, the high reverence he expressed for the gods on all occasions, his singular continence, and uncommon wisdom, his contempt of riches, the extraordinary temperance he was famous for, even in the midst of the greatest affluence, when he was at the head of the state of Carthage; these shining qualities, we say, and others, attested by the best authors, will not permit us to give any attention to the unfair representation of that prejudiced historian. Polybius however intimates, that he was accused at Carthage of avarice, and of cruelty at Rome; and that people
- b. were much divided in their sentiments concerning him. This cannot appear strange to any one, who considers, that, as he had many implacable enemies in both cities, he must, of course, have been drawn by some of them in the most disadvantageous light. But though, adds Polybius, we should allow some of the defects he has been charged with true, yet it would be but fair to conclude, that they ought rather to be attributed to the difficulties with which he was obliged to struggle during the course of so long and burdensome a war, than to his own natural disposition. Besides, he might be forced frequently to fall in with the inclinations of his officers, when they were opposite to his own, in order to excite them to a chearful discharge of their duty. These, it is reasonable to suppose, he could not always keep within proper bounds,
- c. considering the natural bent of his countrymen, any more than the soldiers, who fought under them. Be that as it will, Polybius looked upon Hannibal to have been a general of so noble and sublime a genius, that, in his opinion, had he at first attacked other powers, and reserved the Romans for the last nation to have contended with, he must have intirely overthrown their republic, and consequently rendered Carthage mistress of the world.

- It has been already observed, that, by one of the articles of the late treaty, the Carthaginians were to restore to Masiniſſa all the territories and cities he possessed before the beginning of the war. To these Scipio annexed part of Syphax's dominions, in order to reward the zeal and affection that prince had discovered for the
- d. Romans on all occasions, ever since the commencement of his friendship with them. After Hannibal's flight to Antiochus, and his emissary Ariston's escape, related above, the Romans began to look upon the Carthaginians with a suspicious eye, though, to prevent all distrust, the latter of these states had ordered two ships to pursue Hannibal, confiscated his effects, razed his house, and, by a public decree, declared him an exile. It was agreed likewise to notify to the Romans Ariston's commission, as well as escape, in order to shew their disapprobation of Hannibal's design, by the deputies they dispatched to Rome, to complain of Masiniſſa's unjust pretensions. That prince, being apprised, that Carthage was miserably rent by factions, and upon but very indifferent terms with the Romans, on account of the two events above mentioned, seized
- e. upon part of a maritime territory, which was extremely rich and fruitful, situated near the Lesser Syrtis, called Emporia. Both sides sent ambassadors to Rome on this occasion, to support the titles of their respective masters to the district in dispute. The Carthaginians alleged, "That this was within the limits of their African dominions, as settled by Scipio; and that this had been acknowledged by Masiniſſa himself, who, when he had pursued one Apheires, a Numidian prince, making an excursion out of his own territories, as far as the borders of Cyrenaica, would not pass through Emporia, without asking leave of the Carthaginians, looking upon it then as a territory, indisputably belonging to them." To which the Numidian ministers replied, "That what they so confidently advanced about Scipio's settling
- f. "the limits, was false; that the Carthaginians, in strictness and equity, ought only "to have the spot of ground, on which Byrsa stood, every other part of their African "dominions being taken from the natives by fraud and violence; that, as to the "district in question, they could not prove themselves to have been in possession of "it since the infancy of their republic, nay, that it had been any considerable time "under their jurisdiction; that the Carthaginians and Numidians had been masters

“ of it by turns, just as success attended their respective arms; and that they ^a hoped the senate would permit things to remain in their present situation.” Hereupon the conscript fathers thought proper to send Scipio Africanus, C. Cornelius Cethegus, and M. Minutius Rufus, to examine the controversy upon the spot. However, they returned without coming to any resolution, leaving the business in the same uncertain state in which they found it. Whether the commissioners acted in this manner of their own head, or by order of the senate, is not so certain, as that the interest of the Romans rendered a perfect harmony betwixt the contending parties then improper; for otherwise Scipio, who had deserved so well of both of them, could, by his own single authority, have put an end to the dispute ².

Masinissa, not satisfied with the possession of the district he had so unjustly usurped, ^b over-ran a province, that his father Gala had taken from the Carthaginians, and Syphax from him, from whom it had returned to its former masters, through the charms and endearments of Sophonisba. The Carthaginian deputies pleaded the cause of their principals, and Masinissa his, before the Roman commissioners, with exceeding heat. The Carthaginians urged, that “ this territory was theirs, both by right of inheritance, and deed of gift.” On the other hand, Masinissa insisted, “ that it was formerly part of his father’s kingdom; that, in consequence of this title, he had taken possession of it; and that his pretensions were so indubitable, that he only feared, lest the modesty of the Romans, which might render them timorous of indulging a friend and ally in his just claims upon their common enemy, should ^c prove prejudicial to him.” The commissioners, in conformity to the disposition of their republic, referred this dispute, which happened ten years after the former, to the decision of the senate, and consequently left it undetermined. However, in the consulate of L. Æmilius Paulus and Cn. Bæbius Tampilus, the Romans effected an accommodation betwixt Masinissa and the Carthaginians, confirming the former in the possession of his unjust acquisitions, and restoring to the latter an hundred hostages they had, till that time, detained ^d.

Masinissa endeavours to embroil the Carthaginians with the Romans.

Masinissa, grasping at farther conquests, endeavoured soon after to embroil the Carthaginians with the Romans. In order to this, he concerted measures with the Roman ambassadors in Africa, to prejudice the conscript fathers against them. The latter did not scruple to affirm, that, to their certain knowledge, Perseus king of Macedon, with whom the Romans then were upon the verge of a war, had privately sent ambassadors to Carthage, to negotiate an alliance with that state; and that the senate was assembled by night in the temple of Æsculapius, to confer with them: whilst the former, in as strong a manner, asserted, that the Carthaginians had dispatched ministers to Perseus, to conclude a treaty with him. Livy seems to intimate, that the Carthaginians would not own this; but that the Romans, always attentive to the insinuations of their enemies, believed it to be true. The future conduct of that people towards Carthage renders Livy’s authority, in this point, indisputable ^e.

And makes an irruption into the province of Tyica.

Not long after this, Masinissa made an irruption into the province of Tyica, where ^f he soon possessed himself of above seventy, or, as Appian will have it, fifty towns and castles. This obliged the Carthaginians to apply, with great importunity, to the Roman senate for redress, their hands being so tied up by an article of the last treaty, that they could not repel force by force, in case of an invasion, without the consent of the Romans. The Carthaginian ministers at Rome represented the miserable condition of their republic in the most moving terms. They declared, “ That Masinissa was intirely void of honour; that, without the interposition of that august assembly, to whom they then addressed themselves, no limits could be prescribed to his cruelty, insolence, avarice and ambition. They therefore begged the conscript fathers either themselves to determine the point in debate betwixt ^g their principals and Masinissa; or to suffer the former to dislodge the latter from his conquests by force of arms; or lastly, if they were resolved to support the Numidian in all his unjust pretensions, to specify, once for all, what territories the Carthaginians were to cede to him, that they might know what hereafter they had to depend upon.” To this they subjoined, “ That, if the Carthaginians had incurred the displeasure of the Romans in any point inadvertently since the conclusion of the last peace, they begged they would punish them for the offence themselves, and not leave them exposed to the insults and vexations of Masinissa, since

- a " they preferred an utter extinction to the barbarities and depredations they were " forced to suffer from so merciless a tyrant." Then throwing themselves prostrate on the earth, they burst out into tears; which making a deep impression upon the senate in their favour, Gulussa, Masinissa's son, being then present, and called upon to vindicate his father's conduct, replied in terms to the following effect: " That " he had received no instructions from his father how to act in the present emergency,
 " since it could not be foreseen, that any thing would be laid to his charge; that " the Carthaginians had had several clandestine meetings by night in the temple of " Æsculapius, the object of whose consultations was kept secret from him, after which " deputies were dispatched to Rome; that the sole design of his father's sending b " him to Rome was, to intreat the senate not to pay any regard to the insinuations
 " of the common enemy against him, since the implacable hatred they bore him was " occasioned by the inviolable fidelity, with which he had so long been attached to " the Romans." The senate, after hearing both sides, answered, " That it would " be proper for Gulussa to set out immediately for Numidia, in order to acquaint his " father with the complaints of the Carthaginians against him; that he ought to send " deputies to Rome, to remove all difficulties that obstructed an accommodation
 " between him and them; that they would continue to serve him as they had hitherto
 " done, but not to the prejudice of the Carthaginians; that it was but just the antient " limits should be preserved; that the Carthaginians ought to be maintained in the c " possession of those territories, which the late treaty had allotted them." The deputies of both powers were then dismissed with the usual presents. The Romans were prompted to act after this perfidious manner, partly by that implacable hatred they bore the Carthaginians, and partly by the hopes of receiving succours from Ma- sinissa in the Macedonian war, which they were just going to enter upon. The Numi- dian answered their expectations; for he did not only supply them with corn, but likewise sent a body of troops, consisting of a thousand horse, and as many foot, with twenty-two elephants, under the command of his son Misigenes, to their assistance. However, this proceeded rather from a motive of policy than gratitude; for he considered, that if the Romans were victorious in this war, his affairs could but d remain in the same situation; whereas, should they be overcome, he doubted not reducing Carthage, and making himself master of Africa ^c.

- THE Carthaginians, notwithstanding the lamentable slavery under which they groaned, dispatched ambassadors to Rome, who acquainted the senate, " That their " state would immediately transport a million bushels of wheat, and five hundred " thousand of barley, into what part of the world the Romans pleased; that they " were sensible such a supply was not proportioned to those happy effects of the " Roman generosity and goodness, which their principals had so long experienced,
 " neither did it correspond with their inclinations; but that they hoped it would be " considered, by way of atonement for this defect, that, during the prosperity of e " both republics, in former times, they had given frequent instances of their being " true and faithful allies." Masinissa's ambassadors not only offered the same quantity of corn, but likewise to reinforce the Roman army with another body of twelve hundred horse, attended by twelve more elephants, and to obey all the senate's commands with the utmost alacrity. But neither could the Carthaginians, by such an abject and mean-spirited behaviour, a sufficient indication of that low and groveling mind, which seems to have been the distinguishing characteristic of their nation, prevail upon the Romans to discontinue their chicane. They spun out matters to a tedious length, not permitting the ministers they employed to adjust all disputes betwixt Masinissa and the Carthaginians, to arrive at a decision. By this conduct they enabled f the former to exhaust the latter, and consequently paved the way to the immediate destruction of a state, which to them, of all others, still appeared the most formidable ^d.

WHATEVER villainous designs the Romans might have formed, they affected to shew a great regard to the principles of justice and honour. They therefore sent Cato, a man famous for committing enormities under the specious pretext of public spirit, to accommodate all differences betwixt Masinissa and the Carthaginians. The latter very well knew their fate, had they submitted to such a mediation, and therefore appealed to the treaty, which had been concluded by Scipio, as the only rule, by which both their conduct, and that of their adversary, ought to be examined. This unreasonable appeal so incensed the righteous Cato, that he pronounced them a devoted people. As the intention of that upright person was not so much to forward the observation or conclusion of treaties, as to widen breaches, discover the strength and condition of Carthage, which was then very flourishing, notwithstanding the many blows it had received, and gratify the Roman ambition by all possible means, it is not so strange, that he should, even in the most absurd, though most virulent manner, press the senate, after his return home, to destroy that city. It is much more wonderful, that a Frenchman should censure this conduct, when it so exactly quadrates with that of a certain court, which he cannot possibly be a stranger to, for above a century past. However, as we have more than a bare jealousy of the growing power, as well as ambitious designs, of that court, we may, without offence, give it as our opinion, that, in order to secure the liberties of Europe, as well as to introduce public faith, justice, and honour once more into the world, it is necessary, that the state represented by that court should be humbled, if not destroyed.*

Masinissa defeats the Carthaginians.

SOME years before this time, Carthage was miserably rent by three potent factions. That devoted to the Romans was headed by one Hanno, a descendant, as may be supposed, of the person, who ruined his country by not supporting Hannibal; that in the interest of Masinissa by Hannibal, surnamed Passer; and that formed of the populace by Hamilcar, surnamed Sannis, and Carthalo. But, of late, two powerful parties had struggled for the dominion of the city, one of which, called the popular faction, prevailed over the other, composed of the grandees, and their adherents, and expelled forty of the senators. They retired to the court of Masinissa, to excite him to a war with the Carthaginians, who sent Gulussa and Micipsa, two of his sons, to Carthage, to solicit their return. However, the gates were shut upon them at their approach, lest the people, moved by the tears of those related to the exiles, should grant their request; nay, Hamilcar, surnamed Sannis, one of the Carthaginian generals, closely pursued Gulussa, and cut off some of his retinue. This occasioning a fresh rupture, Masinissa besieged Oroscofa, in violation of the last treaty. Adrubal, another Carthaginian general, advanced to the relief of Oroscofa, with an army of twenty-five thousand foot, and four hundred horse, and was immediately joined by a body of six thousand men, under the conduct of Asasis and Suba, two Numidian captains, who deserted from Masinissa. Animated by this accession of strength, Adrubal approached the Numidian, and skirmished successfully with some of the advanced guards. Masinissa, observing the eagerness of the Carthaginian, retired before him, as though he was afraid of his superior force, and insensibly drew him into a large and desolate plain, surrounded with precipices, and void of all kinds of sustenance. Adrubal, finding himself thus decoyed, possessed himself of several eminences, and prepared for an engagement; which immediately ensuing, and ending in favour of Masinissa, the Carthaginians sued for peace. In order to terminate their contests with that prince, the Carthaginians offered to yield up the territory of Emporia, to pay down two hundred talents of silver, and remit eight hundred more at a stipulated time to him. But Masinissa insisting upon the return of the exiles, they did not come to any decision. It is observable, that the Roman deputies, who arrived in the Numidian camp soon after the engagement, had orders to insist upon a peace, in case the Carthaginians defeated Masinissa; but to assure that prince of the continuance of their friendship, and push him on to the war, in case he was victorious. This they did, in order to complete the ruin of the Carthaginians. How, through the vindictive disposition of Gulussa, and the breaking out of the plague amongst them, the Carthaginian forces were almost utterly destroyed, our readers will find in a former part of this work, to which we must also beg leave to refer them for the particulars of the action just hinted at†.

Cato prevails upon the Roman senate to declare war
thage.

EVER since Carthage had rejected the mediation of the Romans, Cato had made his utmost efforts to prevail upon the conscript fathers to destroy that city. But Scipio Nasica, having a superior influence in the senate, had hitherto, notwithstanding the grievous provocation he met with from the Carthaginians, already related, prevented a rupture. However, the people of Carthage, knowing the Romans to be their inveterate enemies, and reflecting upon the iniquitous treatment they had met with from

* LIV. in epist. 47, 48, 49. APPIAN. ubi sup. c. 38. FLOR. l. ii. c. 15. VELL. PATERC. l. i. sub fin. PLUT. in Caton. Vide & histoire des Carthagin. par M. ROLLIN, tom. i. p. 421. † LIV. epist. 48. APPIAN. ubi sup. Univers. hist. vol. iv. p. 769, 770.

- a them ever since the commencement of their disputes with Masinissa, were under great apprehensions of a visit from them. To prevent this, as much as in them lay, by a decree of the senate, they impeached Adrubal general of the army, and Carthalo commander of the auxiliary forces, together with their accomplices, as guilty of high treason, for being the authors of the war waged against the king of Numidia. They sent a deputation to Rome, to discover what sentiments were entertained there of their late conduct, and to know what satisfaction the Romans required. These ministers meeting with a cold reception, other deputies were dispatched, who returned with the same success. This made the unhappy citizens of Carthage believe, that their destruction was resolved upon; which threw them into the utmost despair.
- b And indeed they had but too just grounds for such a melancholy apprehension, the Roman senate now discovering an inclination to fall in with Cato's measures. It is said, that, in order to excite the conscript fathers to a vigorous resolution against the Carthaginians, that incendiary, after one of his most virulent speeches, threw out of the lapet of his robe, in the midst of the senate, some African figs, whose size and beauty observing the senators to admire; Know, said he, that it is but three days since these figs were gathered; such is the distance between the enemy and us. About the same time the city of Utica, being the second in Africa, and famous for its immense riches, as well as its equally capacious and commodious port, submitted to the Romans. As the possession of so important a fortress, which, by reason of its vicinity
- c to Carthage, might serve as a place of arms in the attack of that city, enabled the Romans to put the design they had been so long meditating in execution, immediately after this event, they declared war against the Carthaginians, without the least hesitation. In consequence of which declaration, the consuls M. Manilius Nepos and L. Marcius Censorinus were dispatched with an army and a fleet, to begin hostilities with the utmost expedition. The land-forces, destined to act against the Carthaginians, consisted of eighty thousand foot, and four thousand chosen horse; and the fleet of fifty quinqueremes, besides a vast number of transports. The consuls had secret orders from the senate, not to conclude the operations but by the destruction of Carthage, without which, the republic pretended, she could not but look upon all
- d her possessions as insecure and precarious. Pursuant to the plan they had formed, they landed the troops first at Lilybaeum in Sicily, from whence, after receiving a proper refreshment, it was proposed to transport them to Utica *.

- The answer brought by the last ambassadors to Carthage had not a little alarmed the inhabitants of that city; but they were not yet acquainted with the resolutions taken at Rome. They therefore sent fresh ambassadors thither, whom they invested with full powers to act as they should think fit for the good of the republic, and even to submit themselves, without reserve, to the pleasure of the Romans; but the most sensible persons amongst them did not expect any great success from this condescension, since the early submission of the Uticans had rendered it infinitely less meritorious than it would have been before. However, the Romans seemed to be, in some measure, satisfied with it, since they promised them their liberty, the enjoyment of their laws, and, in short, every thing that was dear and valuable to them. This threw them into a transport of joy, and they wanted words to extol the moderation of the Romans. But the conscript fathers immediately dashed all their hopes, by declaring the next instant, Roman-like, that this favour was granted them upon condition, that they would send three hundred young Carthaginians of the first distinction to the prætor Fabius at Lilybaeum, within the space of thirty days, and comply with all the orders of the consuls. Gisco, surnamed Strytanus, Hamilcar, Mides, Gillicas, and Mago, for so were the ambassadors called, durst not make the least remonstrance
- f against the severity of these conditions, but immediately set out for Carthage, to impart them to the senate there. That august assembly was filled with inexpressible concern, upon hearing the article relating to the hostages, which were considered as the flower, and the only hopes, of the noblest families in Carthage. They found themselves likewise extremely perplexed at the silence of the Romans with respect to the cities, of which no notice was taken in the concessions they seemed willing to make, and at the vague expression of submitting to all the orders of the consuls. However, being absolutely incapable of coping with so formidable an enemy, and, at that juncture, in want of almost every thing, Mago Bretius, in a brave and eloquent speech, exhorted them, for the present, to obey. No scene can be conceived more a moving, than that exhibited by Carthage, when the hostages were delivered up: nothing was to be seen but tears, all parts, at the same time, echoing with groans and lamentations; but, above all, the unhappy mothers afforded a most mournful spectacle, bathing themselves in tears, tearing their dishevelled hair, beating their breasts, and yelling in such a manner, as might have moved the most savage hearts to compassion. When the fatal moment of separation was come, they accompanied their children to the ship, bid them a long, last farewell, persuaded, that they should never see them more, embraced them with the utmost tenderness, clasped them strongly in their arms, could not be prevailed upon to part with them, till they were forced away by the sailors; nay, many of them swam a long time after the ship, fixing their eyes immoveably upon it. As the ambassadors delivered them to the consuls, and they to Fabius at Lilybæum, before the thirty days were expired, they were not intirely without hopes of softening their hard-hearted enemy; but the consuls only told them, that, upon their arrival at Utica, they should learn the farther orders of the republic ^b.

them to deliver up all their arms.

THOSE ministers no sooner received intelligence of the Roman fleet's appearing off of Utica, than they repaired thither, in order to know the fate of their city. The consuls however did not judge it expedient to communicate all the commands of their republic at once, lest they should appear so harsh and severe, that the Carthaginians would have refused a compliance with them. They first therefore demanded a sufficient supply of corn for the subsistence of their troops. Secondly, that they should deliver up into their hands all the triremes they were then masters of. Thirdly, that they should put them in possession of all their military machines. And, fourthly, that they should immediately convey all their arms into the Roman camp. As care was taken, that there should be a certain interval of time betwixt each of these demands, the Carthaginians found themselves ensnared, and could not reject any one of them, though they submitted to the last, which Censorinus insisted upon, notwithstanding the powerful reasons urged against it, with the utmost reluctance and concern ^c.

The Romans
command the Carthaginians
so abandon their city.

THE gaining of these points paved the way to the destruction of Carthage, though it reflected an eternal dishonour upon the Roman name. Censorinus, now imagining the Carthaginians not capable of sustaining a siege, commanded them to abandon their city, or, as Zonaras will have it, to demolish it, permitting them to build another eighty stadia from the sea, but without walls or fortifications. Both the ambassadors, before whom this fulminating decree was pronounced, and the people of Carthage, when they were apprised of it, by their gestures and complaints, demonstrated the greatest emotions of grief on this tragical occasion; but the Romans remained inflexible, not shewing the least regard to the tears and intreaties of a people, reduced to the extremes of despair. The ambassadors, at one time, supplicated the gods with the greatest fervor, as well as endeavoured, by all possible means, to excite the compassion of the Romans; and at another, they appealed to the avenging deities, whose severe eyes are ever open to fraud and villainy. The senators and people, upon receiving the report of the ambassadors, for some time, intirely abandoned themselves to despair; which was heightened by the frantic disposition of the women, whose children had been sent to Rome. In short, Carthage was nothing now but a scene of horror, madness, and confusion. The citizens cursed their ancestors for not dying gloriously in the defence of their country, rather than concluding such ignominious treaties of peace with their implacable enemies, which had been the cause of the deplorable condition, to which their posterity was then reduced. They likewise condemned themselves in the strongest terms, for having so tamely, as well as stupidly, delivered up their arms, and even blasphemously taxed the gods themselves with being the authors of all their misfortunes. However, nothing could make an impression upon the Romans in their favour. But as, in a former part of our history, we have expatiated largely upon this head, we shall only beg leave to observe farther here, that, when the first transports of grief were over, and their passions began to subside, they unanimously resolved to die upon the spot, rather than comply with the barbarous orders of the Romans; and, in consequence of this resolution, made the necessary dispositions for the defence of their capital city ^d.

- a A certain polite ¹ author takes some pains to shew, that the Romans did not act agreeably to the maxims of justice and honour in the point before us; and consequently seems to insinuate, that some proof, besides the notoriety of the facts, is requisite to evince the iniquity of their conduct on the present occasion. This perhaps may be looked upon as an argument of some good nature, and delicacy of sentiments; but can never be deemed one of that boldness, and inflexible attachment to truth, essential to a good historian. A writer of this kind will paint every species of vice, particularly those of a most public and enormous nature, in their most proper, that is, in the most odious colours. He will esteem a person, who endeavours to palliate, or even touches but lightly upon any flagrant villainy, be the actors of it who they will, as one who either inwardly approves of it, or is afraid of exposing it; and consequently as one so far disqualified for transmitting to posterity the transactions of former ages. It is not sufficient, in our opinion, in order to express our detestation of that execrable perfidiousness and barbarity the Romans were guilty of, to say, "I can never believe, that so sensible, rational and just a man as Polybius, could have approved of the proceedings of the Romans on the present occasion.—We do not find here any of the characteristics, which distinguished the Romans antiently, that greatness of soul, that rectitude, that utter abhorrence of mean artifices, frauds, and impostures, which, as is somewhere said, formed no part of the Roman genius.—Why did not the Romans attack the Carthaginians by force? Why should they declare expressly in a treaty, that they allowed them the full enjoyment of their liberties and laws, and understand, at the same time, certain private conditions, which proved the intire ruin of both? Why should they conceal, under the scandalous omission of the word city in this treaty, the black design of destroying Carthage, as though, beneath the cover of such an equivocation, they could justly ruin it? In fine, why did the Romans not make their last declaration, till after they had extorted from the Carthaginians, at different times, their hostages and arms, that is, till they had absolutely rendered them incapable of disobeying their unjust commands? — It is very dangerous to be possessed of so much power, as may enable one to commit injustice with impunity, and with a prospect of being a gainer by it. The experience of all ages shews, that states seldom scruple to commit injustice, when they think it will turn to their advantage." Our readers will here observe, that, with regard to the Roman nation in general, these reflections scarce carry with them more of satire than panegyric; and that, as to the very persons guilty of one of the greatest violations of public faith, attended with the most aggravating circumstances, that perhaps ever happened, he only seems to intimate, that they did not come up to the virtues of their ancestors; nay, he puts them upon a level with those at the head of other states. Such a palliation of one of the most atrocious public crimes to be met with in history, would be inexcusable in an author of any other nation than that to which he belongs; but as for his countrymen, if we suppose them to pay any deference to the conduct of their superiors for above a century past, it is as natural for them to talk in this strain now, as it was for the Romans to act the part they did at the time Carthage was destroyed.

In whatever light we view the villainous conduct of the Romans at this juncture, it must appear as the result of a complication of all the bad qualities, that can be inherent in any state. Perjury, cruelty, injustice, pride, meanness of spirit, and even cowardice itself, in the highest degree, are some of the principal of them. Neither can we conceive how it should enter into the head of the author just cited, as well as of many others, that even the ancestors of that profligate set of men we are now speaking of, were so eminent for their rectitude, greatness of soul, and public spirit, at least any of them but those, who flourished in the earliest times of the republic. Can any state, that is continually grasping at universal empire, and aims at nothing but enslaving all its neighbours, deserve such a shining character? And that the Roman republic had this solely in view, even almost from its very infancy, is evident from the most partial of its own historians. That public spirit, if any criminal passion deserves such a noble appellation, which serves only to cement the members of a community together, in order to enable them the more effectually to plunder and massacre all the rest of their species, is, at most, no better than that principle, which unites a gang of robbers and assassins; and whether the Romans in general were not, from very remote times, actuated by such a public spirit as this, will easily be determined by those who have been but moderately conversant with their writers. The best therefore, in our opinion, that can be said of the Romans of the age we are now upon, is, that they were worse than any preceding generation of one of the most hypocritical, tyrannical, ambitious, and consequently worst nations, we read of in history. We must leave it to the consideration of our readers, whether their conduct has not been since equalled by that of a neighbouring nation, which has, for the best part of a century, been taught to distinguish between the letter and spirit of treaties, and which, with its liberty, seems to have lost the very notion of all public virtues.

The operations of the Romans

BUT to resume the thread of our history: the Carthaginians, having pacified Asdrubal, one of their generals, who, for some contumelious treatment, had advanced, at the head of twenty thousand men, almost to the gates of Carthage, in order to besiege it, reduced most of the open country to their obedience. Asdrubal, with his forces, posted himself advantageously before the town, supplying the inhabitants daily with vast quantities of provisions. At last the Roman army invested it, not doubting but it would fall an easy prey to them. Manilius attacked it by land, as Marcus did by sea; and both of them pushed on the siege with all the vigour they were capable of. But Asdrubal greatly retarded their approaches, by cutting off their parties sent to collect materials for framing the military machines; which he did, by drawing them insensibly into ambuscades prepared for that purpose. Manilius therefore could make no considerable impression on the city by land; and as Marcus, with the fleet, lay near the stagnum or great morass, the exhalations proceeding from thence, together with the heat of the season, infected the air, and carried off great numbers of his men. The garrison likewise repulsed the Romans in all the attacks they made, with the loss of abundance of men, and, by their vigorous sallies in the night, destroyed most of their works and battering engines. Asdrubal also, by his detachments, prevented their excursions, and intercepted their foragers; so that their cavalry was reduced to the utmost distress. As for Masiniissa, a misunderstanding betwixt him and the Romans hindered the junction of their forces; so that the consuls reaped no advantage from the troops of that ally. They therefore judged it expedient, at present, to draw off from before the town. Marcus, with the fleet, endeavoured to ravage the coasts of Africa; but not being able to execute his design, he attacked the island Ægimurus, which surrendered to him. In the mean time Manilius moved towards the sea-coasts, to favour, as should seem, the operations of Marcus; but finding him not in a capacity to undertake any thing, he returned to his former camp before the walls of Carthage, having been harassed in his march by Himilco, surnamed Fabeas, or, according to Appian, Phameas, general of the Carthaginian horse. However, the siege went on very slowly, Asdrubal closely attending him, and destroying great numbers of his men on one side, whilst the besieged made an equal havoc of them on the other, by their continual sallies. The Romans were only in possession of Saxus, Leptis, Cbolla, and Utica; so that they were not a little streightened for want of provisions. We are told by Appian, that Censorinus played one vast ram against the walls with six thousand foot, and another with a prodigious number of rowers, whose officers attended, doing their duty as if in an engagement; but, though a great breach was made, he could not storm the place, the Carthaginians, after having repulsed him, repairing it in the night. In what manner the Carthaginians afterwards burnt the Roman fleet, and Scipio Æmilianus saved the Roman army, when it was upon the very brink of destruction, may be learnt from Appian, as well as a former part of this history ^m.

In the mean time Masiniissa, drawing near his end, dispatched a courier to Æmilianus, to apprise him of it, and to desire him to divide the dominions he was possessed of betwixt his three sons, Micipsa, Gulussa, and Mastanabal, as well as to assist them with his advice. This Scipio executed in the most prudent and equitable manner, as we shall see in the Numidian history. Whilst this was transacting, Manilius reduced the strong city of Texaga, and gave the enemy a great defeat there, putting twelve thousand of them to the sword, and taking six thousand prisoners. Some other places of strength he likewise made himself master of before the conclusion of the campaign ⁿ.

a THE Carthaginians, about this time, sustained a considerable loss by the desertion of Phameas, one of their best commanders, who went over to the Romans, after he had had an interview with Æmilianus, at the head of a body of two thousand two hundred horse. As he was an officer of great capacity, he did not a little contribute to the destruction of Carthage. For the particulars of this transaction, we must refer our readers to Appian ^o.

THE next campaign, the consul Calpurnius Piso, and his lieutenant Mancinus, conducted the war in Africa. The Carthaginians were so strong this year, that they obtained several advantages over the Romans, and, towards the close of it, obliged them to raise the siege of Hippo Zaritus, which they had carried on the whole summer, after having burnt all their military machines. As for the siege of Carthage, that, for the present, seemed to be at a stand. The besieged applied to Andrius, who pretended to be the son of Perseus king of Macedon, for assistance, or at least for a diversion in their favour, by pursuing the war he was then engaged in against the Romans with vigour. In order the more strongly to excite him to this, they promised him powerful supplies both of money and ships. However, they received no assistance from that quarter, the reason of which, as well as all the most important events of this campaign, our readers will find related in another place ^o.

THE Carthaginian army, having been reinforced the preceding year with a body of eight hundred Numidian horse, whose leader Bitbyas had prevailed upon them to desert Gulussa, and the accession of some other troops from Carthage, began to move very early out of its winter-quarters. As it had been observed, that neither Micipsa nor Mastanabal, Masinissa's other sons, had sent any supplies to the enemy, either of money or arms, notwithstanding they had, for a long time past, promised them such supplies, the Carthaginians resumed their former courage, scoured the open country, and put all their places of strength in the best posture of defence. The advantages they had gained at Neberis and Hippo, and the enemy's inability to push on the siege of Carthage, though the city was, in a manner, dismantled, and the inhabitants disarmed, inspired them with a resolution to defend themselves to the last drop of blood. They sent ambassadors to Micipsa, Mastanabal, and the independent Mauritanian princes, in order to form a powerful alliance against the Romans, insinuating to those princes, that, should the African republic be once subverted by that haughty people, they must soon expect to meet with the same fate. Asdrubal, the Carthaginian general without the town, about this time, desiring the command of the troops within the city, possessed by another Asdrubal, Gulussa's nephew, accused him falsely of a design to betray the republic into that prince's hands. The innocent person was so thunder-struck with the accusation, which came intirely unlooked for, that he had nothing to offer in his own defence; so that he was instantly dispatched upon the spot, without any further process ^p.

Bitbyas, with a body of Numidian horse, comes over to the Carthaginians.

SOON after Piso, with a body of troops, reduced some of the inland towns, leaving Mancinus, with the other part of the army, to continue the siege of Carthage. Mancinus, observing one part of the wall, which, by reason of its rocky situation, seemed inaccessible, not guarded, found means to scale it, and take post in the town, with three thousand five hundred men. But the Carthaginians not only prevented any ill consequences from this lodgment, but likewise cut off his retreat, and so surrounded him, that he must either have been destroyed, or starved to a surrender, had not Æmilianus in the critical moment relieved him. This so disheartened the Carthaginians, that they abandoned several posts; which encouraged Æmilianus to make an attack upon Megara, a part of the city, which our readers will find already described. This was begun at midnight, by a select body of troops, who had provided themselves with axes, levers, and scaling-ladders, being led by the general himself. They advanced several stadia without the least noise; but at last gave a sudden and general shout, which struck the enemy, who did not expect a visit at so unreasonable an hour, with terror. However, recovering themselves, they opposed the assailants with such bravery, that Æmilianus found it impossible to mount the ramparts; but at last perceiving a tower very near the walls, and of an equal height with them, but without the city, abandoned by its guards, he detached thither a party of choice troops, who, by the help of pontons, made a lodgment on the walls, from whence descending into Megara, they immediately broke down the gates. Upon which Æmilianus entering with four thousand of the flower of his troops, the enemy found themselves obliged to retreat to Byrsa, in as great a consternation as if the whole city had been taken, being followed even by the forces, that were encamped without the town. Asdrubal, finding the next morning what had happened, was extremely chagrined; and, either to gratify his resentment, or to reduce the besieged to a state of desperation, that they might behave with a greater degree of resolution in the defence of the place, massacred all the Roman prisoners he had taken, in the manner we have already related ^a.

WHILST Asdrubal was thus venting his fury upon the Roman captives, and even murdering many Carthaginian senators, who had been so brave as to oppose his tyranny, Æmilianus was busy in drawing lines of circumvallation and contravallation cross the isthmus, which joined the peninsula, whereon Carthage stood, to the continent of Africa. That part of these lines, which fronted the city of Carthage, was strengthened by a wall twenty-five stadia long, and twelve foot high, flanked at proper distances with towers and redoubts; and on the middle tower was erected a very high wooden fort, from whence could be seen whatever was doing in the city. The enemy, who were within a dart's cast of it, made their utmost efforts to put a stop to the work; but as the whole army was employed upon it day and night without intermission, it was finished in twenty-four days. The Carthaginians were doubly incommoded by this work; first, as it secured the Roman forces against their sallies; and secondly, as Æmilianus thereby cut off all provisions from them; which distressed them exceedingly. Bitthas indeed, who had been sent out to collect corn before Æmilianus made himself master of Megara, arrived soon after the consul had perfected his lines; but he durst not venture to attack them. However, he found means to convey by sea some small quantities to Asdrubal, who distributed what he received amongst his troops, without any regard to the inhabitants. That general seems to have been induced to this by the opposition he met with from the senators, who, being highly incensed at his enormous cruelty to the Roman prisoners, as it precluded them from all hopes of mercy, and, instead of encouraging, disheartened the troops, cried out, That such an unjustifiable proceeding was highly unseemable at a juncture, when they were ready to sink under the pressure of the public calamities. A famine therefore ensued, which not a little contributed to the destruction of the city ^b.

The Carthaginians again worsted.

THE besieged found themselves already reduced to great straits; but the progress Æmilianus had lately made in an attempt to stop up the mouth of the old harbour by a mole, that of the new one being already shut up by the Roman fleet, afforded them a much more melancholy prospect, than any thing that had yet happened to them. Being extremely alarmed, they resolved to take such measures, as might, if possible, defeat the enemy's design. Setting therefore all hands to work, with an industry scarce to be paralleled, they dug a new basin, and opened a communication with the sea; which enabled them to make head against the enemy once more upon that element; for, with the same diligence, they fitted out a fleet of fifty quinqueremes, with a vast number of other vessels, built chiefly of the old materials found in their magazines. This amazing work was completed so suddenly, and with such an impenetrable secrecy, that Æmilianus entertained not the least suspicion of it, till he saw their squadron appear at sea. Then his surprize was so great, thinking it impossible, that so weak an enemy should, as it were, in an instant become so formidable, that, Appian believes, the Carthaginians might have totally ruined the Roman fleet, had they immediately attacked it. This seems to have been no unreasonable supposition, because, as no such blow was expected, and every man otherwise employed, the Carthaginians would have found the Roman vessels destitute of rowers, soldiers and officers. However, two days after, both parties came to an action, and being greatly animated, the one by the hopes of preserving every thing dear and valuable to them, the other of finishing a conquest, which had cost them such an immense quantity of blood and treasure, they exerted themselves in an extraordinary manner. During the heat of the action, the Carthaginian brigantines, gliding along under the large Roman ships, broke to pieces many of their sterns, rudders, and oars; and, if at any time they found themselves pushed, they retreated with surprising swiftness, and returned ^c.

- a immediately to the charge. The dispute continued with equal success till the evening, when the Carthaginians thought proper to retire, not under any apprehension of the enemy's superiority, but in order to renew the engagement with greater advantage early the next morning. Their lighter vessels, being extremely swift and numerous, soon occupied the harbour, and, by their multitude, shut up the mouth of it; so that those of a larger size were excluded from thence, and obliged to take shelter under a very spacious terrace, which had been thrown up against the walls to unload goods, and on the side whereof a small rampart had been raised during this war, to prevent the enemy from possessing themselves of it. Here the fight began again early the following day with more vigour than ever, and continued till late at night; but
- b at last, by the conduct and bravery of five galleys of Sida, the Carthaginians were obliged to retire, and sail for shelter to the city. The next morning Æmilianus attacked the terrace; but was repulsed with prodigious slaughter by the besieged, who burnt all his military machines. However, he afterwards carried it by assault, and having fortified it, ordered a wall to be built close to those of the city, and of equal height with them. When this was finished, he commanded four thousand men to mount it, and discharge showers of darts and javelins upon the enemy, in order both to insult and annoy them. As the troops on each side were upon a level, there was scarce a dart thrown but what did execution. The last action concluded the military operations of this campaign.
- c In order the more effectually to cut off supplies of every kind from the besieged, Æmilianus formed a design to reduce the places of strength the Carthaginians had still in their hands, particularly Nepheris, where they had a numerous body of forces strongly encamped, commanded by Diogenes, one of Asdrubal's intimate friends, who, by means of the new basin above-mentioned, sent continual convoys of provisions to Carthage. The reduction of the other places he effected by detachments commanded by persons that he could confide in; but that of the latter was accomplished by a body of troops under the conduct of Lælius, supported by Guthusa's Numidian horse. By the activity of these last, and the violence of the Numidian elephants, the whole Carthaginian army, consisting of eighty-four thousand men, was either cut to pieces, or taken prisoners, except four thousand, who dispersed themselves in the neighbouring villages. This happened before Æmilianus resumed the operations against the city of Carthage, and induced the Africans, who were kept in awe by Diogenes, to abandon the Carthaginians.
- d Soon after Æmilianus formed two attacks, one against Byrsa, and the other against the Cotbon. Having possessed himself of the wall, which surrounded the port or Cotbon, he threw himself into the great square of the city, that was near it; but the night not permitting him to penetrate farther, he ordered his soldiers to remain there till morning under arms. At break of day he received a reinforcement of four thousand men from the camp, who, notwithstanding all the efforts of their officers to the contrary, plundered the temple of Apollo, which was immensely rich, and divided the booty amongst themselves, before they could be prevailed upon to advance against the enemy. Æmilianus, by the occupation of this square, and possession of the wall, being master of every part of the city, but Byrsa or the citadel, attempted to force his way to this last with inexpressible bravery. The Carthaginians having been greatly weakened by a famine, insomuch that they had been obliged to feed, for some time, upon human flesh, and had scarce strength to handle their arms, he, in six days, effected this. However, in the contest he lost a vast number of men, and gained his point with the utmost difficulty. Most of those who had fled into Byrsa, were so intimidated at the approach of the Roman army, that they surrendered upon the proconsul's granting them their lives. Asdrubal, the commandant, soon after abandoned the rest of them, and put himself into the hands of the Romans. His wife could not survive such an instance of perfidiousness, cowardice, and inhumanity; and therefore, with nine hundred Roman deserters, to whom Æmilianus had denied mercy, committed herself, as well as her children, to the flames, that destroyed both the citadel, and the famous temple of Æsculapius upon it. Appian tells us, that, before she acted this tragedy, she appeared in splendid attire, with her children, upon the walls, and addressed herself to Scipio in terms to the following effect: "May the gods, Roman, be propitious to you, who act according to the rules of war; but may you, and

 "of his wife, children, country, and religion!" Then turning to Asdrubal, who stood by Æmilianus, "Abandoned villain, said she, and most cowardly of mortals! both
 "I, and these my children, shall be soon buried in these flames; but as for you,
 "great general of Carthage, what a splendid triumph will you be reserved to grace!
 "What tortures may you not expect to suffer!" This put a period to the state of Carthage, and consequently to the dispute for the empire of the world, which had continued, almost without intermission, betwixt two of the most famous republics to be met with in history, for the space of an hundred and eighteen years. What instructions the conscript fathers at Rome sent the proconsul, in relation to the total demolition of Carthage, and how, in consequence of these instructions, that unfortu- b nate city was intirely razed, the cities confederated with it dismantled, as well as those that had declared for the Romans rewarded, and the whole country appertain-ing to it turned into a province, together with many other particulars relative to the catastrophe we are now upon, our readers will find recited at large in the Roman history".

 Rome.

Thus fell Carthage, in the consulate of C. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius, about a hundred and forty-six years before the commencement of the christian æra;
 a city, whose destruction ought to be attributed more to the intrigues of an abandoned faction, composed of the most profligate part of its citizens, than to the power of its villainous rival, however formidable it might at that time appear. The trea- c sure Æmilianus carried off, even after the city had been delivered up to the soldiers to be plundered, according to the Roman military law, was so immense, that it exceeded all belief, Pliny making it amount to four (S) millions four hundred and seventy thou-

(S) This was not the only treasure Æmilianus met with now in Carthage. According to Sallust, he preserved from the flames several valuable libraries, which he presented to the sons of Micipsa.
 The works of all the most noted Phœnician and Punian authors were undoubtedly included in these collections, some of the principal of which, besides those already mentioned, were the following:

1. Dius, a celebrated Phœnician historian, a fragment of whose work, relating to the friendly intercourse betwixt Salomon and Hiram king of Tyre, has been preserved to us by Josephus, in the eighth book of his antiquities, and the first of his treatise against Apion.

2. Eumachus, a Carthaginian writer, cited by Phlegon, who, amongst other things, related, that, whilst the Carthaginians were drawing a line round Africa Propria, they discovered two human skeletons, deposited in two coffins, of an enormous size.
 One of these, according to Phlegon, was twenty-three cubits long, and the other twenty-four. The age in which this author lived, has not been hitherto discovered.

3. Hieronymus Ægyptius, who, according to Freculphus Lexoviensis, a chronological historian, that lived near nine hundred years ago, wrote a history of Phœnicia. For a further account of him, we must refer our readers to Vossius.

4. Hestianus Milesius, a compiler of Phœnician history, taken notice of by Josephus, in the tenth book of his Jewish antiquities.

5. Hyssicrates, a native, as should seem, of Phœ-nicia, who composed a history of that country in the Phœnician language. A Greek translation of this author, done by one Chatus, if not the original itself, was extant in the time of Tatian. He is likewise taken notice of by Eusebius, in the tenth book of his Præparatio evangelica.

6. Iolaus, a compiler of Phœnician history, whose works are all lost, except a few fragments, which seem intirely fabulous. From what Bochart, Ges-ner, and Vossius, have related of him, the loss of his performance is not greatly to be regretted.

7. Atachus or Moschus, a Phœnician, who wrote the history of his own country in his mother-tongue.
Chatus above-mentioned translated this piece into Greek. Josephus, Tatian, and Athenaus, supply us with the short account we have of him.

8. Moschus Sidonius, a native of Sidon, who, according to Strabo, seems to have been the founder of the atomical philosophy.

9. Procles, a Carthaginian historian, some of whose fragments have been preserved to us by Pausanias.

10. Sanchoiatho, a Phœnician historian, who, according to the most received opinion, lived a little before the siege of Troy. He extracted his history, which was written in the Phœnician language, partly from the records of cities, and partly from the sacred writings deposited in temples. Philo of Byblus, who, according to Suidas, lived in the reign of Hadrian, translated this history into Greek, some extracts of which we find in the first book of Euse-bius's Præparatio evangelica. Suidas informs us, that he wrote one treatise of the religious institutions of the Phœnicians; another of Hermes's physiology; and a third of the Egyptian theology. Por-phyrus makes him to have been of Berytus; but he was of Tyre, if we will give credit to Athenaus.

11. Theodotus, a writer of Phœnician history, whose performance Chatus translated into Greek.
 Our readers will find every thing relating to him, that antiquity has supplied us with, in Bochart and a find pounds weight of silver. The iniquity of the Roman conduct at the commencement, as well as through the whole course, of this war, is acknowledged by Velleius, and other historians, who cannot be suspected of the least partiality in favour of the Carthaginians. In fine, Rome, though, in a manner, mistress of the world, could not imagine herself in a state of security, as long as even the name of Carthage remained; so true is it, that a rivetted antipathy, fomented by long and bloody wars, continues even after all cause for fear is removed, and does not cease, till the object that occasions it is no more. The Romans ordered it never to be inhabited again, denouncing dreadful imprecations against those, who, contrary to this prohibition, should attempt to rebuild any part of it, especially Byrsa and Megara. However, all persons who b desired it, were admitted to see Carthage, nothing affording Emilianus a higher satisfaction, than to have people view the ruins of a city, which had contended with Rome for superiority such a series of years. The Carthaginian prisoners, sent to Rome, were distributed in the various provinces of Italy, as already related. In confirmation of what we have advanced above concerning the duration of Carthage, we must here beg leave to observe, that Synellus asserts this city to have stood seven hundred and forty-eight years, which almost intirely corresponds with sir Isaac Newton, Salmasius, Petavius, &c. and therefore may be considered as an additional argument in favour of what those great men have offered on that head *.

c ABOUT twenty-four years after this stately metropolis had been laid in ashes by Emilianus, pursuant to the orders of the senate, C. Gracchus, tribune of the people, in order to ingratiate himself with them, undertook to rebuild it, and, to that end, conducted thither a colony of six thousand Roman citizens. The workmen, according to Plutarch, were terrified by many unlucky omens, at the time they were tracing the limits, and laying the foundations of the new city; which the senate being informed of, would have suspended the attempt: but the tribune, little affected with such prefaces, continued carrying on the work, and finished it in a few days. From hence it seems probable, that only a slight kind of huts were erected, especially since we are told by Velleius, that Marius, after his flight into Africa, lived in a poor, mean condition amidst the ruins of Carthage, consoling himself by the sight of so d astonishing a spectacle, and himself at the same time serving, in some measure, as a consolation to that ill-fated city. But whether Gracchus executed his design, as Plutarch intimates, or the work was intirely discontinued, in compliance with the senate's orders, as Appian suggests, it is certain this was the first Roman colony, that ever was sent out of Italy *.

Carthage afterwards rebuilt by the Romans themselves.

Appian relates, that Julius Cæsar, having landed his forces in Africa, to put an end to the war with Pompey's adherents there, saw, in a dream, an army composed of a prodigious number of soldiers, who, with tears in their eyes, called him; and that, struck with the vision, he wrote down in his pocket-book the design he formed, on this occasion, of rebuilding Carthage and Corinth; but that being murdered soon after e in the curia at Rome by the conspirators, he was not able to execute it. However, says the same author, Augustus Cæsar, his adopted son, finding this memoir amongst his papers, built a city at some small distance from the spot on which antient Carthage stood, which he called by the same name, in order to avoid the ill effects of those imprecations, which had been vented at the time of its destruction. Thither he sent a colony of three thousand men, who were soon joined by considerable numbers from the neighbouring towns. But this notion, however it may have been received by Appian, is not so consistent with what we find advanced by Strabo, who intimates, that both Carthage and Corinth were rebuilt at the same time by Julius Cæsar. It is certain this last author, who flourished in the reign of Tiberius, affirms Carthage f in his time to have been equal, if not superior, to the largest city in Africa; which can scarce be admitted, if we suppose it to have been built by Augustus, after the conclusion of all his wars; and, till that time, it is not natural to suppose him to have built it. Be that as it will, Plutarch follows Strabo, and therefore, in opposition to Appian, gives a sanction to his authority. Pliny mentions it as a very considerable colony in his days, though the town then was not of so large an extent, as that destroyed by Æmilianus. Solinus gives us to understand, that the town built by a Gracchus was called Junonia, and, for some time, of little note, agreeable to what we have hinted above. However, he informs us, that, in the consulate of M. Antonius and P. Dolabella, it made such a figure, that it was esteemed the second city in the Roman dominions; which, in our opinion, adds some weight to the last observation of Strabo. It was looked upon as the capital of Africa for several centuries after the commencement of the christian æra. Maxentius laid it in ashes about the sixth or seventh year of Constantine's reign. Genferic, king of the Vandals, took it A. C. 439. but, about a century afterwards, it was re-annexed to the Roman empire by that renowned commander Belisarius. At last the Saracens, under Mohammed's successors, towards the close of the seventh century, so completely destroyed it, that b no other traces or footsteps of it are now to be discovered, than those we have already taken notice of in the first section of the Carthaginian history y.

CHAP. I.

The history of the Numidians, to the conquest of their country by the Romans.

SECT. I.

Description of Numidia.

^a THE limits of the region, called Numidia, have been differently defined by the The limits of Numidia. ancient geographers. Pliny gives that name to the tract lying between the rivers Tusca and Ampsaga; which includes the Numidia Nova of Ptolemy, together with the district of the Cirtesi. Mela affirms it to have extended from the river Molochath or Mulucba, to the borders of Africa Propria, which he seems to have fixed at a small distance from the city of Cirta. But its boundaries are certainly the best ascertained by Strabo, who, in conformity with what has been advanced by Polybius, Livy, and Dio, makes it to have comprehended the kingdoms of the Massyli and Masæsyli, the last of which was bounded on the west by the Mulucba, as the first was on the east by the Tusca. Dionysius Afer, Silius Italicus, and Appian, as well as the ^b former historians, add no small weight to Strabo; for which reason, our readers will permit us to give a geographical description of Numidia upon the plan he has laid down ^a.

Numidia then was limited on the north by the Mediterranean; on the south by Numidia had Catalia, or part of Libya Interior; on the west by the Mulucba, which separated it different bounds from Mauritania; and on the east by the Tusca, a boundary it had in common with assigned it as Africa Propria. If we suppose Malva, Malvana, Mulucba, Molochath, and the present Mullooïab of the Algerines to be the same river, and the modern Zaine to correspond with the ancient Tusca, as the learned and ingenious Dr. Shaw seems to have rendered probable, this tract was above five hundred miles in length, Twunt, the ^c western Algerine frontier, about fifty miles to the east of the former river, being in $0^{\circ} 16'$ W. long. from London, and Tabarka, the ancient Tabraca, upon the latter, in $9^{\circ} 16'$ to the east of that city. The breadth cannot be so easily ascertained; but, supposing it to have been nearly the same with that of the present kingdom of Algiers, as there is good reason to apprehend it was, in the narrowest part it must have been about forty miles, that being the distance near Tlemjan from the desert or Sabara to the sea-coast, and above a hundred in the broadest, Fijel being in N. lat. $36^{\circ} 55'$, and Lowlaiab, situated amongst the mountains of Atlas, in $34^{\circ} 50'$. In the Carthaginian times, Numidia contained two considerable nations, the most powerful of which, according to Strabo, was called the Massyli, and the other the Masæ- ^d fyli or Massæfyli. The country inhabited by the Massæfyli is, by some authors, esteemed a part of Mauritania; but Polybius, Livy, and Strabo, whose authority will bear down that of all other writers in the point before us, are of another opinion. However, that it was considered as appertaining to Mauritania in after-ages by the Romans, we learn from Dio, who not only intimates this, but likewise asserts, that it had the name of Mauritania Casariensis given it by the emperor Claudius ^b.

Numidia.

Numidia, including Numidia Propria, or the country of the Massyli, and Mauritania Casariensis, or that of the Massyli, extended from $34^{\circ} 50'$ to 37° N. lat. and from $10^{\circ} 15'$ W. to $9^{\circ} 16'$ E. of London. Ptolemy is as inaccurate and erroneous in his geography of this country, as we have before shewn him to be in that of Africa Propria; for he places The Great Promontory in 35° , and the Ampsaga in $31^{\circ} 45'$ N. lat. and so in proportion of the interjacent places, whereby that part of the coast is laid down nearly in an E. S. E. direction; whereas, according to the latest observations, to the Promontorium Apollinis it is N. E. and from thence to the Ampsaga, inclining to the N. In short, according to the same observations, Ptolemy differs so widely from the truth in the whole, that those places, which he has fixed in a southern inclination, should have had a northern one; and The Great Promontory, which he has placed $3^{\circ} 13'$ to the northward of the Ampsaga, is really $1^{\circ} 37'$ S. of it. Several places likewise of this country he has put five degrees farther south, than, in fact, they are found to be. The region formerly possessed by the Massyli, from the most accurate observations of the moderns, in conjunction with the hints given us by the antients, seems to have extended itself from $34^{\circ} 50'$ to 37° N. lat. and from $6^{\circ} 30'$ to $9^{\circ} 16'$ E. long. from London. From hence the situation and extent of the Massylian kingdom may likewise be easily determined.

The country of the Massyli.

THE country of the Massyli, Numidia Propria, or, as some authors call it, Terra Matagonitis, was separated from the proper territory of Carthage by its eastern boundary the river Tusca, and from the kingdom of the Massyli, or Mauritania Casariensis, if we will believe Pliny, by the Ampsaga. It seems to correspond with that part of the province of Constantina lying between the Zaine and the Wad el Kibeer, which is above an hundred and thirty miles long, and more than an hundred broad. The sea-coast of this province is, for the most part, mountainous and rocky, answering appositely enough to the appellation given it by Abulfeda, viz. El Adwab, the high or lofty. It is far from being equal in extent to the territories that formed the kingdom of the Massyli, though this nation is represented as less potent than the Massyli by Strabo. We shall only mention such of the principal places seated in it, as have been taken the greatest notice of by the antients, the bounds we have prescribed ourselves obliging us, at present, to pass over all the rest.

THE capital city of this province, or rather kingdom, was Cirta, a place of very considerable note amongst the antients. It stood about forty-eight miles from the sea, and at a small distance from the Ampsaga. According to Strabo, it was a fortress of great strength, and abundantly supplied with all necessaries, as well as much improved, through the great care of Micipsa, who invited a good number of Greeks to come and reside in it. Mela and Pliny intimate, that it was likewise known by the name of Sittianorum Colonia in their time, and in its most flourishing state, when under the dominion of Syphax. The latter name it received from the colony settled there by P. Sittius, who, having been of singular service to Caesar in the African war, received a great extent of territory in those parts, which formerly belonged to Manasses, one of Juba's confederates, from that prince, as we learn from Appian and Dio; for which reason we find it called Cirta Julia by Ptolemy, who names the territory adjacent to it, the district of the Cirtesi, which he separates from Numidia, making it to include the cities of Vaga, Miraum, Lares, Ætara, and Azama. That Cirta was one of the largest, as well as strongest, cities of Numidia, is evident both from the extent of its ruins, which are still to be seen, and the commodiousness of its situation; for the greatest part of it was built upon a kind of peninsular promontory, inaccessible on all sides, except towards the south-west. This promontory was a mile in circumference, inclining a little to the southward, but terminating in a precipice of a northern direction, and above an hundred fathom in perpendicular. Here a beautiful landscape arose from a most agreeable variety of vales, mountains, and rivers, which extended themselves to a great distance. To the eastward the prospect was bounded by an adjacent range of rocks, much higher than the city; but, towards the south-east, the country was more open, entertaining the citizens of Cirta with a distant view of the high mountain, called at present Ziganeab, as well as those large and fertile eminences, whose modern name is Seedy Rougeise. The peninsular promontory above-mentioned, in the direction we are now upon, was separated from the neighbouring plains by a deep, narrow valley, perpendicular on both sides, where a rivulet, that seems to have been

The isthmus, near which stood the principal gate of the city, is about half a stadium broad, being intirely covered at present with a series of broken walls, cisterns, and other ruins, continued down to the river, and carried on from thence over a small plain parallel to the valley above described. The most eminent fragments of antiquity still remaining are, 1. A particular set of cisterns near the centre of the city, being about twenty in number, and forming an area of fifty yards square. 2. The aqueduct, whose remains, though in a much more ruinous condition than the cisterns, sufficiently demonstrate the wealth, public spirit, and magnificence of the Numidian princes, who held their residence here. 3. Part of a large and noble edifice, four of whose bases, seven foot in diameter, still in their places, seem to have formed part of the portico. This stands upon the brink of a precipice to the northward, and is the place where the Turkish garrison of Constantina is always posted. That name was given Cirta in the reign of Constantine the Great, who repaired and adorned it, according to Aurelius Victor. Cirta was the metropolis of Masinissa's dominions, that prince himself, his father Gala, and several other kings of the same family, residing there, as we learn from Polybius, Livy, and others. Strabo informs us, that Micipsa took care to render it so large, populous, and flourishing, that, in his time, it could send into the field an army of twenty thousand foot, and ten thousand horse.
- c its name it appears to be a city of a very high antiquity, and founded by the Phœnicians, even before Dido's arrival in Africa; for Cirta or Certa seems to have signified city in the Phœnician language when Hercules built Carteia, about the time that he first came into these parts, as we learn from Hesychius, who tells us, that one of his names was Melicerta, i. e. king of Certa, Cirta, or the city. We have likewise already observed, that the Canaanites or Phœnicians, when expelled their native country by Josbua, fled into Numidia; and that several proper names of places here were Phœnician; nay, we have, from some good authors, rendered it probable, that the Phœnicians settled in Numidia and Mauritania long before the Israelites dispossessed them of the land of Canaan. It may not be improper to add, that the ancient Cirta was
- d much larger than the modern Constantina, which is about 6° 36 east of London, and in north latitude 36° 20 s.

Vaga, a large city, according to Ptolemy, a few miles east of Cirta. Plutarch ^{vaga} calls it Baga, and Sallust Vacca; which is the name likewise given it by Silius, Pliny, and St. Austin. The Romans placed a strong garrison here under the command of Turpilius, as we learn from Sallust and Plutarch.

Lares, a town south-east of Cirta, taken notice of by Ptolemy, which some think ^{Lares} different from that in the itinerary called Laribus Colonia, or, according to Schottus, Laribum Colonia. This place is mentioned by Sallust, and other antient authors s.

- Azama*, a town which Ptolemy makes to be fifteen days journey distant from Car- ^{Azama}
e thage, lying south-east of Cirta. Some authors imagine this to be the same with Zama, a large and magnificent city, and famous for the signal defeat Hannibal received near it. But this is rendered improbable by Livy and Polybius, who fix Zama on a spot at least two thirds nearer Carthage. Miraum and Atara, the other two places in the district of the Cirtesi, taken notice of by Ptolemy, are so obscure, that it is sufficient just to have mentioned them ^a.

- ABOUT eighteen miles from the Ampfaga, at the western bottom of the Sinus Nu- ^{Collops Mag-} midicus, or, as it is now called, the gulf of Stora, stood the Cullu, or Collops Magnus, ^{rus} of Pliny and Ptolemy. There is nothing remaining at present of this antient city, but a few miserable houses, and a small fort. The modern name is Cull, which, as well
f as the antient, might be derived from a small port before it, Culla in Arabic and Phœnician signifying a fort. At the eastern extremity of the same gulf was the Ruficada of Ptolemy, the Sgigata or Stora of the moderns. A few cisterns, converted at present into magazines for corn, are the only tokens of antiquity discernible in it:

The ancient geographers have fixed it fifty or sixty Roman miles from Cullu; whereas ^a in reality it was not above thirty. The adjacent rivulet seems to be the Tafas of *Vibius Sequester*¹.

Tacatua. NOT many miles to the north-east stood the Tacatua of Pliny, Ptolemy, and the itinerary, the Tuckush of the Algerines, at present a pleasant village, with a fruitful country round about it. At some distance from it, in an eastern direction, was the Sulluco or Collops Parvus of Ptolemy, the modern small port of *Tagoileite*².

Hippo Regius. AT the western extremity of the gulf of Hippo, upon the river Armua, was the city of Hippo Regius, a place we have had occasion to mention frequently in the Roman and Carthaginian history. Upon the spot of ground formerly occupied by that city, a great heap of ruins is still to be seen. According to Leo Africanus, the city of Bona, ^b or, as the Moors call it, Blaid el Aneb, Town of Fugebs, from the plenty of them gathered in the neighbourhood, about a mile farther to the north, was built out of these ruins. This seems to be confirmed by the name Bona, which is undoubtedly a corruption of Hippo or Hippona. It is probable, that Bona has the same situation that Ptolemy's Aphrodisium had, since he places it fifteen miles to the north of Hippo. The ruins of Hippo take up a space about half a league in circumference, consisting, as usual, of large broken walls and cisterns. This city was called Hippo Regius, because it was, for some time, the seat of the Numidian kings, as Silius Italicus informs us. And indeed its commodious situation both for hunting and commerce, the salubrity of the air its inhabitants breathed, the delightful prospect they enjoyed, which took ^c in the sea, a spacious harbour, a variety of mountains covered with trees, and plains diversified with rivers, fountains, and fertile spots of ground, in a most beautiful manner, all at once, demonstrate this city to be as worthy of such an honour, as any other in the Numidian dominions. We have before shewn the word Hippo to be of Phanician extraction, which is a proof, that the ancient inhabitants were of the same origin. We shall reserve the description of Bona for the history of Algiers, to which it will more properly belong³.

Tabraca. Thabraca or Tabraca was a maritime city of Numidia Propria, seated on the western bank of the Tusca. Mela, Juvenal, Pliny, Ptolemy, and St. Austin, all make mention of it. Pliny insinuates, that it was a Roman colony in the latter ages. The ruins of ^d it are still remaining, and out of them has sprung the modern Tabarca, where there are several broken walls and cisterns, with a small fort and garrison of Tuniseens. Bochart says, that Thabraca was a Phanician word, and equivalent to the Latin Fron-dosa, which, he shews, might be properly enough applied to this place, from that verse of Juvenal:

Quales umbriferos ubi pandit Tabraca saltus.

Sat. x. ver. 194^m.

Naragara. Naragara or Nadagara, a very ancient town, situated at a considerable distance south-west of Tabraca, on the confines of Africa Propria. Here, towards the conclu- ^e sion of the second Punic war, Scipio is said to have encamped for the benefit of the water, Hannibal at the same time taking post upon an eminence four miles distant from him. Polybius seems to have called this place Margaron. It is supposed, that some fragments of an aqueduct, and other traces of this ancient city, are still to be seen⁴.

Sicca. SOMEWHERE in this tract we are to look for Sicca, Sicca Venerea, or, as some will have it, Venerca. But, as we have taken notice of this place elsewhere, as well as the lewd custom prevailing in it, and as its situation cannot, with any precision, be ascertained, we shall drop all further particulars relating to it⁵.

Thirmida. Thirmida, a town of this province, where Hiempsal, according to Sallust, lost his life; but whether it stood on the borders of the Massyli, or remote from them, for ^f want of sufficient light from history, we shall not take upon us to determine⁶.

Sutbul. Sutbul, a city where that prince's treasure was deposited, as we are informed by the same historian. It should seem probable from some hints he gives, that it could not be very remote from *Thirmida*⁷.

- a Madaura, a city, as may be inferred from St. Austin, in the neighbourhood of Madaura, Sicca Veneria, Tagaste, and Hippo Regius. It was famous for the birth of Apuleius the Platonic philosopher; which is all we can say of it^r.

- As for Sava, Gemellæ, Calama, Lambesa, Theveste, Tadutti, Sigus, Tipasa, Simislu, Sava, &c. Lamasba, and an infinite number of other obscure places, mentioned chiefly, it not solely, by Ptolemy, the Itinerary, Peutinger's table, the Notitia, Ætolicus, Orosius, and others, who lived below that period of time, to which we must here confine ourselves, as they cannot improve our idea of any single fact or circumstance relative to the history we are now upon, our readers will not only excuse a description, but even a bare enumeration of them. It will be sufficient, in order to complete our geographical description of this province, to give a succinct account of the most remarkable mountains, promontories, rivers, fountains, islands, and some of the principal curiosities of it, to which we shall beg leave to promise a word or two concerning the mediterranean part of it^s.

- We have already observed, that the sea-coast of this province was, for the most part, mountainous and rocky. To which we shall add, that the inner or mediterranean part was diversified with a beautiful interchange of hills and plains, which grew less capable of culture, in proportion as it approached the Sabara. In many places, for several leagues together, nothing was to be seen but a solitary desert, void both of all animals, and every thing proper for their support; in others fruitful districts, abounding with gardens producing great plenty of the most delicious pomgranates, apples, &c. afforded a most delightful prospect to travellers. But the natural history, both of Numidia Propria, and Mauritania Casariensis, our readers may expect in a proper place^t.

- The first ridge of mountains we shall take notice of, is that upon the borders of Gætulia, which terminated the country between the parallels of Sitifi and Cirta, called by the ancients Buzara. 2. That called Thambes, extending itself as far as Tabraca. 3. The Mamptarus of Ptolemy, upon the frontiers of Gætulia, which separated that country, or the Sabara, from the Mauritania Sitifensis. 4. The Mons Audus of Ptolemy, or the Mons Aurafius of the middle age, known at present amongst the Turks by the name Jibbel Aurefs or Eurefs. All of which will hereafter be minutely described^u.

- The first promontory that falls under our observation is the Tritum of Strabo, and the Metagonium of Mela, about six leagues to the eastward of the Ampsaga, called at present the Sebba Rous, or Seven Capes, by the Algerines. 2. The Hippi Promontorium of Ptolemy, the Mabra of the sea-charts, about twenty leagues east of the former. It goes now among the Algerines by the name Ras el Hamrab, i. e. The Red Cape, and has the ruins of two small buildings upon it. 3. Scarce a league distant from the Hippi Promontorium, to the northward, is the Stoborrum Promontorium of Ptolemy. This was in the gulf of Hippo, and about a league from the city of that name^v.

- Of the rivers which water Numidia Propria, the most remarkable are the following: 1. The Ampsaga, which separated this region from that of the Masæyli or Mauritania Casariensis. That river fell into the sea about six leagues to the west of Cullu, and is at present named the Wed el Kibeer, or Great River; which very well tallies with the signification of the word Ampsaga, Aphsah importing in Arabic broad, large, ample, &c. At present it appears to be made up of the following branches: The Wed el Djabab, River of Gold, whose source is at Kasbaite, a heap of ruins sixty miles to the south-west; the rivulet of Jimmeelab, in the same direction nearly with the Wed el Djabab, but at a little more than forty miles distance; the Wed el Hammam, twenty miles to the west of Constantina; the Wed el Sigani, fifteen miles to the south-west from Physgeab; and the springs of Hydrab, about half that distance to the south-east. The modern geographers have generally conducted the channel of their Ampsaga towards the gulf of Cullu; whereas the Wed el Kibeer, which truly answers to the Ampsaga of the ancients, has no such direction, but falls into the sea six leagues to the westward. Cellarius seems to fix its source in that ridge of mountains, by Ptolemy called Buzara, upon the borders of the Sabara; which runs counter to the latest and most accurate observations. 2. The Armua of Pliny,^a the modern Sei-boufe, which emptied itself into the western extremity of the gulf of Hippo. This frequently lodges great quantities of roots and trunks of trees on the neighbouring shore, and, by reason of the low situation of the adjacent country, occasions frequent inundations. 3. The Rubricatus of Ptolemy, or Ma-fragg of the Algerines, has its fountains on some hills, that lie at a little distance to the south of Hippo, its mouth being about four leagues easterly from that of the Armua. Bochart thinks, that the word Rubricatus is a Latin one, equivalent to the Punic or Phœnician Sifara, i. e. Red or Purple; and that both the river and lake so called deduced their name from that dye, the preparation of which the Africans and Carthaginians were so famous for; which notion seems to be confirmed by Pliny and Dioscorides, but particularly by Herodotus, who informs us, that the Zygantes, the antient inhabitants of this country; besmeared themselves with a liquid substance of that colour. We are told, that the mouth of this river is at present generally stopped up with a high bank of sand, raised by the north and north-east winds; so that it is seldom open, but after long and heavy rains. 4. The Tusca, called now the Zaine, the boundary of this province on the side of Africa Propria. It is said, that, in the language of the neighbouring Kabyles, or remains of the old Africans, the word Zaine denotes an oak-tree, and consequently approaches pretty near in signification to Tabraca, the Phœnician name of the frontier town upon this river above-mentioned. The Zaine has its source in the adjacent mountains; which is contrary to what Leo has advanced.^c Fountains.

ALL the most noted fountains of this tract are reducible to two heads: 1. Those to which the principal rivers owe their origin, that have been just touched upon. And, 2. That in the neighbourhood of Zama, whose waters, if drunk copiously, rendered the voice loud and sonorous, according to Pliny and Vitruvius. This extraordinary quality, if Bochart may be credited, gave name both to the fountain and the town; for Zamar, cecinit, sonorus fuit, and in Pibel Zimmer, canere fecit, sonorum esse fecit, &c. plainly allude to it. The elision of the R was very common in oriental words adopted into other languages; as in Vacca from בקר Bacar, Misa from מוסר Musar, Mappa from מפר Mapar, &c. The town of Zamar was situated near the source of the Ampfaga; and if we suppose it to have occupied the same spot of ground that Marmol's Zamor or Zamora does, Bochart's etymon will appear extremely probable. Zama was the city in which king Juba resided, and was levelled with the ground by the Romans, according to Strabo.^d

THE only islands, as far as we can recollect, that were ever supposed to have been adjacent to this region, were, 1. The Insula Naxica or Pithecusa of Scylax, opposite to Collops Magnus, which we apprehend rather to have belonged to Europe than Africa. 2. The island of Tabraca near the mouth of the Zaine, or Tusca, now in the possession of the Genoese, who pay an annual rent for it to the regency of Algiers.^e

Curiosities of this province.

THE principal curiosities of Numidia Propria are, 1. The large marshy plain between Blaid el Aneb and Hippo, with the river Booemab, which hath a bridge of Roman workmanship upon it. 2. The Roman inscriptions found dispersed all over this province. 3. The rich lead mines in the mountains of Beni Boo-Taleb. 4. The lukewarm springs, bubbling within a large square basin of Roman workmanship, which seem to be the Aqua Calida or Aqua Tibilitana of the antients, lying about ten leagues to the south-west of Hippo Regius, and sixteen to the east of Cirta or Constantina. To which we might add several others, did we not reserve them for the natural history of the kingdom of Algiers.^f

The limits and extent of the Regio Mafafylorum.

THE limits and extent of the Regio Mafafylorum of Strabo, or the Mauritania Casariensis of Dio, being that tract lying between the Mulucha and Ampfaga, is already ascertained, by the determination of those of Numidia in general, and Numidia Propria, or the country of the Maffyli, in particular. The length indeed of the former province much exceeded that of the latter; but its breadth was not considerable, being at a mean only about twenty leagues, except in that part, which bordered upon the confines of the Maffyli. It lay betwixt 34° 30' and 37° N. lat. and extended

- ^a from 1° 15' W. to 6° 30' E. long. from London, including that part of the country of the western Moors bounded on the west by the Mullooia, and on the east by the mountains of Trara, the provinces of the kingdom of Algiers called Tlemsan and Titterie, together with the eastern part of that going by the name of Constantina. The principal cities (A), rivers, mountains, promontories, &c. we shall touch upon in the concise manner possible ².

Igilgili, a town of this tract, about seven leagues to the westward of the Ampfaga, Igilgili, where, according to Pliny, Augustus planted a Roman colony. Ptolemy places this town half a degree to the southward of Saldæ, in a situation contrary to that of the modern Fijel, which lies twelve miles more to the northward, though Dr. Shaw takes this place to be the Igilgili of the antients. It is scarce to be doubted but this town was much older than the time of Augustus, because the name Igilgili, which Pliny intimates it to have had in the Augustan age, was apparently not of Roman extraction ³.

Saldæ, another place where Augustus planted a Roman colony. Ptolemy makes it Saldæ; to be two degrees distant from Igilgili, and the itinerary ninety-three miles; which is false, if, with the traveller above-mentioned, we admit the modern Boujeiah to be the antient Saldæ. As there is no manner of affinity betwixt the names Boujeiah and Saldæ, and the city, which goes by the former name, is but thirteen leagues from Fijel, the supposed Igilgili of the antients, perhaps our sagacious readers will be inclined to believe them two different towns; which sentiment we own ourselves disposed to entertain ^b.

Rufazus, another Augustan colony west of Saldæ, taken notice of by Pliny, Pto- Rufazus. lemy, and the itinerary. We remember not this place to be famous in history for any remarkable transaction that happened in or near it ^c.

Rufucurium, a city in the neighbourhood of the former, that was highly distin- Rufucurium. guished by the emperor Claudius, who conferred great honours upon it, as we are informed by Pliny ^d.

Rusconium, another Roman colony, that owed its origin to Augustus, seated near Rusconium; the mouth of the Serbes or Serbetis. Ptolemy calls it Rustonum; but we apprehend, that he ought to be corrected by Pliny. In the itinerary we find it named Rusguniæ Colonia. It has been imagined, that a small castle on cape Temenduse or Metasus, fifteen miles east of Algiers, in situation answers pretty nearly to it; because Icosium, which is supposed to have corresponded with the present Algiers, and Rusconium, had the same distance, and were placed in the same direction, according to the itinerary. If this be admitted, Rusconium had a Colbon, some traces of which are still remaining; and the modern Dellys occupies the very spot of ground Rufucurium stood upon. The three towns last-mentioned, from their names, seem to have been originally Libyan or Phœnician ^e.

Icosium, whose situation has just been determined, may seem to have taken up the Icosium; space on which Algiers was afterwards built, both from the consideration already offered, and from some Roman inscriptions found in this last city, taken notice of by Gramaye ^f.

Tipasa, a Roman colony, mentioned by Ptolemy and the itinerary; but the town Tipasa. was probably of higher antiquity than the conquest of Numidia by the Romans. It was forty-seven miles from Icosium, in a north-east direction; which is an additional argument in favour of Algiers's being the antient Icosium, and likewise evinces, that the present Tefessad is the Tipasa of the old geography ^g.

(A) It is probable, that Miltine, a town mentioned by Diodorus Siculus, must have been near the confines of Mauritania Casariensis, or in that province; but the particular spot it occupied, we cannot take upon us to determine. It seems probable, from what we find hinted of it by Diodorus, to have been a place of considerable force, and situated in a populous country. As for the cities of Tocas, Phellina, Maschala, Acris, &c. they seem to have had their situation near the borders of Africa Propria. For a confirmation of this, we must refer our readers to a former note (1).

(1) Univ. hist. vol. vi. p. 808. not. (Y), (Z), & p. 809.

Jol.

THE next city of consequence on the sea-coast, to the westward, was Jol, the seat a of the younger Juba, who, out of the great veneration he had for Augustus, gave it the name of Cæsarea, according to Eutropius, Pliny, and Strabo. That it had a port, and an island lying in the mouth of it, we are assured by Strabo; which gives us good grounds to suppose, that the modern Sherbell answers to the Jol or Julia Cæsarea of the antients. The large circuit, and sumptuous remains of an old city at Sherbell, together with its situation, and many other concurring circumstances, serve likewise to render extremely probable such a supposition. For a full and ample description of the port or Cotbon, and all other particulars of note relating to Sherbell, some of which were doubtless applicable to the Numidian Jol, we must beg leave to refer our curious readers to the observations of the ingenious traveller so frequently b cited. We shall only add, that a colony was settled here by the emperor Claudius; and that Bochart affirms the word Jol, in the oriental languages, to signify high or lofty; which agrees with the situation of the place, and consequently proves, that it was either founded by the *Oriental*s, or by some of their descendants *.

Canucius.

THE Canucius of Ptolemy, Gunugi of Pliny, and Gunugus of the itinerary, answering to the Bresk of the Algerines, stood about nine miles to the westward from Jol. Though this place was formerly famous, on account of a Roman colony planted in it by Augustus, it is now uninhabited, the violences committed by the neighbouring Kabyles not permitting people of any nation to make a settlement in it *.

Cartenna.

Cartenna, a very considerable city, situated, as should seem, near the mouth of c the river Cartennus, where Augustus settled the soldiers of the second legion. Ptolemy indeed places it some leagues more westerly; but the position he assigns many of his towns, is so extremely erroneous, that he deserves no credit, when any shadow of an argument can be offered against him. Now, Cartenna, in the Phœnician language, signified the city of Tenna; and we find a promontory some leagues to the eastward, at this day called the cape of Tennes, and a town named Tnis or Tennis not far distant from it. It was not unusual amongst the most antient founders of cities to build them upon the banks of rivers, and to give those rivers the names d of the new-built towns. Of this the city and river of Camicius in Sicily, to omit many others that might be produced, is a sufficient proof. That Tenna, Tennes, or Tanas, was a local proper name in Numidia, is not only evident from the cape above-mentioned, but from the Tanas, which was a river of this country, though its course cannot, for want of sufficient light from history, be ascertained. Whether Tenna or Tennis was the proper name of the founder, or derived from the nature of the soil, as the learned traveller we are so much obliged to seems to insinuate, we shall not take upon us to determine. However, we hope that ingenious gentleman will not take it amiss, if we dissent from him, when he derives Tanis, the name of a most antient and illustrious city of Egypt, from ἡν τιν, clay, and makes this city to have been the same with Pelusium; for Tanis, in Hebrew letters, is ינז Tzaan, or Zaan, and the word itself Egyptian, whose signification is intirely unknown. As e for the city, it was, according to the itinerary of Antoninus, at least forty-four Roman miles from Pelusium, and consequently must have been different from it. We have deduced the word Cartenna from the Phœnician language, because it appears from Procopius and Eusebius, not to mention other writers, that the Phœnicians sent colonies into this country in the most early times *.

Arsenaria.

ON the western banks of the Cartennus, the antients place Arsenaria, a town where, if Pliny may be credited, a Latin colony was planted under some of the first Roman emperors. As the last-mentioned author makes it to be three Roman miles from the sea, it is probable the modern Arzew answers to it *.

Quiza.

THE next maritime town of note, in a western direction, is the Quiza Xenitana, f Quiza Colonia, or Quiza Municipium, of Ptolemy, Mela, Pliny, and the itinerary. Dr. Shaw will have Geeza to be the antient Quiza; which, as the situation assigned this last was immediately after the Portus Magnus, is not improbable *.

Siga.

Siga, an ancient city of great repute, situated at the mouth of an harbour, and upon a river of the same name. According to Pliny, Syphax's palace was here, which,

- a together with the city itself, was demolished in the time of Strabo. However, it was afterwards rebuilt, and a colony settled there, as we are informed by Ptolemy. Dr. Shaw believes, that the Tafna answers to the river, and Tackumbreet to the town, of Siga. It appears from Scylax, that both the city and river were known in his time, the former of which he calls Sigum. It was the last maritime place of eminence of this region, being at no great distance from the Malva, which our learned traveller has, with a good appearance of truth, endeavoured to prove the same river with the Molechatb and Mulucha ^m.

- THE first mediterranean cities worthy our notice, to the west of the Ampfaga, ^{Sitifi and Satafi.} were Sitifi and Satafi, sixteen miles from one another. For a further account of which, our readers may have recourse to Ammianus Marcellinus, Ptolemy, and other ancient writers. By their names, they seem to have been founded by the Phœnicians ^a.

Auzia or Auzea, a city of great antiquity, if, with Menander Ephesus, we suppose it to be the African city of that name founded by Ithobaal king of Tyre. Tacitus tells us, that it was built in a small plain, surrounded on all sides with barren forests of a vast extent. The ruins of this city are called by the neighbouring Arabs Sour Gussan, the walls of the antelopes, a great part whereof, flanked at proper distances with little square towers, is still remaining ^o.

- Tubusuptus* or Tubusittus, a town mentioned by Ptolemy and Ammianus Marcellinus, ^{Tubusuptus.} which Lipsius takes to be the Tubusicus besieged by Tacfarinas, according to Tacitus. From what Marcellinus has hinted, it seems to have been situated near the Mons Ferratus ^p.

As Nababurum, Vitaca, Uffara, Vazagad, Ausum, Robonda, Zaratha, Chizala, La- ^{Nababurum, &c.} mida, Vasana, Pbloryia, and many other towns, together with every thing relating to them, are long since buried in oblivion, we shall pass them over in silence, and proceed to the principal promontories, mountains, rivers, &c. of this province, which it will be necessary for our readers to have a general idea of, in order to understand those accounts of the transactions happening in it, that have been transmitted down to us by the ancient historians ^q.

- d THE first promontories, that present themselves to our view, are the Audus and Vabar of Ptolemy. The Afbounemonker of the Algerines seems to answer to Vabar, having some traces of old ruins still remaining upon it. 2. The Promontorium Apollinis of Pliny and Ptolemy, the Nackos of the Moors, and cape Tennes of the modern geographers. It deduces its name Nackos, i. e. The bell, from the figure of the grotto in the lower part of it, and is in almost 2° E. long. from London. 3. The Promontorium Magnum of Ptolemy was a large and conspicuous cape near 1° E. of the Malva or Mulucha. This is at present called by sailors Cape Hone, and by the inhabitants Ras Hunneine and Mellack. It lies about four leagues to the north-east of Twunt, and is a continuation of the mountains of Trara ^r.

- e AMONGST the mountains of note in the Numidia Maficiflorum may be ranked that high knot of eminences, which at present distinguish themselves to the southward of the plains of Sudratab, being probably the beginning of that chain of mountains, called by the ancients mount Atlas. 2. The Zalacus of Ptolemy, which seems to have had the same position as the present mount Wannashreefe. 3. Mount Maletubalus, upon the frontiers of Gætulia. This is in the Sabara, and, if we remember right, has not had its modern name brought into Europe. 4. The Durdus of Ptolemy, lying between the mountains of El Callab and Trara. 5. The Mons Pbrurasus, immediately succeeding Maletubalus. 6. The Montes Chalcorycbii, near the country of the ancient Herpiditani, between mount Durdus and the Malva or Mulucha ^s.

- f THE most remarkable rivers taken notice of by the ancients were, 1. The Audus, ^{The rivers.} placed by Ptolemy at the bottom of the Sinus Numidicus, no traces of which are now to be seen. 2. The Sifaris, called at present by the Moors and Algerines the Manfoureab, whose water was probably of a red colour in ancient times; for that the name imports, as has been already observed. 3. The Niffava, known at this day by the name of the river of Boujeiab, because it empties itself into the sea a little to the eastward of that city. It consists of a number of rivulets, falling into it from different directions, and has its source at Jibbel Deera, seventy miles up into the country to the W. S. W. 4. The Serbelis, now the Yffer, a large river, whose mouth is about eight leagues from Temenduse, and lieth something nearer Rusgunia than Rusuccura. We are told, that its sources are from the mountainous district to the S. S. W. that the westernmost branch of it is called Sburffa, after the name of the neighbouring Arabs; and the other Wed el Zeitoune, i. e. The river of olives, from the vast quantity of that fruit produced in the adjacent territory. 5. The Savus, a river falling into the sea near Pliny's Icosion, which our learned traveller takes to have had the same situation as the Algiers of the moderns. If this be admitted, the Hameese bids fairest for the ancient Savus, especially as Leo calls this very river Sesiaia, a word nearly approaching to Savus. 6. The Chinalaph of Ptolemy is the most noted river of the Algerines, who call it Sbelliff. It ariseth in the Sabara, at the distance of eighty miles to the south-east. The fountains which form its source, from their number and contiguity, are known amongst the Arabs by the name Sebbiene Aine, or Sebaoun Aoun, The seventy fountains. A minute description of this river our readers will find in a proper place. 7. The Cartennus, to which, it is supposed, the stream formed by the Sikke and the Habrah answers. Marmol calls a river in this situation Cirat; which may give some countenance to the aforesaid supposition. 8. The Flumen Salsum, at present called the Wed el Mailab, is a stream something less than the Cberwell, as it passeth by Oxford. 9. Affara, a river mentioned by Ptolemy, which may possibly be the same with the Iffer of Abulfeda. The Iffer is one of the four branches, that form the Tafna, which our readers may find described in that curious piece we have so often referred them to.

The islands appertaining to it.

THE only islands that deserve our attention are, 1. The Acra of Scylax, an island, that forms the modern port of Harshgoone, under which vessels of the greatest burden may lie in the utmost safety. 2. The Tres Insulae of Antoninus, situated about ten miles from the Mulucha, to the north-west of that river.

Its curiosities.

THE chief curiosities worthy of notice are: 1. The ruins of a Roman city, called at present Cassir, among the Beni Grobberry, to the northward of Jibbel Asroone; upon the mountains adjacent to which the Algerines frequently dig up large pipes of lead, supposed to have been formerly employed in conveying the excellent water those parts produced to Saldæ. 2. The rivulet of salt-water, which glides through the valley Dammer Cappy, i. e. The iron gate. 3. The large salt-pits, five miles to the southward of Arzew. 4. One of the fountains of the Habrah at Nisrag, where the water bursts out with a surprising noise and rapidity; as also the hot bath, and several ancient cisterns upon a branch of the Habrah, when it arrives within eight leagues of the sea. 5. Wanashreefe, a high rugged mountain, generally covered with snow, and remarkable for its mines of lead-ore, many flecks and sparks of which being brought down by the river Wed-el-Fuddab, and left upon the banks of it exposed to the sun, gave occasion to the name Wannashreefe. 6. The Jibbel Miniss, an intire mountain of salt. 7. The Aqua Calida Colonia of the antients, the Hammam or Bath of Mereega of the moderns. All of which, with many others that we cannot touch upon here, will be accurately described in that branch of the modern history, to which they properly belong.

SECT. II.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, customs, arts, &c. of the Numidians.

The antiquity of the Numidians.

ALL the authors, famous for their researches into antiquity, agree, that the tract extending from the isthmus of Suez to the lake Tritonis, was chiefly peopled by the descendants of Misraim; and that the posterity of his brother Put, or Pbut, spread themselves over all the region betwixt that lake and the Atlantick ocean. It is certain Herodotus gives great countenance to this notion; for he tells us, that the

Libyan

- a Libyan Nomades, whose territories, to the west, were bounded by the Triton, agreed in their customs and manners with the Egyptians; but that the Africans, from that river to the Atlantic ocean, differed almost in all points from them. Ptolemy mentions a city called Putea near Adrumetum; and Pliny a river of Mauritania Tingitana, known by the name of Fut. or Pbut; which seems to confirm the above-mentioned supposition. The district adjacent to this river we find mentioned by some authors under the appellation of Regio Pbutensis; which plainly alludes to the name Pbut. That word signifies scattered or dispersed; which very well agrees with what we find related of the Numidians by Mela and Strabo; so that we may, without any scruple, admit the Aborigines of this country to have been the descendants of Pbut. Aldrete, b Gaspar Varreiro, and others, think, that some remains of Pbut are still discernible in the modern Fez; which notion, after a perusal of those writers, our readers will perhaps think proper to espouse. However, it appears from Eusebius, Procopius, St. Austin, and others, that the Aborigines were not the only ancient inhabitants of Numidia, since the Phœnicians, in almost the earliest ages, sent colonies thither. But tho' both these nations descended from Ham, they yet differed in many particulars, as we shall have frequent occasion to observe^a.

- Polybius*, as has been already observed, informs us, that the Carthaginians once ^{Their government.} possessed all that part of Africa, extending from the confines of Cyrenaica to the pillars of Hercules; but this, we apprehend, is to be understood of the sea-coast of that vast tract: for it sufficiently appears from Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Livy, and other ancient historians, that the interior Numidia, at least a considerable part of it, was independent on the Carthaginians. It is true, the Numidians always assisted the Carthaginians in their wars; but most of these forces were upon the footing of mercenaries, or of auxiliary troops, sent in pursuance of solemn engagements entered into by the princes to whom they belonged. This might be proved by a great number of passages drawn from the authors just mentioned, were it in any manner necessary. The Carthaginian form of government therefore undoubtedly prevailed in every part of Numidia subject to the state of Carthage, though, in others, absolute monarchy took place. No one can doubt of this, who considers, that not only the kingdom d of Anteus, including this country, as well as Mauritania Tingitana, and consequently that of his conqueror Hercules, was despotic, but likewise that Iarbas, Gala (B), Syphax, Masinissa, and other later princes, ruled here with an unlimited sway. The old eastern governments also, from whence that of Numidia was derived, put the point here insisted upon beyond dispute. As to the interior of this government, or the particular political maxims, that formed the basis of it, we are intirely in the dark, the most authentic ancient historians not supplying us with the least hint relative thereto^b.

- WHETHER or no any of the independent princes of Numidia were legislators, or, ^{Laws.} if so, what particular laws they enacted for the good of their subjects, history informs us not. The Carthaginian laws had, without doubt, their proper force amongst all e the Numidians under the dominion of Carthage. Could Isidore be relied upon, some laws of the Medes and Persians might possibly have been observed in several districts of this country, since he seems to intimate, that those nations, in ancient times, planted a colony in Numidia, at least, that there was an intercourse betwixt them and the Numidians. Sallust likewise more than insinuates the same thing, since he affirms, that the Persians sailed hither before the Phœnicians, when, intermixing with the Gatullians, they, in conjunction with that people, formed the Numidian nation. To which

(B) We are informed by Appian, that there were many reguli, or heads of tribes, in the country of the Masæyli, not much unlike the emirs of the present Arabs, who enjoyed a sort of sovereignty over their respective tribes, but yet acknowledged Syphax for their chief. It can scarce be doubted, but that Syphax's government, with respect to these princes, was despotic, otherwise he could not have brought such numerous armies into the field. What has here been observed of Syphax, was undoubtedly true of the other kings of the Masæyli, as well as those of the Masæyli (2).

(2) Appian. in Libye. c. 6. p. 10. edit. Tol. Amst. 1670.

that author subjoins, that neither being able to find any materials here for building ^a of houses, nor to carry on any commerce with the Spaniards, by reason of their different languages, and the great sea betwixt them, the Persians built them huts, tents, or cottages, of the bottoms of their ships inverted, which they removed from place to place; and that, from this circumstance, they called themselves Numidæ, a word which, in the Persic tongue, alluded thereto. But this relation being inconsistent with itself, and the notion couched therein intirely repugnant to the whole stream both of sacred and profane antiquity, our readers will not scruple to reject it ^c.

Religion.

As the first Numidians, in common with all the other Indigenæ of that vast tract between the borders of Egypt and the Atlantic ocean, were called Libyans, we may infer from Herodotus, that the principal gods they sacrificed to were the Sun and ^b Aëon. This is a convincing proof of their high antiquity, as clearly evincing, that the migration of the first colony, which peopled this country, preceded the introduction of image-worship into the pagan world. It is likewise an argument, that this colony did not consist of Persians, since the Sun only was their principal deity. Some of these Numidians also might probably worship Triton, Minerva, and Neptunus (C), especially those near the confines of Africa Propria, as the same author seems to suggest. That part of this nation subject to Carthage, it is reasonable to presume, paid divine honours to the Phœnician and Greek deities, that were the objects of the Carthaginian worship, of which we have already given so full and ample an account. It appears from Herodotus, that Hephestus, or Vulcan, was an ^c Egyptian deity worshipped at Memphis; but whether or no the Numidians held him in any veneration, or indeed had any knowledge of him; we must leave others to decide ^d.

Language.

FROM what has been just offered, our readers will allow it probable, that Misraim and Phut, with their descendants, moved together into Africa; and that their posterity inhabited contiguous regions; nay, if any credit may be given to Herodotus, and other authors of the best repute, they agreed, for many ages, in most particulars. Herodotus seems to intimate, that in his time, or at least not long before it, the people, inhabiting that tract afterwards called Numidia, went by the general name of Libyans; and that the Numidians were then possessed of the country situate between ^d the frontiers of Egypt and the river Triton, since he tells us, that the nation occupying that region were called Libyan Nomades, in contradistinction to the Libyans, who extended themselves from thence to the westward, as far as the Atlantic ocean. This observation we remember not to have been made by any other author. However, it seems to be of considerable consequence; for it bids fair to prove, that the kingdoms of the Massyli and Masseyli, though of a very early date, were not called Numidia, till after, or at least a little before, the time of Herodotus; and that this name was occasioned by an irruption of a great body of the Libyan Nomades into the countries to the westward of the Triton about the period above-mentioned. In confirmation of this notion, it may be observed, that no mention is made of the Numidians by any ^e of the Greek or Roman historians, till about the time of Herodotus; which is a presumptive argument, that they made no considerable figure, and consequently did not possess territories of so large an extent then as afterwards. Though therefore it can scarce be doubted, but that Numidia Propria and Mauritania Cæsariensis were at first peopled by Phut's descendants, it is probable, that neither of those provinces were called Numidia till the age of Herodotus, or at least not long before that age, when the Libyan Nomades, or Numidians, passed into them. However, in conformity to what has been asserted above, we must remind our readers, that the Phœnicians, in the most early ages, and after them the Carthaginians, planted colonies here. Pliny, Solinus, and Strabo, by intimating, that the Numidians of their time ^f

(C) Father Delrio thinks, that the Nephtuim of Moses was either the great ancestor, or nation, of the Numidians. If so, it is very possible, that Neptune, one of the great gods of Africa, might have deduced his name from thence. This notion seems to be countenanced by St. Jerom, who reads it Neptuim; which is almost intirely the same word with Neptunus, after the rejection of the Latin termination US. Albrete, a person of most profound erudition, comes into this opinion (3).

- a agreed in some points with the Libyan Nomades of Herodotus, add some weight to the hypothesis we have just offered to the consideration of the learned. From all which particulars we may conclude, that the languages spoken in Numidia were,
1. That of the Libyan Nomades, which, from many authors, appears to have been nearly related to the old Egyptian.
 2. The Cartaginian.
 3. The Phœnician.
 4. That of Pbut's immediate descendants, who at first came there, which, in some points, might have differed from all the rest.
- That the tongue prevailing, in part of Numidia at least, was different from the Phœnician and Cartaginian, is evident from Sallust, and others. However barbarous the Numidians might have been, some of them used letters, not very unlike those that made up the Punic alphabet, as
- b appears from the legends of several antient Numidian coins* (D).

WITH regard to the customs of the Numidians, our readers will neither expect nor desire us to be prolix on that head: neither the limits we have prescribed ourselves, nor the materials left us by the antients, will permit this. In order therefore to form a general idea of these customs, it will be sufficient to observe, that the principal of them were the following:

1. THE Numidians were divided into tribes, nomes, cantons, or hordes, in the same manner as the Arabes Scenitæ, and not very unlike the present Tartars; excepting that the latter form their villages, or encampments, of carts, like their ancestors the antient Scythians; whereas the circular dou-wars of the Numidians were composed of their mapalia, with which the bhyms, or tents, of the modern Bedoweens nearly correspond. Mela, Strabo, Virgil, Pliny, and others, put this point beyond dispute. The mapalia, or Numidian tents, were secured from the heat and inclemency of the weather by a covering only of such hair-cloth as our coal-sacks are made of. They were all of the same form, oblong, resembling the inverted bottom of a ship, in conformity to the description Sallust has given us of them. A whole tribe or horde encamped together, and, having consumed all the produce of one fruitful spot, removed from thence to another, as is the custom of their posterity the Bedoweens at this day. As this part of Africa consisted of dry and barren sandy deserts, interspersed with fruitful spots, (for which reason Strabo compares it to a leopard's skin) such a way of life was absolutely necessary for those who did not live in cities. Hence it appears, in conjunction with what we have observed of their language, that nome, agreeable to what we find advanced by Diodorus Siculus, St. Cyril, Epiphanius, Eusebius, and others, must have been either an Egyptian or Syriac word, signifying part, portion, division, &c. and not of Greek extraction, as some absurdly pretend; to which add ידא or yeda, place, limits, country, &c. and the name Numidia is formed in a much more rational and apposite manner, than it is possible for it to be upon the principles of those persons, who suppose it deduced from a language intirely unknown to the Numidians†.

2. THOSE Numidians who lived in fixed habitations, for the most part dwelt in small cottages, raised either with hurdles, daubed over with mud, or built out of some such slight materials, in the same manner as the gurbies of the Kabyles are erected at this day. The roofs were undoubtedly covered with straw or turf, supported by reeds or branches of trees, as those of the gurbies are. The Numidians, at least those of Phœnician extraction, called these habitations magaria, an explication of which word has been already given. The very learned and accurate Dr. Shaw informs us,

(D) This likewise appears from the letter Bomilcar wrote to Nabdalsa or Nadabalsa, a Numidian nobleman of the first rank; which being delivered into the hands of Jugurtha, occasioned the death of Bomilcar, and many others, as we learn from Sallust. What we have here advanced, is likewise countenanced by Livy, and other authors (4).

that the towns or villages formed of these huts, are at present built upon eminences, a and called by the Kabyles, who inhabit them, daskkras &c.

They rode without bridles. 3. THE Numidians rode without saddles, and many of them without bridles, whence Virgil calls them Numidæ infræni. As their principal strength consisted in their cavalry, and they were inured to the management of horses from their infancy, they found this no difficult thing. The custom we are now upon suggests to us the meaning of the word Metagonium (E), the proper name of a promontory, as likewise of the country of the Massyli, as has been observed above. It is undoubtedly equivalent to מֵתֵג יוֹנִיבֵב meteg ionibb, or meteg ioniab, one that lays aside, or that hath laid aside, his bridle. This is a much more natural etymology, than any that can be drawn from the Greek tongue ^b.

They had many wives, concu-
bines, &c. 4. ACCORDING to Strabo, they had many wives, concubines, and consequently many children, as the *Oriental*s had, tho', in other respects, they were very temperate and abstemious. Their manner of fighting and encamping we have already taken notice of; and therefore to touch upon that head here, would be intirely superfluous ^b.

The king's brother succeeded to the crown in Numidia. 5. THE king's next brother, not his eldest son, succeeded him in Numidia, particularly in the country of the Massyli. This we learn from Livy, who, in proof of what he asserts, tells us, that Gala, the father of Masiniſſa, was succeeded by his next brother Deſalces ^k.

The diet of the Numidians. 6. THEIR diet consisted chiefly of herbs, grain, pulse, water, &c. and they abstained almost intirely from wine; flesh was sometimes, though not so frequently, used. To this, as well as the moderate degrees of heat and cold of their climate in summer and winter, Appian seems to attribute their long lives, and the large share of health they enjoyed. In conformity to nature and experience, that author assures us, that the summers in Numidia were not near so hot as in India and Ethiopia ^l.

They use only a whip or rod on horseback. 7. THE Numidians, particularly the Massyli, did not only ride without saddles and bridles, but likewise all sorts of accoutrements, as we learn from what Appian relates of Masiniſſa, as well as from many other authors. This they did, in order to rush upon their enemies, or prey, with the greater force and fierceness. However, they made use of a rod or whip, with which they easily managed their horses, though in the midst of the hottest engagements ^m.

Are clad in loose garments. 8. MANY of the poorer sort of people in Numidia went almost naked; but the Numidians of any fashion wore their garments loose, not making use of a sash or girdle. In this particular they agreed with the Carthaginians, and most of the other Africans. Hence that of Virgil ⁿ:

Hic Nomadum genus, & distinctos Mulciber Afros, &c.

Eminent for their skill in throwing of darts, &c. 9. THEY were eminent for their skill in hurling the javelin, and throwing of darts, which they discharged in vast numbers upon the enemy. As they seldom or never failed doing great execution, this rendered them very formidable ^o.

Fight in the night-time. 10. WE are told, that the Massyli, when at war with their neighbours, for the most part, chose to come to a general action in the night-time ^p.

Desertion no crime amongst them. 11. DESERTION was no crime amongst the Numidians, who, after the first defeat, were at liberty to return home, or continue in the army, as they pleased ^q.

12. IN fine, there must have been a great variety of customs in Numidia, as it was inhabited by many different nations, that were opposite to one another in many particulars, one of which Diodorus calls the Asphadelodians, who were probably of a dif-

(E) It appears from Martial and Lucan, that the custom of riding without bridles prevailed more amongst the Massyli than the Maslyli. Now, the country of the Massyli was the Terra Metagonis, as has been already observed; which not a little supports the etymon we would give of Metagonium (f).

a ferent cast from the rest, since he informs us, that they were as black as the Ethiopians. According to Hellanicus, this poor people, being a tribe or canton of the Libyan Nomades, had nothing but a cup, a pitcher, and a dagger or knife, which they constantly carried about with them, their small mapalia being made of asphodelus, great quantities of which they took care in the summer-time to be provided with, in order to have always then an agreeable shady retreat. This circumstance undoubtedly gave occasion to the name Diodorus calls them by, and is the chief thing, that we find remarked of them by the antient historians^r.

THE Numidians, that inhabited the open country, being a barbarous, rude, and illiterate people, it would be ridiculous to expect any traces of arts or sciences amongst b them. The Carthaginians and Phœnicians indeed, who were very civilized, polite, and ingenious nations, formed, as there is reason to believe, no small part of the inhabitants of the most considerable cities and towns; but we have already treated amply of the arts and sciences they were famous for. However, the proper Numidians seem to have been eminent for their skill in managing horses (F), and knowledge in some branches of the military art. Some knowledge likewise of the Egyptian theology, polity, and philosophical notions, we cannot well suppose them to have been destitute of, since their ancestors had, for a series of generations, an intercourse with the posterity of Misraim; but as to the extent of any knowledge of this kind amongst them, we are intirely in the dark. The present Kabyles and Bedoweens, according to c Dr. Shaw, spend their time chiefly in making bykes, or woollen blankets, and burnooses, as they call cloaks or upper garments, in an employment not unlike to which possibly some of the antient rustic Numidians might have been engaged, especially since he imagines the Kabyles to be the remains of the old Africans. As for the chronology of the Numidians, if they had any, it is sufficient to observe, that it must have agreed in the main with that of the nations they were derived from, and contiguous to, viz. the Carthaginians, Phœnicians, and most early Egyptians. In one point however they differed from most, if not all, other nations; for they computed their time by nights, and not by days, if any credit may be given to a fragment of Nic. Damascenus^s.

(F) These horses were very small, but extremely swift, and easily managed, according to Livy and Strabo. They were satisfied with little food, bore hunger and thirst a long time with great patience, and underwent incredible fatigues. As they had an ugly gait, a stiff neck, and threw their head forward, the Numidian horseman made but a ridiculous figure before the time of action; but always behaved well during the heat of the engagement. Livy seems to intimate, that, in Hannibal's time, some of the Numidian cavalry used bridles, and were heavy-armed troops, wearing coats of mail, swords, shields, and lances; which is countenanced by Polybius, Sallust, and others (6).

SECT. III.

The history of the Numidians, from the earliest accounts of time, to the conquest of their country by the Romans.

d NUMIDIA, being pretty remote from Egypt, as well as that part of Libya contiguous to it, seems to have been but thinly peopled before the first arrival of the Phœnicians there. When this happened, we cannot precisely determine; but, according to Eusebius, who is followed by Bochart, and other authors of good reputation, it must have been above three hundred years before the foundation of Carthage. For Aristotle relates, that the Phœnician historians made Utica to be two hundred eighty-seven years older than Carthage; and Eusebius affirms Hercules, surnamed Diodas or Desanaus, i. e. the Phœnician Hercules, to have been extremely famous all over Africa this very year, and to have conquered Antæus in the farthest part of Mauritania near Zilis and Tingis, about fifty years before. Sir Isaac Newton however, not without reason, fixes this event nearer the time of the Trojan war. Sallust, Florus, and Orosius likewise, inform us, that this Hercules, whom Sallust calls Libys, built Capfa.

When the Phœnicians came first into Numidia.

From whence we may infer, that either the kingdom of Antæus included Numidia, a and even Africa Propria, or else that Hercules over-ran these countries after he had conquered Mauritania; the former of which notions appears to us the most probable. We must defer touching upon the war betwixt Hercules and Antæus, till we come to the history of the Mauritanians, tho' the consequences of that war extended to the nation we are now upon ^a.

No accounts of the Numidian affairs for several of the earliest centuries now remaining.

THE transactions of Numidia, during many of the earliest centuries, have, for a long series of ages, been buried in oblivion. It is probable however, that as the Phœnicians were masters of a good part of it, they were recorded, and not unknown in the Carthaginian times. King Iarbas probably reigned here, as well as in Africa Propria, if not in Mauritania, and other parts of Libya, when Dido began to build Byrsa; but we have elsewhere taken notice of all the principal particulars relating to that prince, handed down to us by the antients. It appears from Justin, that, about the age of Herodotus, the people of this country were called both Africans or Libyans, and Numidians; which seems to imply, that the latter name was not then of very long standing, and consequently to countenance what we have advanced above concerning the incorporation of the Libyan Nomades with these (G) Africans or Libyans. Justin likewise intimates, that, about this time, the Carthaginians vanquished both the Moors or Mauritanians, and Numidians, who had leagued together against them; the consequence of which was, that the former were excused paying the tribute, which had been exacted from them ever since Dido's arrival in Africa by the latter. As for the part the Numidians acted in all the wars betwixt the Dionysii, Agathocles, &c. and the Carthaginians, we have already been so copious on that head, that our readers will not expect us to expatiate upon it here ^b.

AFTER the conclusion of the first Punic war, the African troops carried on a bloody war three years against their masters the Carthaginians. The most active of all others in this rebellion, according to Diodorus Siculus, were the Micanian Numidians. This so incensed the Carthaginians, that, after Hamilcar had either killed or taken prisoners all the mercenaries, he sent a large detachment to ravage the country of those Numidians. The commandant of that detachment executed his orders with the utmost rigour and severity; for he plundered all that district in a terrible manner, and crucified all the prisoners, without distinction, that fell into his hands. This filled the rest with such indignation and resentment, that both they, and their posterity ever afterwards, bore an implacable hatred to the Carthaginians. The conduct of the Numidians in the Carthaginian service, during the first Punic war, was such as merited the highest applause, as our readers will plainly perceive by consulting a former part of this history ^c.

Syphax defeated twice by Masinissa.

IN the consulate of the younger Fabius and Sempronius Gracchus, Syphax, king of the Masæsyli, entered into an alliance with the Romans. This induced Gala, king of the Masæsyli, to conclude a treaty with the Carthaginians, in consequence of which his son Masinissa marched at the head of a powerful army to give Syphax battle. Being reinforced in his march by a body of Carthaginians, as soon as he came up with the Masæsyli, he engaged them. The fight was sharp and bloody; but at last Masinissa carried the day, putting thirty thousand of the Masæsyli to the sword, and driving Syphax into the country of the Maurusii, or Mauritania. This, for the present, gave a check both to the progress of Syphax's arms, and the towering projects of the Romans. However, the Masæsylian monarch found means, some time after, to assemble another formidable army of Masæsylians and Mauritanians; which was likewise defeated and dispersed by Masinissa. But the face of affairs in this country was soon afterwards greatly changed ^d.

A brief account of Masinissa's affairs before he entered into an alliance with the Romans.

Gala dying whilst his son Masinissa was acting at the head of the Numidian troops sent to the assistance of the Carthaginians in Spain, his brother Desalces, according to

(G) The Numidians, particularly the Masæsyli, lived upon herbs, roots, flesh, milk, cheese, &c. in conformity to what Herodotus relates of the Libyan Nomades, as we learn from Appian and Strabo. This adds no small weight to the hypothesis we have ventured here to submit to the consideration of the learned (7).

- a the established order of succession in Numidia, took possession of the Massylian throne. That prince dying soon after his accession, Capusa, his eldest son, succeeded him. But he did not long enjoy his high dignity; for one Mezetulus, a person of royal extraction, but an enemy to the family of Gala, found means to excite a great part of his subjects to a revolt; which enabled him to form a considerable corps, and to bring Capusa to a general action; which ending in his favour, and Capusa, with many of the noblesse, being slain, he obtained the Massylian crown, as the fruit of his victory. However, he did not think proper to assume the title of king, contenting himself with that of guardian or protector to Lacumaces, the only surviving young prince of the blood, whom he graced with the royal title. To support himself in his usurpation, he married the widow of Desfalces, who was Hannibal's niece, and consequently of the most powerful family in Carthage. In order to attain the same end, he sent ambassadors to Syphax, to conclude a treaty of alliance with him. In the mean time Masiniſſa, receiving advice of his uncle's death, of his cousin's slaughter, and of Mezetulus's usurpation, immediately passed over to Africa, and went to the court of Bocchar, king of Mauritania, to solicit succours. Bocchar, sensible of the great injustice offered Masiniſſa, gave him a body of four thousand Mcors to escorte him to his dominions. His subjects, having been apprised of his approach, joined him upon the frontiers with a party of five hundred men. The Moors, in pursuance of their orders, returned home, as soon as Masiniſſa reached the confines of his kingdom; notwithstanding which, and the small body that declared for him, having accidentally met Lacumaces at Tbapsus with an escort going to implore Syphax's assistance, he drove him into the town, which he carried by assault, after a faint resistance. However, Lacumaces, with many of his men, found means to escape to Syphax. The fame of this exploit gained Masiniſſa great credit, insomuch that the Numidians flocked to him from all parts, and, amongst the rest, many of his father Gala's veterans, who pressed him to make a speedy and vigorous push for his hereditary dominions. Lacumaces having joined Mezetulus with a reinforcement of Massylians, which he had prevailed upon Syphax to send to the assistance of his ally, the usurper advanced at the head of a numerous army to offer Masiniſſa battle; which
- d that prince, though much inferior in number, did not decline. Hereupon an engagement ensued, and, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers, Masiniſſa, by his own conduct and bravery, and the valour of his troops, gained a complete victory; the immediate consequence of which was a quiet and peaceable possession of his kingdom, Mezetulus and Lacumaces, with a few that attended them, flying into the territories of Carthage. However, looking upon his present situation as precarious, he offered to declare Lacumaces the heir apparent to the crown, and treat him in a manner suitable to his high rank, provided he would immediately make his submission to him; and, after having pardoned Mezetulus, and restored to him every thing that he had forfeited by his treasonable conduct, to take him into favour, if
- e he would acknowledge him as his sovereign. Both of them readily complied with the proposal, and immediately returned home; so that the tranquillity and repose of Numidia would have been then settled upon a solid and lasting foundation, had not this been prevented by Asdrubal, who was then at Syphax's court. He insinuated to that prince, who was disposed to live amicably with his neighbours, "That he was greatly mistaken, if he imagined Masiniſſa would be satisfied with his hereditary countries; that he was a prince of much greater capacity and ambition, than either his father Gala, his uncle Desfalces, or any other of his family; that he had often discovered in Spain marks of a most rare and uncommon merit; and that, in fine, unless this rising flame was extinguished before it came to too great a head,
- f "both the Massylian and Carthaginian states would be infallibly consumed by it." Syphax, alarmed by these suggestions, advanced with a numerous body of forces into a district, which had long been in dispute between him and Gala, but then in the possession of Masiniſſa. This brought on a general action between those two princes, wherein the latter was totally defeated, his army dispersed, and he himself obliged to fly to the top of mount Balbus, attended only by a few of his horse. Such a decisive battle at the present juncture, before Masiniſſa was fixed in his throne, could not but put Syphax into possession of the kingdom of the Massyli. Masiniſſa in the mean time made nocturnal incursions from his post upon mount Balbus, and plundered all the adjacent country, particularly that part of the Carthaginian territory contiguous
- g to Numidia. This district he not only thoroughly pillaged, but likewise laid waste with with fire and sword, carrying off from thence an immense booty, which was bought^a by some merchants, who had put into one of the Carthaginian ports for that purpose. In fine, he did the Carthaginians more damage, not only by committing such dreadful devastations, but by massacring and carrying into captivity vast numbers of their subjects on this occasion, than they could have sustained in a pitched battle, or one campaign of an open and legal war. Syphax, at the pressing and reiterated instances of the Carthaginians, sent Bocchar, one of his most active commanders, with a detachment of four thousand foot, and two thousand horse, to reduce this pestilent gang of robbers, promising him a great reward, if he could bring Masinissa either alive or dead. Bocchar, watching an opportunity, fell upon them unawares, as they were straggling about the country without any order or discipline; so that he took many^b prisoners, dispersed the rest, and pursued Masinissa himself, with a few of his men, to the top of the mountain where he had taken post. As he looked upon the expedition to be in a manner ended, he did not only send many head of cattle, and the other booty that had fallen into his hands, to Syphax, but likewise all the forces, except five hundred foot, and two hundred horse. With this detachment he drove Masinissa from the summit of the hill, and pursued him through several narrow passes and defiles, as far as the plains of Clupea, where he so surrounded him, that all the Massylians, except four, were put to the sword, and Masinissa himself, after having received a dangerous wound, escaped with the utmost difficulty. As this was effected^c by crossing a rapid river, in which attempt two of his four attendants were drowned in the sight of the detachment that pursued him, it was rumoured all over Africa, that Masinissa had been swallowed by the stream; which gave inexpressible pleasure to Syphax and the Carthaginians. For some time he lived undiscovered in a cave, where he was supported by the robberies of the two horsemen, that had made their escape with him; but, having cured his wound, he boldly began to advance towards his own frontiers, giving out publicly, that he intended once more to take possession of his kingdom. In his march he was joined by about forty horse, and, soon after his arrival amongst the Massyli, so many people flocked to him from all parts, that out of them he formed an army of six thousand foot, and four thousand horse; with which he did not only reinstate himself in his dominions, but likewise laid^d waste the borders of the Massyli. This so irritated Syphax, that he immediately assembled a body of troops, and encamped very commodiously upon a ridge of mountains between Cirta and Hippo. His army he commanded in person, and detached his son Vermina, with a considerable force, to take a compass, and attack the enemy in rear. In pursuance of his orders, Vermina set out in the beginning of the night, and took post in the place appointed him, without being discovered by the enemy. In the mean time Syphax decamped, and advanced towards the enemy, in order to give them battle. When he had possessed himself of a rising ground, that led to their camp, and concluded that his son Vermina must have formed the ambuscade behind them, he began the fight. Masinissa being advantageously posted, and his^e soldiers distinguishing themselves in an extraordinary manner, the dispute was long and bloody; but Vermina unexpectedly falling upon their rear, and, by this means, obliging them to divide their forces, which were scarce able before to oppose the main body under Syphax, they were soon thrown into confusion, and forced to betake themselves to a precipitate flight. All the avenues being blocked up, partly by Syphax, and partly by his son, such a dreadful slaughter was made of the unhappy Massyli, that only Masinissa himself, with seventy horse, escaped to the Lesser Syriis. Here he remained, betwixt the confines of the Carthaginians and Garamantes, till the arrival of Lælius, and the Roman fleet, on the coast of Africa. What happened immediately after his junction with the Romans, our readers will find related at large^f in a part of this work, to which it more properly belongs.

We have already observed, that the Carthaginians lost Masinissa by depriving him of his dear Sophonisba. That lady was versed in various branches of literature, excellently well skilled in music, the greatest beauty of that age, or perhaps any other, and of such exquisite charms in every respect, that, according to a grave author, either her bare voice, or a sight of her, was sufficient to captivate the most rigid and severe philosopher. Masinissa therefore could never forgive the mortifying affront put upon him by the state of Carthage, when her father Adrubal, in violation

- a of the laws of honour and public faith, was commanded to give her to Syphax. The Carthaginians however endeavoured to fix that prince in their interest, and, in order to this, prevailed upon Syphax to restore him his dominions. Masiniſſa, to have his full revenge both of Syphax and the Carthaginians, feigned himself intirely satisfied with so generous a cession, and outwardly expressed all imaginable zeal and affection for them, though at the same time he was under-hand with the Romans meditating their ruin. Asdrubal had either some private intelligence, or entertained a suspicion, of this; which induced him to lay an ambuscade for Masiniſſa after his arrival in Africa from Spain, which that prince happily escaped. Syphax in the mean time acted much such a part as Masiniſſa; for he assured the Romans of an inviolable attachment to their interest, though he had entered into the strictest engagements with the Carthaginians, at the earnest solicitations of his wife, whose charms he found himself incapable of resisting. The consequences, both of his conduct, and that of his rival Masiniſſa, have been already related at large. It will be sufficient therefore in this place to observe, that, by the assistance of Lælius, Masiniſſa reduced Syphax's kingdom; that, according to Zonaras, he and Scipio so far outwitted Hannibal before the memorable battle of Zama, that, by a stratagem, they deprived him of some advantageous posts, which, with a solar eclipse happening during the heat of the action, and not a little intimidating the Carthaginian troops, greatly contributed to the victory the Romans obtained; and that, at the conclusion of the second Punic war, he was amply rewarded by the Romans for the important services he had done them. As for Syphax, after the loss of his dominions, he was kept in confinement for some time at Alba, from whence being removed in order to grace Scipio's triumph, he died at Tibur in his way to Rome. Zonaras adds, that his corpse was decently interred; that all the Numidian prisoners were released; and that Vermine, by the assistance of the Romans, took peaceable possession of his father's throne. However, part of the Masælyian kingdom was before annexed to Masiniſſa's dominions, in order to reward that prince for his singular fidelity and close attachment to the Romans, as has been already observed^f (H).

- As an account of all the principal transactions, in which Masiniſſa was concerned between the second and third Punic wars, has been already extracted from the best antient historians, we cannot here pretend to touch upon any of them, without being guilty of a repetition. Nothing therefore is further requisite, in order to complete the history of this famous prince, than to exhibit to our readers view some points of his conduct towards the decline, and at the close, of life; the wise dispositions made after his death by Æmilianus, in order to the regulation of his domestic affairs; and some particulars relating to his character, genius, and habit of body, drawn from the most celebrated Greek and Roman authors^g.

- By drawing a line of circumvallation round the Carthaginian army under Asdrubal, posted upon an eminence, Masiniſſa cut off all manner of supplies from them; which introduced both the plague and a famine into their camp. As the body of Numidian troops employed in this blockade was not near so numerous as the Carthaginian forces, it is evident, that the line here mentioned must have been extremely strong, and consequently the effect of great labour and art. The Carthaginians, finding themselves reduced to the last extremity, concluded a peace upon the following terms, which Masiniſſa dictated to them: 1. That they should deliver up all deserters. 2. That they should recall their exiles, who had taken refuge in his dominions. 3. That they should pay him five thousand talents of silver, within the space of fifty years. 4. That their soldiers should pass under the jugum, each of them carrying off only a single coat. As Masiniſſa himself, though between eighty and ninety years of age, Masiniſſa forces the Carthaginians to conclude a peace with him upon his own terms.

(H) This seems to be countenanced by the epitomizer of Livy, who gives us sufficiently to understand, that Syphax's family, for a considerable term after the conclusion of the second Punic war, reigned in one part of Numidia; for he intimates, that Archebarzanes, Syphax's grandson, and probably Vermine's son, hovered, with a powerful army of Numidians, about the Carthaginian frontiers, a few years before the third Punic war broke out, in order, as should seem, either to cover them, or enable the Carthaginians to make an irruption into Masiniſſa's territories. Cato however pretended, that these forces, in conjunction with those of Carthage, had a design to invade the Roman dominions, which he urged as a reason to induce the conscript fathers to destroy the African republic (2).

conducted the whole enterprize, he must have been extremely well versed in fortification, and other branches of the military art. His understanding likewise he must have retained to the last. This happened a short time before the beginning of the third Punic war^a.

Romans.

SOON after, the consuls landed an army in Africa, in order to lay siege to Carthage, without imparting to Masiniſſa their design. This not a little chagrined him, as it was contrary to the former practice of the Romans, who, in the preceding war, had communicated their intentions to him, and consulted him on all occasions. When therefore the consuls applied to him for a body of his troops to act in concert with their forces, he made answer, "That they should have a reinforcement from him, when they stood in need of it." It could not but be provoking for him to consider, that, after he had extremely weakened the Carthaginians, and even brought them to the brink of ruin, his pretended imperious friends should come to reap the fruits of his victory, without giving him the least intelligence of it^b.

He dies.

HOWEVER, his mind soon after returned to its natural bias, which was in favour of the Romans. Finding his end approaching, he sent to Æmilianus, then a tribune in the Roman army, to desire a visit from him. What he proposed by this visit, was to invest him with full powers to dispose of his kingdom and estate, as he should think proper, for the benefit of his children. The high idea he had entertained of that young hero's abilities and integrity, together with his gratitude and affection for the family into which he was adopted, induced him to take this step; but, believing that death would not permit him to have a personal conference with Æmilianus upon this subject, he informed his wife and children, in his last moments, that he had impowered him to dispose, in an absolute manner, of all his possessions, and to divide his kingdom amongst his sons. To which he subjoined, "I require, that whatever Æmilianus may decree, shall be executed as punctually, as if I myself had appointed it by my will." Having uttered these words, he expired, at above ninety years of age^c.

THIS prince, during his youth, had met with strange reverses of fortune, as appears from several preceding parts of this history. However, says Appian, being supported by the divine protection, he enjoyed an uninterrupted course of prosperity for a long series of years. His kingdom extended from Mauritania to the western confines of Cyrenaica; from whence it appears, that he was one of the most powerful princes of Africa. Many of the inhabitants of this vast tract he civilized in a wonderful manner, teaching them to cultivate their soil, and to reap those natural advantages, which the fertility of some parts of their country offered them. He was of a more robust habit of body than any of his contemporaries, being blessed with the greatest health and vigour, which was doubtless owing to his extreme temperance, and the toils he incessantly sustained. We are informed by Polybius, that sometimes he stood upon the same spot of ground from morning till evening, without the least motion, and at others continued as long in a sitting posture. He would remain on horseback for several days and nights together, without being sensible of the least fatigue. Nothing can better evince the strength of his constitution, than his youngest son, named Stembal, Sthemba, or Stembanus, who was but four years old at his decease. Tho' ninety years of age, he performed all the exercises used by young men, and always rode without a saddle. Pliny tells us, that he reigned above sixty years. He was an able commander, and much facilitated the reduction of Carthage. Plutarch from Polybius observes, that the day after a great victory won over the Carthaginians, Masiniſſa was seen sitting at the door of his tent, eating a piece of brown bread. Suidas relates, that, to the last, he could mount his horse without any assistance. According to Appian, he left a numerous well-disciplined army, and an immense quantity of wealth (I), behind him^d.

And Maſtanabal, or, according to Livy and Salluſt, Maſtabal, the youngeſt, had the adminiſtration of juſtice, an employment ſuitable to his education, allotted him. They enjoyed in common the immense treaſures Masiniſſa had amaſſed, and were all of them dignified by Æmilianus with the royal title. We find nothing more remarkable of theſe princes, beſides what has been already related, than that the latter continued to aſſiſt the Romans in the third Punic war; and that the former was pretty well verſed in the Greek language. Micipſa therefore became ſole poſſeſſor of the kingdom of Numidia. In his reign, and the conſulate of M. Plautius Hyppſæus and M. Fulvius Flaccus, according to Oroſius, a great part of Africa was covered with locuſts, which deſtroyed all the produce of the earth, and even devoured dry wood; but at laſt they were all carried by the wind into the African ſea, out of which being thrown in vaſt heaps upon the ſhore, a plague enſued, which ſwept away an infinite number of animals of all kinds. In Numidia only perished eight hundred thouſand men, and in Africa Propria two hundred thouſand: amongſt the reſt, thirty thouſand Roman ſoldiers quartered in and about Utica, for the defence of the laſt province. At Utica in particular the mortality raged to ſuch a degree, that fifteen hundred dead bodies were carried out of one gate in a day. Micipſa had two ſons, Adberbal and Hiempſal, whom he educated in his palace, together with his nephew Jugurtha. That young prince was the ſon of Maſtanabal; but his mother having been only a concubine, Masiniſſa had taken no great notice of him. However, Micipſa, conſidering him as a prince of the blood, took as much care of him, as he did of his own children ⁿ.

Jugurtha.

So conspicuous an assemblage of fine talents and perfections at first charmed a Micipsa, who thought them an ornament to his kingdom. However, he soon began to reflect, that he was considerably advanced in years, and his children in their infancy; that mankind naturally thirsted after power; and that nothing was capable of making men run greater lengths than a vicious and unlimited ambition. These reflections soon excited his jealousy, and determined him to expose Jugurtha to a variety of dangers, some of which, he entertained hopes, might prove fatal to him. In order to this, he gave him the command of a body of forces, which he sent to assist the Romans, who were at that time besieging Numantia in Spain. But Jugurtha, by his admirable conduct, did not only escape all these dangers, but likewise won the esteem of the whole army, and the friendship of Scipio, who sent a high character of him to his uncle Micipsa. However, that general gave him some prudent advice in relation to his future conduct, observing, no doubt, in him certain sparks of ambition, which, if lighted into a flame, he apprehended, might, one day, be productive of the most fatal consequences P.

Jugurtha's perfidiousness and cruelty.

BEFORE this last experiment, Micipsa had endeavoured to find out some method of taking him off privately; but his popularity amongst the Numidians obliged that prince to lay aside all thoughts of this nature. After his return from Spain, the whole nation almost adored him. The heroic bravery he had shewn there, his undaunted courage, joined to the utmost calmness of mind, which enabled him to preserve a just medium between a timorous foresight and an impetuous rashness, a circumstance rarely to be met with in persons of his age, and, above all, the advantageous testimonials of his conduct given by Scipio, attracted an universal esteem; nay, Micipsa himself, charmed with the high idea the Roman general had entertained of his merit, changed his behaviour towards him, resolving, if possible, to win his affection by kindness. He therefore adopted him, and declared him joint heir with his two sons (M) to the crown. Finding, some few years afterwards, that his end approached, he sent for all three to his bed side, where, in presence of the whole court, he desired Jugurtha to recollect with what extreme tenderness he had treated him, and consequently to consider how well he had deserved at his hands. He then intreated him to protect his children on all occasions, who, being before related to him by the ties of blood, were now, by their father's bounty, become his brethren. In order to fix him the more firmly in their interest, he likewise complimented him upon his bravery, address, and consummate prudence. He further insinuated, that neither arms nor treasures constitute the strength of a kingdom, but friends, who are neither won by arms nor gold, but by real services, and an inviolable fidelity. "Now where, continued he, can we find better friends than in brothers? And how can that man, who becomes an enemy to his relations, repose any confidence in, or depend upon strangers?" Then addressing himself to Adherbal and Hiempsal, "And you, said he, I injoin always to pay the highest reverence to Jugurtha. Endeavour to imitate, and, if possible, surpass his exalted merit, that the world may not hereafter observe Micipsa's adopted son to have reflected greater glory upon his memory than his own children." Soon after, Micipsa, who, according to Diodorus, was a prince of an amiable character, expired. Though Jugurtha did not believe the king to speak his real sentiments with regard to him, yet he seemed extremely pleased with so gracious a speech, and made him an answer suitable to the occasion. However, that prince at the same time was determined within himself to put in execution the scheme he had formed at the siege of Numantia, which was suggested to him by some factious and abandoned Roman officers, with whom he there contracted an acquaintance. The purport of this scheme was, that he should extort the crown by force from his two cousins, as soon as their father's eyes were closed; f beasts; for he says, that the Numidians were so healthy, and of such robust constitutions, that almost all of them attained to old age, except those who either fell in war, or were devoured by wild beasts, scarce any disease ever proving fatal to them (11).

(M) Diodorus Siculus relates, that tho' Micipsa had many children, his three favourite sons were Adherbal, Hiempsal, and Micipsa. The same historian likewise adds, that he was the most clement of all the Numidian monarchs; and that he sent for a great number of Greeks, eminent in all branches of literature, particularly philosophy, by whose instructions he became a most celebrated philosopher (12).

- a which, they insinuated, might easily be effected by his own valour, and the venality of the Romans. Accordingly, a short time after the old king's death, he found means to assassinate Hiempsal in the city of Tbirmida, where his treasures were deposited, and drive Adberbal out of his dominions. That unhappy prince found himself obliged to fly to Rome, where he endeavoured to engage the conscript fathers to espouse his quarrel; but, notwithstanding the justice of his cause, they had not virtue enough effectually to support him. Jugurtha's ambassadors, by distributing vast sums of money amongst the senators, brought them so far over, that a majority palliated his inhuman proceedings. When those ambassadors therefore declared, that Hiempsal had been killed by the Numidians, on account of his excessive cruelty; that
- b Adberbal was the aggressor in the late troubles; that he was only chagrined, because he could not make that havock amongst his countrymen he would willingly have done; and intreated the senate to form a judgment of Jugurtha's behaviour in Africa from what he had shewn at Numantia, rather than from the suggestions of his enemies, by far the greatest part of the senate discovered themselves prejudiced in his favour. A few however, that were not lost to honour, nor abandoned to corruption, insisted upon bringing him to condign punishment; but, as they could not prevail, he had the best part of Numidia allotted him, and Adberbal was forced to rest satisfied with the other ^a.

- Jugurtha*, finding now by experience, that every thing was venal at Rome, as his
- c friends at Numantia had before informed him, thought he might pursue his towering projects without any obstruction from that quarter. He therefore, immediately after the last division of Micipsa's dominions, threw off the mask, and attacked his cousin by open force. As Adberbal was a prince of a pacific disposition, and almost in all respects the reverse of Jugurtha, he was by no means a match for him. The latter therefore pillaged the former's territories, stormed several of his fortresses, and overran a good part of his kingdom without opposition. Adberbal, depending upon the friendship of the Romans, which his father, in his last moments, assured him would be a stronger support to him than all the troops and treasures in the universe, dispatched deputies to Rome, to complain of these hostilities. But, whilst he lost his time in sending thither fruitless deputations, Jugurtha overthrew him in a pitched battle, and
- d soon after shut him up in Cirta. During the siege of this city, a Roman commission arrived there, in order to persuade both parties to an accommodation; but finding Jugurtha untractable, the commissioners returned home, without so much as conferring with Adberbal. A second deputation, composed of senators of the highest distinction, with Æmilius Scaurus, president of the senate, at their head, landed some time after at Utica, and summoned Jugurtha to appear before them. That prince at first seemed to be under dreadful apprehensions, especially as Scaurus reproached him with his enormous crimes, and threatened him with the resentment of the Romans, if he did not immediately raise the siege of Cirta. However, the Numidian, by his address,
- e and the irresistible power of gold, as was afterwards suspected at Rome, so mollified Scaurus, that he left Adberbal at his mercy. In fine, Jugurtha had at last Cirta surrendered to him, upon condition only, that he should spare the life of Adberbal; but the merciless tyrant, in violation of the laws of nature and humanity, as well as the capitulation, when he had got possession of the town, ordered him to be put to a most cruel death. The merchants likewise, and all the Numidians in the place capable of bearing arms, he caused, without distinction, to be put to the sword ^f.

- EVERY person at Rome, inspired with any sentiments of humanity, was struck with horror at the news of this tragical event. However, all the venal senators still concurred with Jugurtha's ministers in palliating his enormous crimes. Notwithstanding which, the people, excited thereto by Caius Memmius their tribune, who bitterly inveighed against the venality of the senate, resolved not to let so flagrant an instance of villainy go unpunished. This disposition in them induced the conscript fathers likewise to declare their intention to chastise Jugurtha. In order to this, an army was levied to invade Numidia, and the command of it given to the consul Calpurnius Bestia, a person of good abilities, but rendered unfit for the expedition he was to go upon by his insatiable avarice. Jugurtha, being informed of the great preparations making at Rome to attack his dominions, sent his son thither to avert the impending storm. The young prince was plentifully supplied with money, which he had orders to distribute liberally amongst the leading men. But Bestia, proposing to a himself great advantages from an invasion of Numidia, defeated all his intrigues, and got a decree passed, ordering him and his attendants to depart Italy in ten days, unless they were come to deliver up the king himself, and all his territories, to the republic by way of dedition; which decree being notified to them, they returned, without so much as having entered the gates of Rome; and Bestia soon after landed with a powerful army in Africa. For some time he carried on the war there very briskly, reduced several strong-holds, and took many Numidians prisoners. But, upon the arrival of Scaurus, whose character has been already given in the Roman history, a peace was granted Jugurtha upon advantageous terms. That prince coming from Vacca, the place of his residence, to the Roman camp, in order to confer with Bestia and Scaurus, and the preliminaries of the treaty being immediately after settled between them in private conferences, every body at Rome was convinced, that the prince of the senate and the consul had sacrificed to their avarice the good of the republic. The indignation therefore of the people in general displayed itself in the strongest manner. Memmius also fired them with his speeches. It was therefore resolved to dispatch the prætor Cassius, a person they could confide in, to Numidia, to prevail upon Jugurtha to come to Rome, that they might learn from the king himself which of their generals and senators had been seduced by the pestilent influence of corruption. Upon his arrival there, he found means to bribe one Babius Salca, a man of great authority amongst the plebeians, but of insatiable avarice, by whose assistance he escaped with impunity; nay, by the efficacy of gold, he did not only elude all the endeavours of the people of Rome to bring him to justice, but likewise enabled Bomilcar, one of his attendants, to get Massiva, an illegitimate son of Micipsa, assassinated in the streets of Rome. That young prince was advised by many Romans of probity, well-wishers to the family of Masiniissa, to apply for the kingdom of Numidia; which coming to Jugurtha's ears, he prevented the application by this execrable step. However, he was obliged to leave Italy immediately. He departed Rome with passing that severe reflection upon the venality of its infamous citizens already mentioned.

Jugurtha had scarce set foot in Africa, when he received advice, that the senate had disannulled the shameful peace concluded with him by Bestia and Scaurus. Soon after, the consul Albinus transported a Roman army into Numidia, flattering himself with the hopes of reducing Jugurtha to reason before the expiration of his consulate. In this however he found himself deceived; for that crafty prince, by various artifices, so amused and imposed upon Albinus, that nothing of moment happened that campaign. This rendered him strongly suspected of having betrayed his country after the example of his predecessors. His brother Aulus, who succeeded him in the command of the army, was still more unsuccessful; for, after rising from before Suthul, where the king's treasures were deposited, he marched his forces into a defile, out of which he found it impossible to extricate himself. He therefore was obliged to submit to the ignominious ceremony of passing under the jugum, with all his men, and to quit Numidia intirely in ten days time, in order to deliver his troops from immediate destruction. The avaricious disposition of the Roman commander prompted him to besiege Suthul, the possession of which place, he imagined, would make him master of all the wealth of Jugurtha, and consequently paved the way to such a scandalous treaty. However, this was declared void as soon as known at Rome, as being concluded without the authority of the people. The Roman troops retired into Africa Propria, which they had now reduced into the form of a Roman province, and there took up their winter-quarters.

Defeated by Metellus.

In the mean time Caius Mamilius Limetanus, tribune of the people, excited the plebeians to inquire into the conduct of those persons, by whose assistance Jugurtha had found means to elude all the decrees of the senate. This put the body of the people into a great ferment; which occasioned a prosecution of the guilty senators, that was carried on, for some time, with the utmost heat and violence. Lucius Metellus the consul, during these transactions, had Numidia assigned him for his province, and consequently was appointed general of the army destined to act against Jugurtha. As he perfectly disregarded wealth, the Numidian found him superior to all his temptations; which was a great mortification to him. To this he joined all the other virtues, which constitute the great captain; so that Jugurtha found him in all respects

- a inaccessible. That prince therefore was now forced to regulate his conduct, according to the motions of Metellus, with the greatest caution, and exert his utmost bravery, in order to compensate for that hitherto favourable expedient, which now began to fail him. Marius, Metellus's lieutenant, being likewise a person of uncommon merit, the Romans reduced Vacca, a large, opulent city, and the most celebrated mart in Numidia; defeated Jugurtha in a pitched battle; overthrew Bomilcar, one of his generals, upon the banks of the Muthullus; and, in fine, forced the Numidian monarch to take shelter in a place rendered almost inaccessible by the rocks and woods with which it was covered. However, Jugurtha signalized himself in a surprising manner, exhibiting all that could be expected from the courage, abilities, and attention of a consummate general, to whom despair administers fresh strength, and suggests new lights. But his troops could not make head against the Romans; they were again worsted by Marius, though they obliged Metellus to raise the siege of Zama. Jugurtha therefore, finding his country every-where ravaged, his most opulent cities plundered, his fortresses reduced, his towns burnt, vast numbers of his subjects put to the sword, and taken prisoners, began to think seriously of coming to an accommodation with the Romans. His favourite Bomilcar, in whom he reposed the highest confidence, but who had been gained over to the enemy by Metellus, observing this disposition, found it no difficult matter to persuade him to deliver up his elephants, money, arms, horses, and deserters, in whom the main strength of his army consisted, into the hands of the Romans. Some of these last, in order to avoid the punishment due to their crime, retired to Bocchus king of Mauritania, and listed in his service. But Metellus ordering him to repair to (N) Tifidium, a city of Numidia, there to receive farther directions, and he refusing a compliance with that order, hostilities were renewed with greater fury than ever. Fortune now seemed to declare in favour of Jugurtha: he retook Vacca, and massacred the Roman garrison, though Turpilius, the commandant, found means to make his escape. However, soon after a Roman legion seized again upon it, and treated the inhabitants with the utmost severity. About this time, one of Mastanabal's sons, named Gauda, whom Micipsa, in his will, had appointed to succeed to the crown, in case his two legitimate sons and Jugurtha died without issue, wrote to the senate in favour of Marius, who was then endeavouring to supplant Metellus; the occasion and effect of which solicitation has already been related. That prince, having his understanding impaired by a declining state of health, fell a more easy prey to the base and infamous adulation of Marius, who, after having soothed his vanity, assured him, that, as he was the next heir to the crown, he might depend upon being fixed upon the Numidian throne, as soon as Jugurtha was either killed or taken, which must in a short time happen, when he once appeared at the head of the Roman army with an unlimited commission. Soon after, Bomilcar and Nabdalsa formed a design to assassinate Jugurtha, at the (O) instigation of Metellus; but this being detected, Bomilcar, and most of his accomplices, suffered death, as our readers will find in another part of this work. The plot however had such an effect upon Jugurtha, that he enjoyed afterwards no tranquillity or repose. He suspected persons of all denominations, Numidians as well as foreigners, of some black designs against him. Perpetual terrors sat brooding over his mind; insomuch that he never got a wink of sleep, but by stealth, and often changed his bed in a low, plebeian manner. Starting from his sleep, he would frequently snatch his sword, and break out into the most doleful cries. So strongly was he haunted by a spirit of fear, jealousy, and distraction.

- Jugurtha*, having destroyed great numbers of his friends, on suspicion of their having been concerned in the late conspiracy, and many more of them deserting to the Romans and Bocchus king of Mauritania, found himself, in a manner, destitute of counsellors, generals, and all persons capable of assisting him in carrying on the war.

Overthrown a second time by him.

(N) This city seems to have been situated either upon the borders of Africa Propria, or in that province, since Metellus distributed his troops in winter-quarters there, after the conclusion of the campaign (13).

(O) Frontinus relates, that Metellus endeavoured to secure Jugurtha's person, not to assassinate him, which, he insinuates, might have been more easily effected. But as this runs counter to Sallust, who is superior, in point of authority, to Frontinus, this historical fragment deserves not much credit (14).

This

This threw him into a deep melancholy, which rendered him dissatisfied with every a thing, and made him fatigue his troops with a variety of contradictory motions. Sometimes he would advance with great celerity against the enemy, and at others retreat with no small swiftness from them. Then he resumed his former courage; but soon after despaired either of the valour or fidelity of the forces under his command. All his movements therefore proved unsuccessful, and at last he was forced by Metellus to a battle. That part of the Numidian army Jugurtha commanded, behaved with some resolution; but the other fled at the first onset. The Romans therefore intirely defeated them, took all their standards, and made a few of them prisoners. Not many of them were slain in the action, since, as Sallust observes, the Numidians trusted more to their heels than their arms for safety in this engagement *.

Metellus pursued Jugurtha and his fugitives to Thala, a place we have formerly described. His march to this place, being through vast deserts, was extremely tedious and difficult; but being supplied with wooden vessels of all sizes taken from the huts of the Numidians, which were filled with water brought by the natives, who had submitted to him, he invested that city. He had no sooner sat down before it, than a most copious shower of rain, a thing very uncommon in those deserts, proved a great and seasonable refreshment to his forces, who, animated thereby, as though the gods had declared for them, prepared to attack the town with such vigour, that Jugurtha, with his family, and treasures deposited therein, thought proper to abandon it. After a brave defence, it was reduced, the garrison, consisting of Roman c deserters, setting fire to the king's palace, and consuming themselves, together with every thing valuable to them, in the flames. Jugurtha, being now reduced to great extremities, retired into Gatulia, where he formed a considerable corps. From thence he advanced to the confines of Mauritania, and engaged Bocchus, king of that country, whose daughter he had married, to enter into an alliance with him; in consequence of which, having reinforced his Gatulian troops with a powerful body of Mauritians, he turned the tables upon Metellus, and obliged him to keep close within his intrenchments. Sallust informs us, that Jugurtha bribed Bocchus's ministers to influence that prince in his favour; and that having obtained an audience, he insinuated, that, should Numidia be subdued, Mauritania must be involved in its d ruin, especially as the Romans seemed to have vowed the destruction of all the thrones in the universe. In support of what he advanced, he produced several instances very apposite to the point in view. However, the same author seems to intimate, that Bocchus was determined to assist Jugurtha against his enemies by the slight the Romans had formerly shewn him. That prince, at the first breaking out of this war, sent ambassadors to Rome, to propose an offensive and defensive alliance to the republic; which, though of the utmost consequence to it at that juncture, a few of the most venal and infamous senators, who were abandoned to corruption, prevented from taking effect. This undoubtedly wrought more powerfully upon Bocchus in favour of Jugurtha, than the relation he stood in to him; for both the Moors and Numi- e dians adapted the number of their wives to their circumstances, so that some had ten, twenty, &c. to their share. Their kings therefore were unlimited in this particular, and of course all degrees of affinity, resulting to them from marriage, had little force. It is observable, that the posterity of those ancient nations have the same custom prevailing amongst them at this day †.

SUCH was the situation of affairs in Numidia, when Metellus received advice of the promotion of Marius to the consulate. What effect this news had upon that excellent, tho' much injured, commander, has been already observed. But, notwithstanding the injurious treatment he met with on this occasion, he generously endeavoured to draw f off Bocchus from Jugurtha, though this would facilitate the reduction of Numidia for his rival. To this end ambassadors were dispatched to the Mauritanian court, who intimated to Bocchus, " That it would be highly imprudent to come to a rupture with the Romans without any cause at all; that he had now a fine opportunity of concluding a most advantageous treaty with them, which was much preferable to a war; that, whatever dependence he might place upon his riches, he ought not to run the hazard of losing his dominions by embroiling himself with other states, when he could easily avoid this; that it was much easier to begin a war, than to end it, which it was in the power of the victor alone to do; that, in fine, he would

- a “ by no means consult the interest of his subjects, if he followed the desperate fortunes of Jugurtha.” To which Bocchus replied, “ That, for his part, there was nothing he wished for more than peace; but that he could not help pitying the deplorable condition of Jugurtha; that if the Romans therefore would grant that unfortunate prince the same terms they had offered him, he would bring about an accommodation.” Metellus let the Mauritanian monarch know, that it was not in his power to comply with what he desired. However, he took care to keep up a private negotiation with him till the new consul Marius’s arrival. By this conduct he served two wise ends; for, first, he prevented thereby Bocchus from coming to a general action with his troops; which was the very thing Jugurtha desired, as hoping that this, whatever the event might be, would render a reconciliation betwixt him and the Romans impracticable. Secondly, this inaction enabled him to discover something of the genius and disposition of the Moors, a nation, of whom the Romans, till then, had scarce formed any idea, which, he imagined, might be of no small service, either to himself or his successors, in the future prosecution of the war.

- Jugurtha*, being informed, that Marius, with a numerous army, was landed at Utica, advised Bocchus to retire, with part of the troops, to some place of difficult access, whilst he himself took post upon another inaccessible spot with the remaining corps. By this measure, he hoped the Romans would be obliged to divide their forces, and consequently be more exposed to his efforts and attacks. He likewise imagined, that, seeing no formidable body appear, they would believe the enemy in no condition to make head against them; which might occasion a relaxation of discipline, the usual attendant of a too great security, and consequently produce some good effect. However, he was disappointed in both these views; for Marius, far from suffering a relaxation of discipline to take place, trained up his troops, which consisted chiefly of new levies, in so perfect a manner, that they were soon equal in goodness to any consular army that ever appeared in the field. He also cut off great numbers of the Gatullan marauders, defeated many of Jugurtha’s parties, and had like to have taken that prince himself prisoner near the city of Cirta. These advantages, though not of any great importance, intimidated Bocchus, who now made overtures for an accommodation; but the Romans, not being sufficiently satisfied of his sincerity, gave no great attention to them. In the mean time Marius pushed on his conquests, reducing several places of less note, and at last resolved to besiege Capſa. That this enterprize might be conducted with the greater secrecy, he suffered not the least hint of his design to transpire, even amongst any of his officers. On the contrary, in order to blind them, he detached A. Manlius, one of his lieutenants, with some light-armed cohorts, to the city of Lares, where he had fixed his principal magazine, and deposited the military chest. Before the lieutenant left the camp, that he might the more effectually amuse him, he intimated, that himself, with the army, should take the same route in a few days; but, instead of that, he bent his march towards the Tanais, and, in six days time, arrived upon the banks of that river. Here he pitched his tents for a short time, in order to refresh his troops; which having done, he advanced to Capſa, and made himself master of it, in the manner we have already related. As the situation of this city rendered it extremely commodious to Jugurtha, whose plan of operations, ever since the commencement of the war, it had exceedingly favoured, he levelled it with the ground, after it had been delivered up to the soldiers to be plundered. The citizens likewise, being more strongly attached to that prince than any of the other Numidians, on account of the extraordinary privileges he indulged them with, and, of course, bearing a more implacable hatred to the Romans, he put to the sword, or sold for slaves. The true motive of the consul’s conduct on this occasion seems here to be assigned, though we are told by Sallust, in conformity to the Roman genius, that neither avarice nor resentment prompted him to so barbarous an action, but only a desire to strike a terror into the Numidians (P).

THE Numidians, ever after this exploit, dreaded the very name of Marius, who a now, in his own opinion, had eclipsed the glory of all his predecessor's great achievements, particularly the reduction of Thaba, a city, in strength and situation, nearly resembling Capfa. Following his blow, he gradually presented himself before most of the places of strength in the enemy's country, many of which either opened their gates, or were abandoned, at his approach, being terrified with what had happened to the unfortunate citizens of Capfa; others, taking by force, he laid in ashes; and, in short, filled the greatest part of Numidia with blood, horror, and confusion. The operations of the campaign were concluded by the reduction of a castle, that seemed impregnable, seated on the Mulucha, where Jugurtha kept part of his treasures (Q). In the mean time Jugurtha, not being able to prevail upon Bocchus, by b his repeated solicitations, to advance into Numidia, where he found himself greatly pressed, was obliged to have recourse to his usual method of bribing the Mauritanian ministers, in order to put that prince in motion. He also promised him a third part of his kingdom, provided they could either drive the Romans out of Africa, or get all the Numidian dominions confirmed to him by treaty^a.

They are both

So considerable a cession could not fail of engaging Bocchus to support Jugurtha with his whole power. The two (R) African monarchs therefore, having joined their forces, surprised Marius near Cirta, as he was going into winter-quarters. The Roman general was so pushed on this occasion, that the barbarians thought themselves certain of victory, and doubted not but they should be able to extinguish the Roman name c in Numidia; but their incaution and too great security enabled Marius to give them a total defeat, which was followed four days after by so complete an overthrow, that their numerous army, consisting of ninety thousand men, by the accession of a powerful corps of Moors, commanded by Bocchus's son Volux, was intirely ruined. Sylla, Marius's lieutenant, most eminently distinguished himself in the last action, which laid the foundation of his future greatness. Bocchus, now looking upon Jugurtha's condition as desperate, and not being willing to run the risk of losing his dominions, clapped up a peace with Rome. However, the republic gave him to understand, that he must not expect to be ranked amongst its friends, till he had delivered up into the consul's hands Jugurtha, that inveterate enemy of the Roman name. The Mau- d ritanian monarch, having entertained a high idea of an alliance with that state, resolved to satisfy it in this particular, and was confirmed in his resolution by one Dabar, a Numidian prince, the son of Massugrada, and descended, by his mother's side, from Masiniissa, who, being closely attached to the Romans, and extremely agreeable to Bocchus, on account of his noble disposition, had defeated all the intrigues of Aspar, Jugurtha's minister. Upon Sylla's arrival at the Mauritanian court, the affair there seemed to be intirely settled. However, Bocchus, who was for ever projecting new designs, and, like the rest of his countrymen, in the highest degree perfidious, debated within himself, whether he should sacrifice Sylla or Jugurtha, who were both then in his power. He was a long time fluctuating with uncertainty, and combated e by a contrariety of sentiments. The sudden changes, which displayed themselves in his countenance, his air, and his whole person, evidently shewed how strongly his mind was agitated; but at last he returned to his first design, to which the bias of his mind seemed naturally to lead him. He therefore delivered up Jugurtha into the hands of Sylla, to be conducted to Marius, who, by that successful event, happily ter-fore a great multitude of them were obliged to make an irruption into the country afterwards from them called Numidia, where they settled. This piece of history the same writer assures to have been extracted from some Punic books belonging to king Hiempsal. From whence it may be inferred, that what has been advanced by Herodotus concerning the irruption of the Libyan Nomades into Numidia, is probably true, since it is attested by the Punic writers themselves, though it must be owned, that where these authors contradict Herodotus, and the generality of the best historians, such a degree of credit is not due to them (15).

(Q) Notwithstanding the immense treasures Jugurtha had been in possession of, so late as some years after the death of Gala, father to Masiniissa, a great part of the Numidians, all those at least inhabiting the open country, had no gold or silver money. However, they were not very sensible of this defect, since it was supplied by their flocks and herds, as we are informed by Livy (16).

(R) Frontinus says, that Jugurtha never began a battle with the Romans till towards evening, that, if he should happen to be defeated, he might escape by favour of the night (17).

- a minated this dangerous war. The kingdom of Numidia was now reduced to a new form: Bocchus, for his important services, had the country of the Masseyli, contiguous to Mauritania, assigned him, which, from this time, took the name of New Mauritania. Numidia Propria, or the country of the Masseyli, was divided into three parts, one of which was given to Hiempsal, another to Mandrestal, both descendants of Masiniissa, and the third the Romans annexed to Africa Propria, or the Roman province, adjacent to it. What became of Jugurtha, after he had graced Marius's triumph (S), at which ceremony he was led in chains, together with his two sons, through the streets of Rome, our readers will find related at large in a former part of this work ^b.
- b Jugurtha's two sons survived him, but spent their lives in captivity at Venusia. ^{Transfusions in Numidia after the death of Jugurtha.} However, one of them, named Oxyntas, was, for a short time, released from his confinement by Aponius, who besieged Acerra in the war between the Romans and the Italian allies. That general brought this prince to his army, where he treated him as king, in order to draw the Numidian forces off from the Roman service. Accordingly those Numidians no sooner heard, that the son of their old king was fighting for the allies, than they began to desert by companies; which obliged Julius Cæsar, the consul, to part with all his Numidian cavalry, and send them back into Africa. Some few years after this event, Pompey defeated Cneus Domitius Ahenobarbus, and Hiarbas, one of the kings of Numidia, killing seventeen thousand of their men upon the spot. Not satisfied with this victory, that general pursued the fugitives to their camp, which he soon forced, put Domitius to the sword, and took Hiarbas prisoner. He then reduced that part of Numidia which belonged to Hiarbas, who seems to have succeeded Mandrestal above-mentioned, and gave it to Hiempsal, a neighbouring Numidian prince, descended from Masiniissa, who had always opposed the Marian faction. For a particular account of the treacherous reception Hiempsal, or his son Mandrestal, gave young Marius, Cetbezus, Leptorius, and others of the same party, when proscribed by Sylla, and forced to seek an asylum at his court, we must refer our readers to Plutarch and Appian ^c.
- d Suetonius informs us, that a dispute happened at Rome between Hiempsal and one Masintba, a noble Numidian, whom, it is probable, he had, in some respect, injured, when Julius Cæsar first began to make a figure in the world. This is a plain demonstration, that Numidia was, at that time, in reality, subject to the Romans, since the subjects there could then apply to the Romans for redress, even from their sovereign. The same author adds, that Cæsar warmly espoused the cause of Masintba, and even grossly insulted Juba, Hiempsal's son, when he attempted to vindicate his father's conduct on this occasion. He pulled him by the beard, than which a more unpardonable affront could not be offered an African, and reproached him with being a tributary dependent prince. In short, he screened Masintba from the insults and violence of his enemies; from whence a reason may be assigned for Juba's adhering so closely afterwards to the Pompeian faction ^d. ^{Cæsar treats Juba in a very indecent manner.}
- e In consequence of the indignity Cæsar had offered Juba, and the disposition it had occasioned, that prince did Cæsar great damage in the civil wars betwixt him and Pompey. By a stratagem he drew Curio, one of his lieutenants, to a general action, ^{Juba defeats Curio, one of Cæsar's lieutenants.}

(S) According to Plutarch, Marius's triumph happened on the first day of January, which began the year amongst the Romans, when Jugurtha was exposed to the view of the people. The populace were extremely pleased with that sight, the Numidian, by his valour and conduct, having rendered himself terrible to the Romans; nay, Florus intimates, that he was looked upon by them as a second Hannibal. Plutarch adds, that the day he was led in triumph, he fell distracted; that, when he was afterwards thrown into prison, whilst some tore off his cloaths, and others his golden pendent, with which they pulled off the tip of his ear, he was greatly discomposed; and that yet, full of horror, when he was cast naked into the dungeon, he forced a smile, crying out, O heavens! how intolerably cold is this bath of yours! In this place he struggled for some time with extreme hunger, and then expired. The barbarous death he was put to, notwithstanding his own inhuman disposition, will remain an eternal monument of the Roman cruelty and ingratitude. Mithridates therefore justly reproached the lords of the world with their infamous barbarity to the grandson of Masiniissa, a prince that contributed as much to the destruction of their only rival Carthage as either of the Africans (18).

which it was his interest at that time to have avoided. He caused it to be given out a all over Africa Propria and Numidia, that he was retired into some remote country at a great distance from the Roman territories. This coming to Curio's ears, who was then besieging Utica, it hindered him from taking the necessary precautions to prevent a surprize. Soon after, the Roman general receiving intelligence, that a small body of Numidians was approaching his camp, he put himself at the head of his forces, in order to attack them, and, for fear they should escape, began his march in the night, looking upon himself as sure of victory. Some of their advanced guards he surprised asleep, and cut them to pieces, which still further animated him. In short, about day-break he came up with the Numidians, whom he attacked with great bravery, though his men were then fasting, and vastly fatigued by their forced and precipitate march. In the mean time Juba, who, immediately after the propagation of the rumour above-mentioned, had taken care to march privately, with the main body of the Numidian army, to support the detachment sent before to decoy Curio, advanced to the relief of his men. The Romans had met with a great resistance before he appeared; so that he easily broke them, killed Curio, with a good part of his troops, upon the spot, pursued the rest to their camp, which he plundered, and took many of them prisoners. Most of the fugitives, who endeavoured to make their escape on board the ships in the port of Utica, were either slain by the pursuers, or drowned. The remainder fell into the hands of Varus, who would have saved them; but Juba, who arrogated to himself the honour of this victory, ordered them c all to be put to the sword * (T).

THIS victory infused new life and vigour into the Pompeian faction, who there-upon conferred great honours upon Juba, and gave him the title of king of all Numidia. But Caesar and his adherents declared him an enemy to the state of Rome, adjudging to Bocchus and Bogud, two African princes intirely in their interest, the sovereignty of his dominions. Juba afterwards, uniting his forces with those of Scipio, reduced Caesar to great extremities, and would, in all probability, have totally ruined him, had he not been relieved by Publius Sittius (U). That general, having to his hands, upon the walls of Utica, caused them to be pierced with darts. Though Varus did his utmost to prevent this inhuman massacre, he could not prevail. After the end of the action, Curio's head was cut off, and carried, as an agreeable present, to Juba (19).

(T) Caesar, who gives us the particulars of this action, intimates, that Sabura, Juba's general, receiving continual reinforcements from his master, who kept at a small distance from him, at last overpowered the Romans, though they behaved with great bravery; that Sabura cut off Curio's retreat, by posting some parties of his horse upon several eminences near the field of battle; that, in consequence of this, almost the whole Roman corps, commanded by Curio, was cut to pieces; and that part of the body of troops left with the quaestor Rufus to guard the camp, made their escape to Sicily. In other points, for the most part, he agrees with Dio, whom we have here chosen to follow. Appian insinuates, that this defeat happened near the banks of the Bagrada; that Juba caused a rumour to be industriously propagated, that he was returned home, to repress the courtes of some neighbouring nations, who frequently made incursions into his dominions, and had only sent Sabura, with a small body of troops, to observe the enemy. This, adds the same author, occasioned the destruction of almost two intire Roman legions, with a body of horse, velites, and slaves. Appian also relates, that, upon the news of Curio's overthrow, Flamma, the Roman admiral, fled, without taking any of the runaways on board; that many of them, with Pollio, a Roman commander, so crowded some merchant-ships, in order to make their escape on board them, that they immediately sunk, whilst others were thrown over board for the sake of the money they brought with them; and lastly, that Juba, having placed a great number of the unhappy prisoners, that fell in-

(U) Appian gives us the following account of this P. Sittius: Being accused of a certain crime at Rome, he abandoned that city before his trial came on, and assembled a body of Italians and Spaniards, with which he passed over into Africa. Upon his arrival there, he found the reguli of that country engaged in bloody wars amongst themselves. Sometimes he assisted one of these princes, and sometimes another, victory always declaring for him, whose interest he espoused. This rendered his name terrible to the Moors and Numidians, inasmuch that he easily made the scale preponderate in favour of Caesar, and was rewarded by that general, after the reduction of Africa, with a large extent of territory formerly belonging to one Manasses, a Numidian prince, who had assisted Juba. The other part of this district was given to Bocchus. Sittius settled the troops, who had distinguished themselves under his conduct, here; but was afterwards cut off by treachery. This was effected by Arabio, Manasses's son, who, after Julius Caesar's death, sent six thousand Africans to assist S. Pompeius in Spain. These Africans, returning home some time after, disciplined after the Roman manner, enabled Arabio to dispatch Sittius, and likewise to drive Bocchus out of the territory he had usurped from him (20).

- a formed a considerable corps, consisting of Roman exiles, and Mauritanian troops sent him by Bocchus, according to Dio, or, as Cæsar will have it, Bogud; made an irruption into Gætulia and Numidia, whilst Juba was employed in Africa Propria. As he ravaged these countries in a dreadful manner, Juba immediately returned with the best part of his army, to preserve them from utter destruction. However, Cæsar, knowing his horse to be afraid of the enemy's elephants, did not think proper to attack Scipio in the absence of the Numidian, till his own elephants, and a fresh reinforcement of troops, hourly expected, arrived from Italy; which accession of strength, he imagined, would enable him to give a good account, both of the Roman forces, with which he was to cope, and the barbarians. In the mean time Scipio dispatched reiterated expresses to (W) Juba to hasten to his assistance, but could not prevail upon him to move out of Numidia, till he had promised him the possession of all the Roman dominions in Africa, if they could from thence expel Cæsar. This immediately put him in motion; so that, having sent a large detachment to make head against Sittius, he marched with the rest of his troops to assist Scipio. However, Cæsar at last overthrew Scipio, Juba, and Labienus, near the town of Thapsus, and forced all their camps. As Scipio was the first surprised and defeated, Juba fled into Numidia, without waiting for Cæsar's approach; but the body of Numidians detached against Sittius, having been broken and dispersed by that general, none of his subjects there would receive him. Abandoned therefore to despair, he sought death in a single combat with Petreius, and, having killed him, caused himself to be dispatched by one of his slaves^f (X).

- After this decisive action, and the reduction of Africa Propria, Cæsar made himself master of all Numidia Propria, which he reduced to a Roman province, appointing Crispus Sallustius to govern it in quality of proconsul, with private instructions to pillage and plunder the inhabitants, and, by that means, put it out of their power ever to shake off the Roman yoke. However, Bocchus and Bogud still preserved a sort of sovereignty in the country of the Masæsyli and Mauritania, since the former of those princes, having deserted Cæsar, sent an army into Spain to assist the Pompeians; and the latter, with his forces, determined victory to declare for Cæsar at the ever memorable battle of Munda. Bogud, afterwards siding with Antony against Octavius, sent a body of forces to assist him in Spain; at which time the Tingitanians revolting from him, Bocchus, with an army composed of Romans in the interest of Octavius, who passed over from Spain into Africa, and his own subjects, possessed himself of Mauritania Tingitana. Bogud fled to Antony, and Octavius, after the conclusion of the war, honoured the inhabitants of Tingi with all the privileges of Roman citizens. He likewise confirmed Bocchus king of Mauritania Cæsariensis, or the country of the Masæsyli, in the possession of Tingitania, which he had conquered, as a reward for his important services. In this he imitated the example of his great predecessor Julius Cæsar, who divided some of the fruitful plains of Numidia among the soldiers of P. Sittius, who had conquered great part of that country, and appointed Sittius himself sovereign of that district. Sittius (Y), as has been intimated above, having taken Cirta, killed Sabura, Juba's general, intirely dispersed his forces, and either cut off, or taken prisoners, most of the Pompeian fugitives, that escaped from the battle of Thapsus, highly deserved to be distinguished in so eminent a manner. After Bocchus's death, Mauritania and the Masæsylian Numidia were, in all respects, considered as Roman provinces, according to Dio; which seems to evince, that the hostilities Bocchus committed against Carinas, whom Octavius had appointed governor of Spain, mentioned by Appian, were not attended with any bad consequences,

The history of the Mauritanians, to the intire reduction of their country by the Romans.

Description of Mauritania.

^a MAURITANIA, or, as it is called by Strabo, Maurusia, and the country of the Maurusii, was bounded on the east by the Malva or Mulucba; on the west by the Atlantic ocean; on the south by Gætulia, or Libya Interior; and on the north by the Mediterranean. This kingdom, being reduced to a Roman province in the reign of Claudius, had the name of Mauritania Tingitana given it by that prince, as we are informed by Dio. From Pliny, and some inscriptions in Gruter, it likewise appears, that it was called by the Romans at that time, as well as afterwards, simply Tingitania, from its principal city Tingi, in order to distinguish it from Mauritania Cæsariensis. If we may judge from what has been already observed of Numidia and Africa Propria, the antients were not over-accurate in their descriptions of this country. However, all their faults cannot be discovered, much less corrected, since no modern accounts of the kingdoms of Fez and Morocco, answering nearly to the Tingitania of the antients, can be intirely depended upon. All that can be done, is to make use of the best lights, that have been hitherto afforded us ^a.

Description of Mauritania.

THOUGH Tingitania, or Mauritania Tingitana, then was considerably broader than Mauritania Cæsariensis, the corresponding parts of mount Atlas, or the confines of Gætulia, lying more to the southward, yet Pliny and Martianus, according to the latest observations, exceed the truth, when they affirm the greatest breadth of the Mauritania to be four hundred and sixty-seven, or four hundred and seventy-three miles. The length of this region we may make a tolerable estimate of, by observing, that the Malva or Mullooïab, its eastern limit, about 1° 15' W. of London, is something above two hundred and forty miles distant from the Atlantic ocean. Some of the modern geographers make the kingdom of Fez to be two hundred and seventy miles long, and that of Morocco, from cape Non to the mountains which divide it from Segetmeffa, above three hundred and seventy; but this computation, with respect to the ancient Tingitania, is undoubtedly more erroneous than that of Pliny, which amounts only to an hundred and seventy miles. The longitude and latitude of the southern limits of Tingitania cannot be ascertained, for want of a proper light from the old geographers; but Septa, the present Ceuta, its most advanced city to the northward, is about 35° 58' N. latitude, and about 6° W. longitude from London. The ^c Al-Magreb Al-Achsa of Abulfeda includes the Maurusia of Strabo, or the country we are now upon, and part of Mauritania Cæsariensis, as it extends from the Atlantic ocean, which he calls the sea Almobit, to Tlemsan. We must not omit observing, that Ptolemy places the Atlas Major, his southern boundary of this kingdom, at a vast distance from the southern limits assigned it by Pliny, in the deserts of Gætulia or Libya Interior. But it appears, from what has been already advanced, as well as the best relations of modern travellers, that this ridge of mountains, if real, could not have appertained to Tingitania ^b.

Whence so called.

Mauritania and Maurusia are names of this region derived from the Mauri, an ^a ancient people inhabiting it, frequently mentioned by the old historians and geographers. Authors are not agreed amongst themselves about the origin of this word. Sallust affirms it to be a corruption of the word Medi; but this is by no means probable. Dr. Hyde deduces it from מעברי Mabri or Mav'ri, one that lies near the passage, as he thinks the streights of Hercules might properly enough be called. Isidorus Hispalensis and Manilius think the name ought to be derived from the black, dark, swarthy colour of the people to which it was applied; but none of these etymons seem so easy and natural as that of Bochart, who makes Maurus to be equivalent to מאור Maur; or, as an elision of gutturals in the oriental languages is extremely common, Maur, i. e. one from the west, or a western person, since Mauritania was west of Carthage and Phœnice. However, in our opinion, it would sound better still, should we say, one that comes from the end, or utmost limit, of Africa, or the boundary of our voyages, as both the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, for several ages, might have said of the Tingitanians; for the streights or pillars of Hercules limited the western voyages of those nations for a considerable period of time, as is evident from a variety of the best authors. It is not improbable, that this country, or at least a good part of it, was first called Pbut, since it appears from Pliny, Ptolemy, and St. Jerom, that a river and territory not far from mount Atlas went by that name. From the Jerusalem Targum it likewise appears, that part of the Mauri may be deemed the offspring of Lud the son of Misraim, since his descendants, mentioned ^c Gen. x. are there called מריסאי Mauri or Mauritani. We have already evinced, that this region, as well as the others to the east of it, had many colonies planted in it by the Phœnicians. Procopius tells us, that, in his time, two pillars of white stone were to be seen there, with the following inscription in the Phœnician language and character upon them: We are the Canaanites, that fled from Joshua the son of Nun, that notorious robber. Ibnu Rachib, or Ibnu Raquiq, an African writer cited by Leo, together with Evagrius and Nicephorus Callistus, asserts the same thing. How, in after-ages, that vast tract, extending from the borders of Egypt to the Atlantic ocean, came to be called Barbary, our readers will be informed in another place ^c.

THE Mauritanians, according to Ptolemy, were divided into several cantons or ^d tribes. The Metagonitæ were seated near the streights of Hercules. The Succosii, or Cocosii, according to *Berti*us, took up the coast of the Iberian sea. Under these two petty nations, the Masices, Vernes, and Verbicæ or Vervicæ, settled themselves. The Salisæ or Salinsæ were situated lower, towards the ocean; and still more to the south the Volubiliani. The Maurensii and Herpiditani possessed the eastern part of this country, which was terminated by the Mulucha. The Angaucani or Iangaucani, Nestiberes, Zagrensii, Baniubæ, and Vacuatæ, extended themselves from the southern foot of Ptolemy's Atlas Minor to his Atlas Major; which is all that he has intimated of them. Pliny mentions the Baniuræ, whom father Hardouin takes to be Ptolemy's Baniubæ; and Mela the Atlantes, whom he represents as possessed of the western ^e parts of this region. The names of the different clans of Numidians we have postponed, till we come to the history of the Gutulians, since the latter nation was so intermixed with the former towards the Roman times, that it is difficult to determine to which of them some clans belong ^d.

Tingis.

Tingis or Tingi, the metropolis, as should seem, of Tingitania, was a city of great antiquity. According to Mela, Solinus, and Pliny, Antæus, cotemporary with Hercules, and conquered by him, laid the first foundations of it. Procopius seems to intimate, that Tingi was built before the time of Joshua, since he tells us, that the Gergesites, Jebusites, and other Canaanitish nations or tribes, erected a castle in a city, where Tingis, or, as he calls it, Tigisis, stood. Dr. Hyde therefore is mistaken, when ^f he affirms Procopius to have asserted, that the Gergesites, Jebusites, &c. were the founders of Tingis. Pliny insinuates Antæus to have had a palace at Lixus or Lixos, though he tells us, that the giant was buried at Tingis. This seems likewise confirmed

- a by Plutarch, who adds, that his sepulchre was still remaining there in the time of Sertorius, who, paying no regard to the tradition that prevailed amongst the inhabitants, caused it to be opened, and took out of it a corpse sixty cubits long. Bochart thinks, that the Phœnicians and Carthaginians called it Tingir, Tiggir, Tagger, &c. which, in their language, signified an emporium: and it must be owned, that the situation of Tingis was extremely commodious for carrying on a general trade; which we may, from this circumstance, reasonably presume the Tingitanians did, especially as Pliny seems to insinuate, that to some branches of commerce they actually applied themselves. Bochart's notion therefore receives some weight from these considerations, as also from the modern name of this city, Tangier, which we cannot help believing to have been of Phœnician extraction. If we suppose the antient Tingis to have occupied the spot on which Tangier at present stands, it was very near the streights of Hercules, at the bottom of a gulf of the western shore. We are informed by Mela, Pliny, and Strabo, that the Romans drew a colony from this place into the neighbourhood of Carteia, a town on the other side the streights; on which account Pliny absurdly calls it Julia Traducta, that name being properly applicable to the colony deduced from thence to Spain, to which Strabo gives the appellation of Julia Joza, of the same import with the former, Joza, in Syriac, Chaldee, Arabic, and Phœnician, being equivalent to the Latin Traducta. We find it likewise named by Ptolemy and Marcianus simply Transducta. Some writers will have Ptolemy to have called Tingis Cæsarea; but this is a controverted point. However, that geographer seems to have looked upon Tingis as the most noted and usual proper name of the city we are now upon. Tangier, supposed to be the antient Tingis, is in 6° 30' W. longitude from London, and in N. latitude 35° 56' ^d.
- c

Zelis or Zilis, a maritime city in the neighbourhood of Tingis, situated near a river Zelis of the same name. The inhabitants of this city were transported to Spain, as we learn from Strabo, and a colony of Romans or Italians transplanted thither, as should seem, in their room, according to Pliny. The kings of Mauritania, after the planting of that colony, exercised no jurisdiction over Zelis, it being under the dominion of the Roman governor of Spain. Some authors imagine, that the modern Arzilla answers to Zelis; which if we admit, it stood about seventy miles from the streights of Hercules. Marmol says, that Arzilla was built by the Romans; but this we must not give credit to, if it should be thought proper to countenance the aforesaid supposition; for if Zelis did not owe its origin to the Indigene of this country, it was undoubtedly of Phœnician extraction ^e.

- Lixus* or Lixos seems to have been a place of considerable repute in the earliest ages, Lixus. since, according to Pliny, Antæus had a palace, and therefore probably resided here. This circumstance renders it likely, that Lixus was superior to Tingis itself in point of antiquity. But some authors seem to have confounded these two cities, as we shall find, by comparing the names given the former by Artemidorus, Eratosthenes, and Strabo, with Pliny. However, we are inclined to prefer the authority of Eratosthenes to that of the others in this point, since it is supported by Pliny. Lixus therefore and Tingis, in consequence of this preference, we must look upon as two different cities. Pliny relates, that Hercules vanquished Antæus near this place, which he makes to have been in the neighbourhood of the gardens of the Hesperides, and thirty-two miles distant from Zelis. The same author intimates, that a Roman colony was settled here likewise by Claudius. As Lixus was called by different writers Linx, Linga, Tinga, Tingi, in all probability it was mistaken by some ancient historians or geographers for Tingis; and therefore Pliny might be imposed upon by some of the authors he extracted his materials from, when he affirmed Antæus to have had his royal palace at Lixos, since it is more natural to suppose, that he resided at Tingis. The learned Aldrete asserts the word Lixus to be derived from לחישו lachifu, or נחבא לחישו nabara lachifu, incantation, or the river of incantation. In support of this sentiment he observes, with the antients, that the town stood near the banks of a river of the same name; and that such wonderful things had been related of Antæus, as well as his tomb, by various authors, that, to all those who believed them, he must appear as a magician. ^a Bochart derives it from wh a lion, because such animals were common in Mauritania. But it may be further observed in favour (A) of Aldrete, that the inhabitants of this country were supposed to have an uncommon skill in forcery and magic, as appears not only from Virgil and Silius, but likewise from what we find related of Sidius Geta by Dio. The river Lixus is mentioned both in the periplus of Hanno, and that of Scylax, as also by Ptolemy and Stephanus. Pliny seems to turn this river into an æstuary, which, by its winding course, he makes to resemble a dragon or serpent, intimating that it gave rise to the fable of the dragon guarding the golden apples of the Hesperides. Some learned men will have the present Larache to be the ancient Lixus; and it must be owned, that the situation of that place gives great countenance ^b to such a supposition ^f.

Thymaterion. AT some distance from Lixus, to the southward, Hanno, in his periplus, says he built a city, which he called Thymiatæron. In Scylax the name is Thymiatærias; and in Stephanus, Thymiatæria. Bochart believes the Punic name to have been דומאטבריא Dumatbiria, i. e. a city situated in a plain. Hanno himself justifies this etymology, as the reader will find, by consulting his periplus; for which reason he will not scruple giving his assent to it. Though this city was situated on the sea-coast, somewhere to the south of Lixus, the spot, on which it stood, cannot now be precisely determined ^g.

Sala. Pliny mentions Sala, a town near a river of the same name, not far from the ^c Atlantic ocean, at a considerable distance from Lixus. All that he observes of this town is, that the district adjacent to it was desert, infested with vast herds of elephants, and the excursions of the Autololes, a tribe of Gætulians. The situation, as well as name of, this place, sufficiently indicates it to be the modern Sallee, a city famous for its corsairs, who sometimes commit great depredations in the Mediterranean ^h.

Rutubis. THE port of Rutubis, where, it is probable, a town stood, was two hundred and thirteen miles south of Lixus. At some distance from this were the Mons Solis, the port of Myfocaras, the promontories of Hercules and Usadium, and the frontiers of the Autololes. These frontiers terminated Mauritania to the south; and Ptolemy has ^d undoubtedly carried them much farther in that direction, than is consistent with truth. As for Tamusiga, Suriga, and other obscure places mentioned by that geographer, extending still farther to the south, it is sufficient just to have taken notice of them. Thus much for the principal maritim towns of Tingitania, bordering on the coast of the Atlantic ocean ⁱ.

Exiliffi. THE first maritim town to the eastward of Tingis, seems to be the Exiliffa of Ptolemy. Marmol takes the Ceuta of the moderns to correspond with this place, as it does likewise, in all probability, with the Septa and Arx Septensis of Procopius. That author, together with Isidorus Hispalensis, and others, insinuates this name to have been derived from the seven hills, called the Septem Fratres by Mela, in its neighbour- ^e hood. Exiliffa, Septa, or Ceuta, was a place of great note and eminence in the time of the Goths, as we shall see, when we come to the history of that nation ^h.

Rusadir. Rusadir, a city and haven, taken notice of by Pliny, not far from the country of the Masæfyli. Ptolemy calls it Ryffadirum; and, from the itinerary, there seems to have been a Roman colony settled in it. Some authors will have Melila or Melilla, lately in the possession of the Spaniards, to be the Rusadir or Ryffadirum of the anti- ents. If so, it stood upon a plain at the bottom of a gulf, and was commanded by a mountain on the west side ⁱ.

(A) In order to strengthen this conjecture, Aldrete observes, that the word Tingin, in Arabic, approaches pretty near the signification of Lixus; an observation, which, we believe, has escaped all other writers (1).

1) Vide Aldret. in loc. citat.

- a THE first inland town, meriting any attention, near the frontiers of the Masæyli, Ascurum. was the Ascurum of Hirtius. According to that author, this place was of some consequence, since Bogud, king of Mauritania Tingitana, had a strong garrison in it, which falling out upon a body of the Pompeians, repulsed them with great slaughter, driving many of them into the sea, and the rest on board their ships. No traces of this city, as far as we can recollect, are now remaining ^m.

Molochath, or Mulucha, and Galapha, which Ptolemy places in Tingitania, must belong to Numidia, if the (B) Molochath, Mulucha, and Malva, be the same river, as Dr. Shaw has rendered probable; and therefore we shall say nothing more of them here ⁿ.

- b Herpis, a town upon the Mauritanian bank of the Mulucha, lying at a considerable distance from the city Molochath in a northern direction. As to any further particulars of this place, we are intirely in the dark ^o.

Mela ranks Volubilis, Gilda, and Prisciana, amongst the principal inland towns of Tingitania. Ptolemy says, that Volubilis was one of the most noted places of this country; and the itinerary makes it a Roman colony. From various authors it appears to be the Fez of the moderns. Gilda is taken notice of likewise by Stephanus, as a city of good repute. They were all situated in the heart of the country; but the spots of ground, occupied by them, cannot, with precision, be ascertained. However, Marmol asserts, that Mequinez answers to Gilda, which he corruptly calls

- c Silda ^p.

A little to the south of Volubilis stood the Tocolosida of Ptolemy. According to Marmol, Amergue, a city three leagues from the river Eguile, in the province of Habat, answers to the ancient Tocolosida; but, as that author is very inaccurate, we cannot, in this particular, intirely depend upon him ^q.

THE Trifidis of Ptolemy, according to that geographer, could not be far from the neighbourhood of Tocolosida. Marmol says, that it was built by the Romans, which we can scarce believe, upon a rising ground. The same author intimates, that Aben Gezer, in his geography, will have it to have been built by the giants, some of whose bones, of an enormous size, he asserts to have been taken out of several ancient

- d tombs in his time.

Gontiana stands south-west of Tocolosida, near the river Sala, and not far from mount Atlas. Marmol informs us, that a small town, by the Moors called Gamaa, upon the road between Fez and Mequinez, is the ancient Gontiana; as likewise, that this place, though strong by nature, has, for some time, been almost intirely depopulated and demolished ^r.

Banasa, Banassa, or Banasa Valentia, was seated in the neighbourhood of the river Subur, at a very considerable distance, in a northern direction, from Gontiana. Pliny seems to intimate, that Banasa was seventy-five miles from Lixus, thirty-five from Volubilis, and as many from the Atlantic ocean. That author, in the same place, says, that Babba, which Ptolemy calls Babba Julia Campestris, was an inland town, forty miles from Lixus; and that Augustus planted a Roman colony there. This likewise the curious may find confirmed by the legends on some antique coins exhibited by Goltzius ^s.

Chalce or Chalca, a city of Mauritania Tingitana, mentioned by Scylax and Hecataeus; but in what part of that region we are to look for it, cannot now be determined. Ptolemy takes notice of a town called Carcome or Carcoma; which Bochart will have to be the Chalce of Scylax and Hecataeus, since those two words are of the same import in the Syriac and Greek languages. They signify brass or copper; ius, in conformity to the old geographers, it seems probable, that Galapha was south-east of Mulucha; and therefore, that what has been observed of the former, holds more strongly with regard to the latter (1).

(B) This appears from Florus and Frontinus, who affirm the fortress of Mulucha to have been in Jugurtha's dominions, and consequently in Numidia, Sallust likewise confirms this, when he gives us an account of the siege and reduction of that place by the Romans in the Jugurthine war. From Cellar

which seems to intimate, that this place was near some copper-mine, from whence it deduced its name: and that there was a famous copper-mine in Tingitania, appears from Strabo. Ptolemy makes his Carcoma to be not very remote from Jol, or Julia Cæsarea, but betwixt it and Gades. However, the inaccuracy of that geographer in many points, will not permit us to infer from thence, that this place, which he asserts to be a maritim city, is to be sought for in Mauritania Cæsariensis. On the contrary, we can scarce doubt of its having appertained to Tingitania, from what we find advanced by Strabo. To what has been said we may add, that Polybius censures Polybistor, for affirming Chalcea to be the proper name of a Libyan city, since, according to him, the copper-mine above-mentioned only was so called¹.

Calamintha. Calamintha, a town of Libya, probably of Mauritania, taken notice of by Herodotus and Hecataeus, whose situation is unknown. However, Bochart has ventured to assert, that it stood on an eminence or rising-ground. This notion has been suggested to him by the word itself; for he looks upon Calamintha to be equivalent to the Syriac or Phœnician גלמית galmûtha, an eminence, or a city built upon an eminence. From hence he likewise infers, that it must have been of a Phœnician original².

Marmol's inaccuracy. We must here beg leave to inform our readers, that Marmol has discovered his inaccuracy, not to say ignorance, in many particulars; for he has either corrupted several of Ptolemy's names of cities, or assigned names, pretended to be taken from Ptolemy, to several places, that are not to be found in his geography, as will appear to every one, who will be at the trouble to compare these two authors. His comparative geography is likewise frequently not to be relied upon; for which reason we have made but few extracts from him. As for Vobrix, Tbicath, Ceuta, and many more inconsiderable towns mentioned by the ancient geographers, which are scarce ever taken notice of in history, may, all traces of which are, in a manner, lost, we have thought proper to pass them over in silence; neither are we apprehensive, that, for this, it will be deemed necessary to make any apology³.

Rivers of Tingitania. THE first river of Tingitania, if it does not appertain to Numidia, is the Malva, Malvana, Chylemath, Molochath, or Mulucha; for it went by all these names. That these names denoted the same river, will appear from a careful examination of what the old geographers have advanced on this head. Mela, Pliny, and Ptolemy, give the same situation to the Chylemath and Mulucha, making it the common boundary of Numidia and Tingitania. Strabo also affirms his Molochath to separate the country of the Masæyli, i. e. Numidia, from Mauritania, i. e. Tingitania; and lastly, the author of the itinerary, who was cotemporary with Ptolemy, positively asserts, that the Malva, or Malvana, limited the two Mauritanias, i. e. Tingitania, and that part of Numidia joining to it. From whence, as it does not appear from history, that the limits of those two kingdoms were ever changed, but, on the contrary, probable that they never were, we may fairly infer, that the above-mentioned variety of names points out one and the same river, the Mullooïab of the present western Moors. 2. The next river, meriting any attention, is the Tbaluda, Tatuda, or Tamuda of Mela, Pliny, and Ptolemy, which emptied itself into the Mediterranean considerably nearer the streights than the former. Pliny represents this as navigable, and consequently as a considerable river. The different names given it by different geographers, seem to countenance what we have just offered in relation to the Mulucha (C). 3. The river Zelis or Zilia, near the city of the same name, already mentioned. 4. The Lixus, already taken notice of, when we gave some account of the city so called. Scylax, in his periplus, mentions a river not far from the Lixus, but betwixt

(C) Ptolemy's Vallona discharged itself into the sea not far from the narrowest part of the streights of Gibraltar, near the place where the town Alcazar Saguir, as Marmol calls it, or, according to Moll, Alcazar Quivir, i. e. the great palace, at present stands. It appears to us not improbable, that the present rivers Sabon, Gueron, Ommirabib, and Sus, answer to the Subur, Sala, Duns, and Cusa, of Ptolemy. Our readers may possibly be of the same opinion, when they have diligently examined Ptolemy's geographical description of that part of Mauritania contiguous to the Atlantic ocean, and maturely weighed what has been advanced in a former note (3).

a it and the streights, which, Salmasius thinks, ought to be called Adonis; but as to its course, or indeed any particulars at all relating to it, we are intirely in the dark. 5. The Subur, a large and navigable river, fifty miles from the Lixus. It passed by the city of Banaja, as has been lately observed. 6. The Sala, which took its course, according to Pliny, near the confines of the Sabara. 7. The Duus, Cafa, Ajama, Phibuth, and other rivers either in, or upon the borders of Libya Interior (D), recited by Pliny, Ptolemy, &c. are intirely unknown to us, as indeed they were to those geographers themselves * (E).

THE chief capes or promontories of Tingitania were the following: 1. The Me- Promontories.
tagonitis of Ptolemy, and the Metagonium of Strabo. This promontory, Marmol tells b us, in his time was called cape Cajafa, having a town of the same name built upon it. Strabo intimates, that a considerable extent of territory, whose soil was of a dry and sandy nature, in the neighbourhood of this promontory, went by the same name amongst the Mauritanians. This was different from the Terra Metagonitis of Pliny, and the Metagonium of Mela, near the mouth of the Ampaga. For their farther satisfaction on this head, we must refer our curious readers to the learned Lucas Holstenius, who has favoured the world with a particular account of both the Metagonia, in his notes upon Ortelius. 2. The Sestiarium promontorium of Ptolemy, or the Ruffadi of the Iti- nerary. 3. The promontorium Oleastrum, so called, according to some, from the prodigious number of wild olives growing upon it. 4. The Phæbi promontorium.
c 5. The cape Cotes, Cottes, or Ampelusia, not far from Tingis, taken notice of by Mela, Ptolemy, and Strabo. The moderns call it cape Spartel. From Mela and Bochart it appears, that Cotes and Ampelusia were words of the same import in the Phœnician and Greek languages; and that they were deduced from the grapes the promontory abounded with. 6. Mons Solis, Promontorium Herculis, and Ufadium, of which Pto- lemy has handed down to us nothing but the bare names †.

AMONGST the principal mountains of Mauritania Tingitana we are to rank, 1. Mountains.
Abyle, Abyla, Abila, Abina, Abinna, or Abenna, for such a variety of names it had, a mountain on the African side of the streights of Hercules, called, by the antients, one of Hercules's pillars. Abinna and Abenna seem to have been names given it by d the Arabs, and the others it received from the Phœnicians. They were all derived from its height, as has been clearly evinced by Aldrete and Bochart. It has been mentioned by Strabo, Mela, Ptolemy, Silius Italicus, Ammianus Marcellinus, Festus Aven- nus, and others. If we are not mistaken, it is now called, by our countrymen, Apes

(D) To these may be added, from Ptolemy, 1. Mount Diur, which might possibly have been near the river of the same name. 2. Mount Phocra, extending from the Atlas Minor to Rufadir, between the promontories Metagonitis and Sestiarium. The modern name of this mountain, or rather ridge of mountains, is Jibbel el Hadith, i. e. the mountain of iron, according to Ortelius. 3. The Dardus, already mentioned in the history of Numidia (4).

(E) That Ptolemy knew little of the geography of this part of Mauritania, is generally acknowledged; but will most evidently appear from several circumstances, which we shall beg leave to throw together here: 1. Darod, or Darodus, is evidently the same name with Dorath, which Ptolemy makes to be the name of a town upon the Diur; as therefore that river, which is the southern limit of the kingdom of Sus, is at this day called Darod, or Darodus, by the Moors, it must be allowed, that Ptolemy's Dorath, not far from the borders of Gatulia, was a river, and probably that which he calls Diur. 2. As this was the southern limit of the country we are now upon, supposing it to extend as far to the southward as even the present kingdom of Sus does, the river Phibuth must be to the north of it, and not to the south, as Ptolemy asserts; agreeably hereto, Marmol makes Ten- ssi, the next river to the Darodus, in a northerly situation, to be the Phibuth of Ptolemy. 3. As the mouth of the Dardus lies in about twenty-eight degrees north latitude, about four degrees and a half from the tropic of Cancer, it must have been in nearly the same latitude with Ptolemy's Promontorium Ufadium, and, consequently, much farther to the southward than he extends the Diur. 4. Even the Promontorium Ufadium, the Mons Solis, Portus Mylocaras, Portus Herculis, Tamusga, and all the other places he has fixed to the south of the Diur, either are to be placed to the northward of it, or else, in ancient times, belonged to Libya Interior, and not Tingitania. 5. From Marmol, Gramaye, and some of the most accurate modern observations, it appears, that the towns of Swiga and Vala, rivers Una, Agua, Sala, &c. to which Ptolemy assigns a southern situation, in respect of the Diur, or Darodus, are really north of it.

Some of our readers may possibly imagine, that Ptolemy's Daradas, or Daras, which he places in about fifteen degrees north latitude, was the same river as the modern Darod, or Darodus, which in Mr. Senex's map of Africa is likewise called Dras. But admitting this supposition, Ptolemy will be out in the parallel he assigns it about thirteen degrees; which is a greater error than any of the preceding (5).

Hill; an appellation which very well agrees with what has been related of it by the ^a antients, or, at least, the country adjacent to it. 2. The Septem Fratres of Mela, and the Heptadelpbi of Ptolemy, almost contiguous to Abyla. 3. Mount Cotta, not far from the Lixus. 4. That remarkable chain of hills called mount Atlas, which, according to Orosius, separated the fruitful land from the barren, or, in the style of the natives, the Tell from the Sabara. The antients likewise inform us, that these mountains were known by the names Dyris, Adyris, Dyrim, and Adderim, i. e. great, high, lofty, or the Southern limit, as mount Atlas is generally esteemed to be with respect to Tingitania and Numidia. However, Dr. Shaw assures us, that the part of this long-continued ridge of mountains, which fell under his observation, in height could not stand in competition either with the Alps or Apennines. He tells us, ^b that if we conceive a number of hills, usually of the perpendicular height of four, five, or six hundred yards, with an easy ascent, and several groves of fruit and forest-trees, rising up in a succession of ranges one behind another; and that if to this prospect we here-and-there add a rocky precipice of a superior eminence, and difficult access, and place upon the side or summit of it a mud-walled Dashkrab, or village of the Kabyles; we shall then have a just and lively idea of these mountains, without paying any regard to the nocturnal flames, melodious sounds, or the lascivious revels, of such imaginary beings, as the antients have, in a peculiar manner, attributed to this place ^c.

Ports.

THE chief ports of this country were, 1. The Rusadir of Pliny, or Ryffadirum ^c of Ptolemy already mentioned. The Itinerary makes the town here a Roman colony, and tells us, that the neighbouring promontory was from thence denominated cape Ruffadi. 2. That at the bottom of the Sinus Emporicus, where there seems to have been a town furnished with inns, warehouses, and all manner of accommodations for the Phœnician merchants, who frequented this place from almost the earliest ages to the time of Augustus. Pliny calls the bay the Sinus Saguti, which Bochart would willingly have read Sinus Saguri; since that lesson would enable him to deduce the word from סגור, sachur, mercator, the n being frequently, amongst the *Oriental*s, pronounced as the s, of which he produces some instances, and consequently to assign it the same signification as Emporicus. 3. Cotes, Cottes, or Cotta, a port or bay mentioned by Scylax, which may possibly have been in the neighbourhood of cape ^d Cotta above-mentioned; and if so, that author has not given it a right situation, since he places it between cape Mercury and the streights of Hercules. 4. Rusibis, or Rutubis, an harbour taken notice of by Pliny and Ptolemy, in the south-western part of Mauritania, between the rivers Cusa and Diur. 5. Mysocaras, a port some miles to the south of Rusibis, not far from the river Phibuth. This was the last southern port of Mauritania, mentioned by the antients, being almost contiguous to the northern confines of Gatulia ^a.

Islands.

WE shall now proceed to the principal islands, on the coast of Tingitania, which were known to the old geographers: 1. The Tres Insulæ of the Itinerary already mentioned, where there is now good shelter for small vessels, were situated to the ^e north-west of the Mulucha, at the distance of ten miles. 2. Gezira, or rather Jezzeirab, a small island in the river Lixus, about three leagues, according to Marmol and Leo, from the sea, and thirty from the city of Fez. Pliny tells us, that in his time this island abounded with olives; and intimates, that the antients placed the gardens of the Hesperides here. He farther relates, that there was an altar, sacred to Hercules, still remaining in it when he wrote. Aldrete believes, that this island, by the frequent inundations of the river, was, in process of time, laid intirely under water, and at last converted into that lake called, by the Spaniards, Laguna grande, or the great lake, a little above the city and harbour of Larache. 3. Ptolemy's Pana and Erythia (F), two small obscure islands in the Atlantic ocean, opposite to the a tract between his Major and Minor Atlas. 4. The Insulæ Purpurariæ, which Pliny assures us faced the country of the Autololes. The natives of these islands were famous for dying that colour called the Gætulian purple, which brought great advantage to king Juba, who, according to the same author, first discovered them. Father Hardouin asserts, that they are the islands called at this day Madera (G) and Porto Santo, being induced thereto by Pliny, who places them betwixt the Streights and the Fortunate Islands. 5. The Insulæ Beatæ (H), or Fortunatæ, of Statius Sebojus, Juba, Pliny, and Strabo. Ptolemy gives these islands too southern a situation, affirming them to lie on the coast of Libya Interior, whereas they are in the same parallel with the

(G) Madera, or, as the Spaniards call it, Madeira, is an island of the Atlantic ocean, betwixt thirty-two and thirty-three deg. north lat. about sixty miles broad, seventy-five long, and an hundred and eighty in circumference. Though it seems to have been known to the antients, yet it lay concealed for many generations; and was at last discovered by the Portuguese, commanded by Don Juan Zurco, and Don Tristano Vaz, A. D. 1419. Others maintain, that one John Machin, an Englishman, discovered it in the year of our Lord 1344. Be that as it will, the Portuguese took possession of it in the year above-mentioned, and are still almost the only nation inhabiting it. The modern name Madera, or Madeira, was derived from the vast store of wood with which it was stocked; the Portuguese, at their first landing, finding it little better than a thick forest. In order therefore to render the ground capable of cultivation, they set fire to this wood, which, according to their writers, occasioned a conflagration of seven years continuance. It is now very fertile, producing, in great abundance, the richest wine, sugar, the most delicious fruits, especially oranges, lemons, and pomegranates, together with corn, honey, and wax. It also abounds with boars and other wild beasts, as likewise with all sorts of fowls, besides numerous groves of cedar-trees. The air of Madera is more temperate than that of the Canaries; and consequently its condition cannot be inferior to that of any of those islands. The towns are Monchico, Santa Croce, and Funchal, its metropolis, so called from the prodigious quantity of feniel at first found growing in its neighbourhood. It is now the see of a bishop, who is suffragan to the archbishop of Lisbon; and the seat of a Portuguese governor. Notwithstanding father Hardouin's opinion, some authors make it the Cerne, or Cerne Atlantica, of the antients. If this be admitted, it was famous for the production of those hawks so well known in Maffylia, according to Pliny. As that author places this Cerne in the Atlantic ocean, and from the circumstance just mentioned it appears to have been not remote from Maffylia, such a sentiment cannot well be deemed intirely groundless. Whichever of these notions we espouse, Madera seems formerly to have appertained to Mauritania.

Porto Santo lies at a small distance from Madera, and is under the jurisdiction of the same bishop and governor as Madera. It is only eight miles in compass; but the soil is extremely fruitful. 'Tis remarkable, that this island produces the best honey and wax in the world.

Besides the two aforesaid islands, there is another, called by the Spaniards Isla Desierta, i. e. the desolate island, seven miles distant from the eastern coast of Madera. But this being inconsiderable, on account of the sterility of its soil, and its small extent, it is sufficient just to have mentioned it (7).

(H) The Fortunate Islands, or, as they are at present called, the Canary Islands, are seven in number. They lie to the southward of Madera, west of the southern coast of Mauritania, and betwixt twenty-seven and thirty degrees north lat. Their names are Palma, Hierro, Gomera, Teneriffe, Gran Canaria, Fuerteventura, and Lanzarote. Palma and Hierro lie most to the west. Their soil is rich; they have good pasture-ground, produce excellent wine, sugar, &c. and abound in fruit. They have each of them a town of the same name. The first is seven leagues long, six broad, and twenty-two in circumference; the latter ten leagues long, seven broad, and twenty-six round. Hierro has a commodious haven; and Palma a volcano that emits vast quantities of sulphureous matter, as we learn from Juan Nunez de Pena. On the western point of Hierro most modern geographers place the first meridian. Gomera, situated to the south of Palma, is very fruitful, affording plenty of grain, apples, sugar, and wine, with pastures for numerous herds of cattle. It takes up twenty-two leagues in compass, and has a considerable town of the same name, besides a very capacious harbour. Teneriffe, to the east of Hierro, is said to be sixty miles long. In it there is a famous mountain, called the Pico of Teneriffe, frequently covered with snow; which renders it probable, that this island was Pliny's Nivaria, and Ptolemy's Ninguaria. The Pico is an ascent of about fifteen miles, and five in perpendicular height. We are told, that when these islands were discovered by M. Jean de Betancourt, a French gentleman, for Don Juan king of Castile, in 1405, the inhabitants of Teneriffe were under several kings, who lived in caves; and that they kept the bodies of their ancestors dried like mummies. The towns in it are, St. Christopher de la Laguna, Santa Cruz, Rosava, or Oratava, Rialejo, and Garachico. Canaria, or Gran Canaria, had the same name amongst the antients, as we learn from Pliny; so that 'tis probable it was not given by the Spaniards, as some writers suggest; as likewise, that some knowledge of it has been retained all along from the Roman times, since the name assigned it by the Romans has been preserved to the present times. It is eleven leagues broad, twelve long, thirty-eight in compass, and about thirty from cape Bofador. Its situation is east of Teneriffe, and its capital city Palma, Palmas, or Canaria. In fertility it equals, at least, if it does not exceed, any of the others. Fuerteventura is east of Gran Canaria, and about twenty-five leagues from the continent of Africa. 'Tis likewise fruitful, and has four towns, Tarafala, Lanagala, Pozo Negro, and Fuerteventura. Lanzarote, north of the former, and in all points answering to the rest, has three towns, Cayas or Lanzarote, Puerto de Naos, and Puerto de Cavallos. Though the seven are the principal islands that go under the name of the Canaries, yet there are several others in their neighbourhood of less note; as the Isla de los Lobos, situated between Fuerteventura and Lanzarote; the Salvatica lying farther towards the north-west; besides Rocca, Gratiola, Santa Clara, and Alagranza, on the north of Lanzarote. They are all subject to the king of Spain; and Canaria is the see of a bishop, subject to the metropolitan of Se-

the southern part of Mauritania, according to Strabo (1) ; which seems to tally with ^a the best modern accounts and observations. The antients did not agree in fixing the number of these islands ; Marcellus made them ten ; seven of which he affirms to have been sacred to Proserpina, and the other three to Pluto, Ammon, and Nep- tune. Pliny and Ptolemy, from Juba, relate, that there were six of them ; and Sebosus, as well as Plutarch, only two. One of them Pliny and Ptolemy call Ombros, Ombrios, and Pluvialia ; the former author, two others Junonia ; the latter, Junonia, and the inaccessible island. The other three Pliny and Ptolemy, according to Isaac Vossius, named Capraria, Canaria, and Ninguaria, or Nivaria. Ombrios was uninhabited, and desti- tute of water at all times, but when it rained ; from which circumstance it derived its name. This island produced a sort of canes, some of which were black, and others ^b white ; out of the former the Mauritanians expressed a liquor of a bitter taste ; and out of the latter a pleasant kind of drink. In one of the Junonia's there was a small temple, built of stone. Capraria abounded with monstrous lizards. Nivaria was always covered with snow ; and Canaria over-run with dogs of an enormous size, two of which were presented to king Juba. From hence they had their names assigned them. They all abounded with apples, and other sorts of fruit, as well as honey, and all kinds of birds. Their rivers were full of the Siluri, a kind of shad- fish, &c. In short, the antients so highly esteemed them, on account of their happy climate, salubrious air, and fertile soil, that they styled them the fortunate islands, and fixed here their Elysian fields ^b.

Curiosities.

^c CURIOSITIES, most worthy observation, were, 1. The vines, grapes, reeds, &c. towards the confines of Libya Interior, of a most prodigious and incredible size, mentioned by Strabo. 2. The trees growing in the island Ombrios, or Pluvialia, and the liquor extracted from them ; which some learned men have imagined to be the sugar-canes and molossus of the moderns. 3. The river, in the southern parts of Tingitania, which overflowed all the adjacent country, and fertilized it in the same manner as the Nile did Egypt ; for, that there was such a river in this district, appears from the best modern observations compared with Strabo. 4. The several remarkable ruins of Roman antiquities still remaining. 5. The narrow descent of many fathom deep, a few miles from Tangier, which leads into a sort of cave, from ^d whence are passages into subterraneous apartments, designed undoubtedly by the antients as repositories for their dead, there being found in them many urns and statues with Punic inscriptions upon them. We shall reserve all other curious parti- culars for the history of the Sbarifs in Fez and Morocco ^c.

vil. Canaria formerly produced a sort of dates, and pine-apples, in considerable plenty, according to Pliny. In the rivers also of these islands grew the plant papyrus, as in the Nile, if the same author may be credited. From the custom of preserving the bodies of their ancestors, in the manner above-mentioned, it seems probable, that the antient inhabitants of Teneriffe were either a colony of the Ethiopians, or descended from the first progenitors of that people ; since, that such a custom prevailed in very early times amongst them, we learn from Diodorus Siculus (8).

(1) The best modern observations tally with Strabo, if, with that author and Ptolemy, we extend ^{the} southern limits of Mauritania as far to the south- ward as within three degrees, or less, of the tropic of Cancer ; but if, with the moderns, we will not allow it to reach beyond the mouth of the Darodus, in nearly twenty-eight degrees north latitude, the Insula Fortunata will seem to have partly apper- tained to Gatulia. For our part, we are inclined to believe, that part of the kingdom of Sus and Me- rocco, particularly the province of Guzula, or Gez- ula, together with the district contiguous to the town of Messa, belonged to the Gatulians, as will be rendered probable when we come to the history of that people (9).

S E C T. II.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, customs, arts, &c. of the Mauritanians.

THAT the descendants of Pbut first peopled Mauritania, as well as the tract between the Triton and the Mulucba, has been already observed from various authors. That the Phanicians likewise planted colonies here in very early ages, appears from the testimonies already produced. To which we may add, that from Hirtius, Appian, and Dio, as explained by Aldrete, it may be inferred, that the Arabs are to be ranked amongst some of the most ancient inhabitants of this country. Their authority is supported by that of the African historians, or rather a tradition of the Africans, as we learn from Leo and Marmol. The Mauritanians bordering on the confines of Gatulia, particularly those in the neighbourhood of the Pbarusii, who were probably intermixed with them, might have been the progeny of the Persians, whom several authors of repute affirm to have settled here in very remote times. As the Egyptians, in the reign of Ammon, conquered the Atlantides, a nation seated on mount Atlas, we may look upon them likewise as progenitors of the ancient Mauritanians. Should it be admitted, that any number of Persians ever fixed their habitations in so remote a region, 'tis likely, that they either attended Hercules in his Libyan expedition, as several writers assert, or formed part of the body of Arabs above-mentioned; for that they came by sea, in the manner related by Salust, is utterly improbable. Be that as it will, that the Pbarusii deduced their origin from the Persians, seems to be insinuated by the near resemblance of the word Pbarusii to a name given the Persians in scripture, viz. פָּרַס Paras (K), Pharas, or Pbarus; for it may be pronounced all these ways. This seems not a little to support the authority of Mela, Pliny, and others. As the Persian and Indian dominions were contiguous, it is no wonder we should find the ancient Mauri, considered as the attendants of Hercules, called Indians by Strabo. According to Leo, some of the Moors, and other Africans in his time, believed themselves to be descended from certain tribes of Sabæans, a people of Arabia Felix, who were chased out of their native country either by the Affyrians or Ethiopians. Others, if we may credit the same author, gave out, that their ancestors were driven out of Asia by a powerful enemy, and pursued into Greece; from whence they made their escape into Barbary, leaving their pursuers in possession of the country they last abandoned: but this, he adds, was to be understood only of the white nations inhabiting some parts of western Barbary and Numidia. Marmol relates from the African historians, that five tribes of Sabæans, under the conduct of Melec Isfriqui king of Arabia Felix, first spread themselves over some of the eastern parts of Barbary; and that Tut, the grandson of Cbam, settled first in Tingitania, giving name to the Tuteii, a people of that region. The African Tut, we apprehend, must either be Pbut, one of Ham's younger sons, or Lud his grandson. Nothing absurd is implied in the last supposition; for it appears, from the Jerusalem Targum, in conjunction with the sacred historian, that Lud, the son of Misraim, may be considered as one of the first planters of Mauritania ^d.

It is generally imagined, that absolute monarchy prevailed in Mauritania from the earliest ages, as well as in Egypt and Numidia. Bocchar, Bocchus, and Bogud, from what we find related of them by the Roman historians, seem to have governed

(K) It may not be improper, in order to strengthen what is here observed, to take notice, that פָּרַס Pharfi, a Persian, approaches very near the word Pbarusii; especially if we give it a plural Chaldean, or Syriac termination. From the parts of Scripture in which the word is used, it appears pretty plain, that it was a Persian proper name; and from others, that the Hebrews called Persia Elam, and the Persians Elamites (10).

(10) Nebem. c. xii. v. 22.

here with an uncontrollable sway; which is a sufficient intimation; that their predecessors likewise were despotic. However, we must observe from Appian, that several tribes of Moors, whom he calls αὐτονομοί, were governed by their own laws, or, at least, under the direction of their own chiefs and leaders, in opposition to that form of government, which was established in the greatest part of the country we are now upon. The independent Arabs, mentioned by Dr. Shaw, who are seated in the kingdoms of Algiers and Tunis, and sometimes hover about the frontiers of the empire of Morocco, may probably be the posterity of these free-born Moors. Be that as it will, most of the provinces of Mauritania, if not the whole region, were subject to one prince in the reign of the elder Dionysius. This we learn from Justin, who says, that Hanno, a Carthaginian nobleman, in order to attain the sovereignty of Carthage, to which he then aspired, had recourse to the king of the Mauri for assistance. Appian insinuates, that not only in Numidia, whilst regal government flourished there, but likewise in other neighbouring parts of Africa, and therefore probably Mauritania, several reguli, or heads of the Kabyles, as they now are called, were engaged in bloody wars one with another; which evidently implies, that they must have exercised a sovereign power. Notwithstanding which, the great figure the Mauri or Maurusii made in Africa, that name extending even to the borders of Africa Propria, before the Romans grew formidable there, as appears from Justin, is a sufficient indication, that most of them were united under one common head. The names Mauritania Propria or Tingitania received from those of its kings, viz. Bogudiana, &c. clearly demonstrate the vast extent of power they enjoyed. The form of government in use, from the remotest antiquity, amongst those nations that first sent colonies hither, evinces the same thing; as does that of the antient Numidians, who agreed with their neighbours the Maurusii in almost all points whatsoever.

Laws.

THAT some of the Mauritanians had laws, or at least certain political maxims and institutions, which served as rules for the conduct of their chiefs, may be naturally inferred from Appian; but none of these have been conveyed down to us. Nay, the Mauritanian monarchs themselves, however absolute, might have had some immutable laws, to steer their political course by, as we find the Medes and Persians had. Appian's αὐτονομοί, just mentioned, seem to suggest such a thing, or, at least, that laws were not intirely unknown in Mauritania.

Religion.

Neptune seems to have been one of the principal objects of adoration in this country, which is a sufficient proof, that the Naphtubim, or Nephthubim, of Moses, extended themselves into it; though the first seat of that people might probably, as Bochart and Arius Montanus imagine, have been in Marmarica and Cyrene. This deity and his wife Neptys might receive their names from hence, Neptune, Neptys, and Naphtubim, signifying the king, queen, and people, of the sea-coasts. 'Tis certain, that the Egyptians called the exterior parts of the earth, promontories, and whatever bordered upon the sea, and was washed by it, Neptys. The Sun and Moon likewise, in common with the other Libyan nations, they paid religious honours to. That they offered human sacrifices to their gods, in imitation perhaps of the Phenicians and Carthaginians, or some other antient nation, from whom their ancestors came, is asserted by Seneca. From what Nonnus and others have advanced, it seems probable, that Bacchus was worshipped by the Mauritanians, especially as the Indians and Arabs adored him in a most particular manner. In short, we are to form a notion of the Mauritanian religion from that of the Egyptians, Phenicians, Persians, and Carthaginians, already described, as well as from that of the old Arabs, which we hope soon to give our readers a succinct account of. What peculiarities, in this particular, the Mauritanians had, as doubtless they had some, have many ages since been buried in oblivion. However, it seems probable from Mela, that they either worshipped Anteus, or paid divine honours to his shield.

- ^a THE Mauritanian language undoubtedly differed from the Numidian in such a Language manner only as one dialect of the same tongue does from another; so that there is no room for us to be prolix on this head. As for the Mauritanian character, that seems to have been the same with the Numidian, those letters on the coins formerly mentioned bearing an equal relation to the inhabitants of Numidia and Tingitania. What has been just observed of the religion of the people we are now upon, viz. that it bore a near resemblance and affinity to those of the nations from whom the Mauritanians deduced their origin, will hold equally strong with regard to their language. The tongue of the present Kabyles Dr. Shaw has given us a specimen of, and possibly some traces of that of the ancient Moors are still remaining in it; but
- ^b of this we are far from being certain. However, several words of the African vocabulary, which that learned and ingenious gentleman has obliged the world with, are deducible from the Oriental languages, whatever he may insinuate to the contrary (L). The Arabesca, at present spoken in Fez and Morocco, as well as over all other parts of Barbary, was not so much derived from the Saraceni, who over-ran this vast tract, as the ancient inhabitants of Numidia and Tingitania. The Punic tongue, not very remote from the Arabic, prevailed through that part of Africa, extending from the Triton to the Atlantic ocean, even to the time of St. Austin^h.
- ^c 1. THE Mauritanians, as well as the other Africans, from what Hyginus insinuates, Customs seem to have fought only with clubs, till one Belus, the son of Neptuna, as that author calls him, taught them the use of the sword. Sir Isaac Newton makes this Belus to have been the same person with Sesostris king of Egypt, who over-ran a great part of the then known world. 2. All persons of distinction in Mauritania went richly attired, wearing much gold and silver in their cloaths. They took great pains in cleansing their teeth, and curled their hair in a curious and elegant manner. They combed their beards, which were very long, and always had their nails pared extremely close. When they walked out in any numbers, they never touched one another, for fear of disconcerting the curls into which their hair had been formed. 3. The Mauritanian infantry, in time of action, used shields made of elephants skins, being clad in those of lions, leopards, and bears, which they kept on both
- ^d night and day. 4. The cavalry of this nation was armed with broad short lances, and carried targets or bucklers, made likewise of the skins of wild beasts. They used no saddles, nor any accoutrements. Their horses were small and swift, had wooden collars about their necks, and were so much under the command of their riders, that they would follow them like dogs. The habit of these horsemen was not much different from that of the foot above-mentioned, they constantly wearing a large tunic of the skins of wild beasts. The Phutai, of whom the Mauritanians were a branch, were eminent for their shields, and the excellent use they made of them, as we learn from Homer, Xenophon, Herodotus, and Scripture. Nay, Herodotus seems to intimate, that the shield and helmet came from them to the Greeks.
- ^e 5. Notwithstanding the fertility of their soil, the poorer sort of the Mauritanians never took care to manure the ground, being strangers to the art of husbandry, but roved about the country in a wild savage manner, like the ancient Scythians or Arabes Scenitæ. They had tents, or mapalia, so extremely small, that they could

(L) The very learned and ingenious Dr. Shaw positively asserts, that there is no affinity at all betwixt what may be supposed to be the primitive words in the Showian, as the present African Kabyles call their language, and the words which convey the same meaning in the Hebrew and Arabic tongues. From whence he seems to infer, that this language bore no relation at all to any of those that are now called the Oriental languages; and that 'tis difficult, if not impossible, even to form any conjectures about it. But that there is a possibility at least, if not a good degree of probability, of deducing it from the eastern tongues, will best appear from the following Showian words:

1. Akel, to see, may naturally be deduced from אכל hacal, red, coloured, &c. or אכל Akal, he understood, perceived, &c. 2. Ashar, a mountain, from אחר Achar, a place, and אר har, a hill. 3. Allen, the eye, from the Arabic article al, the, and עין ein, or en, eye. 4. Aman, water, from מים main, or man, waters, and ה ha, the, i. e. מים Hamain, or Hamman, the waters. 5. Elkas, the year, from the Arabic article al, the, and קאס kas, barren soil. 6. Assa, to-day, from אש asa, or assa, the time from noon to the next day-break. As all the other Showian words we have examined are equally deducible from the Oriental languages, we doubt not but Dr. Shaw's whole Showian vocabulary may be deemed of Oriental extraction (11).

scarce breathe in them. Their food was corn, herbage, &c. which they frequently did eat green, without any manner of preparation; being destitute of wine, oil, and all the elegancies as well as many necessities of life. Their habit was the same both in summer and winter, consisting chiefly of an old tattered, though thick, garment, and over it a coarse rough tunic; which answered probably to that of their neighbours the Numidians, already described. Most of them lay every night upon the bare ground, though some of them strewed their garments thereon, not unlike the present African Kabyles and Arabs, who, according to Dr. Shaw, use their bykes for a bed and covering in the night. 6. If the most approved reading of a passage in Horace may be admitted, the Mauritanians shot poisoned arrows, which clearly intimates, that they had some skill in the art of preparing poisons, and were excellent dartmen. This last observation is countenanced by Herodian and Ælian, who intirely come into it, affirming them to have been in such continual danger of being devoured by wild beasts, that they durst not stir out of their tents or mapalia without their darts. Such perpetual exercise must render them exceedingly skilful in hurling that weapon. 7. The Mauritanians sacrificed human victims to their deities, as the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, &c. did. This is not only probable from the authorities produced in the Carthaginian history, but from the express testimony of Seneca and Eusebius. 8. As the other customs of the nation we are now upon coincide with those of the Numidians already related, for their farther satisfaction in this particular, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the Numidian historyⁱ.

Arts.

WITH regard to the arts and sciences of the Mauritanians, we have not much to say. The country-people were extremely rude and barbarous, as appears from what has been just laid down. Those inhabiting cities must undoubtedly have had, at least, some smattering in the literature of the several nations they deduced their origin from. That the Mauritanians had some knowledge in naval affairs, seems probable, not only from the intercourse they had with the Phœnicians and Carthaginians, as well as the situation of their country, but likewise from Orpheus, or Onomacritus, who asserts them to have made a settlement at the entrance into Colchis, to which place they came by sea. Magic, sorcery, divination, &c. from what has been observed in the last section, they appear to have applied themselves to in very early times. Cicero and Pliny say, that Atlas was the inventor of astrology, and the doctrine of the sphere, i. e. he first introduced them into Mauritania. This, according to Diodorus Siculus, gave rise to the fable of Atlas's bearing the heavens upon his shoulders. The same author relates, that Atlas instructed Hercules in the doctrine of the sphere and astrology, or rather astronomy, who afterwards brought those sciences into Greece. Some say that Neptune, and others that Atlas, first fitted out a fleet, and invented tall ships with sails. Be that as it will, 'tis generally acknowledged, that both Neptune, and Atlas his son, reigned in this country; for which reason it cannot be denied probable, that astronomy, astrology, geography, geometry, navigation, &c. were known to some of the Mauritanians in early ages. Let this be admitted, and it will almost necessarily follow, that a competent knowledge in history, chronology, &c. could not have been wanting amongst them. That some of them were not deficient in point of genius, is evident from the great and illustrious figure the younger Juba made in the learned world, an account of which will be given towards the close of the Mauritanian history^k.

Power.

NOTWITHSTANDING Mela represents Tingitania as a poor despicable country, scarce deserving any notice, yet Strabo assures us, that it was a rich and opulent kingdom. The antients in general, by fixing the gardens and golden fruit of the Hesperides here, seem to concur with him in that opinion. Sallust, in particular, discovers himself to have entertained the same sentiment, when he tells us how formidable Jugurtha's army was rendered by its junction with the Mauritanian forces; and Dio, when he intimates, that Bogud, king of Mauritania, caused victory to declare in favour of Cæsar, at the battle of Munda. We cannot well conceive it to have been otherwise, if we consider its extraordinary fertility, the genius of its inhabitants for trade, the gold it abounded with, the bravery of its troops, and other instances of its power mentioned by writers of the best authority. The Carthaginians had generally some bodies of Mauritanians in their service, which is a proof, that they were highly esteemed by that famous republic. The name of Mauri, or Maurusii, seems to have extended itself from the Atlantic ocean to the borders of Africa Propria, or, at least, to the Ampfaga, as may be inferred from several authors: nay, it survived those of the Maffya and Mafæjy'i, which must have been occasioned by the superior eminence of the Mauritanian nation, and consequently is an additional argument in favour of what has been just advanced¹.

SECT. III.

The history of the Mauritanians, to the intire reduction of their country by the Romans.

THE accounts transmitted down to us by the antients of the most early transactions in Mauritania are so enveloped with fable, that 'tis impossible for us from thence to form any tolerable idea of them; though these accounts are so prolix, that they would fill a considerable volume. It will therefore be sufficient, for the information of our readers, to give a concise relation of the principal of them, stripped as much as possible of fable, and as consistent with itself as the jarring traditions of the old poets, philosophers, and historians, will permit it to be^m.

Accounts of the earliest transactions in Mauritania little to be depended on.

THE two earliest princes of this country, except Neptune, mentioned by antiquity, were Atlas and Antæus. From several circumstances, with which we are supplied by various authors, it appears extremely probable, that these were the same person.

Neptune and Antæus two of the first kings of Mauritania.

They were both of them the sons of Neptune, who reigned over Mauritania, Numidia, and a great part of Libya; as may be naturally inferred from his having such particular marks of distinction conferred upon him by the inhabitants of those regions. They both ruled with an absolute sway over a great part of Africa, particularly Tingitania. Hercules defeated and slew Antæus in the same war wherein he took the Libyan world from Atlas. Both Atlas and Antæus invaded Egypt, and contended with Hercules in the wars of the gods, and were both overcome by him. Antæus, as well as Atlas, seems to have been famed for his knowledge in the celestial sciences. From whence, as well as from other considerations that might be offered, we may fairly conclude them to have been the same king of Mauritania^a (M).

Antæus, in his wars with Hercules, who seems to have commanded an army of Egyptians and Ethiopians, behaved with great bravery and resolution. Receiving several large reinforcements of Libyan troops, he cut off vast numbers of Hercules's men. But that celebrated commander, having at last intercepted a strong body of Mauritanian or Libyan forces, sent to the relief of Antæus, gave him a total overthrow, wherein both he, and the best part of his forces, were put to the sword. This decisive action put Hercules in possession of Libya and Mauritania, and conse-

(M) The oblique cases of the word Atlas, viz. Atlantis, Atlante, &c. are apparently compounded of the names Atlas, or Atal, i. e. tall, lofty, &c. and Ante, or Antæus. This is a presumptive proof, that they both belonged to the same person, and consequently, that Atlas and Antæus were the same

king of Mauritania. The old nominative case in the Greek language, of all such words, bore a near relation to the oblique cases, though altered in process of time. The word Atal delivers very well to the nature of Antæus, according to Pliny and Plutarch (12).

quently of all the riches in those kingdoms. Hence came the fable, that Hercules, a finding Antæus, a giant of an enormous size, with whom he was engaged in single combat, to receive fresh strength as often as he touched his mother earth, when thrown upon her, at last lifted him up in the air, and squeezed him to death; as likewise, that he took Atlas's globe upon his own shoulders, overcame the dragon that guarded the orchards of the Hesperides, and made himself master of all the golden fruit there. Bochart thinks, that the fable alluded chiefly to naval engagements, wherein Hercules, for the most part, was victorious, though Antæus, from time to time, received succours by sea; till at last Hercules, coming up with one of his squadrons having a strong reinforcement on board, made himself master of it; which rendered Antæus, for the future, incapable of making head against him. The same author likewise insinuates, that the notion of Antæus's gigantic stature, prevailing for so many centuries amongst the Tingitani, pointed out the size of the vessels of which his fleets or squadrons did consist; and that the golden apples, so frequently mentioned by the old mythologists, were the treasures that fell into Hercules's hands upon Antæus's defeat, the Greeks giving the oriental word ἄνθος, riches, the signification affixed to their own term μήλα, apples. Bishop Cumberland seems, with Sanctionatbo, and the Atlantian theology in Diodorus, to allow Atlas to have been the son of Ouranos, i. e. according to him, Noah; and likewise to take for granted, with Eusebius, that Antæus was his son. But should this be admitted, we must allow Hercules, and consequently Antæus, to have been cotemporary with Misraim; that the remotest western parts of Africa, even those bordering upon the Atlantic ocean, were then fully inhabited; and that they had, even for some time, then formed a powerful kingdom; i. e. the north-western part of Libya made a considerable figure before Egypt and Phœnicia, from whence its first colonies were drawn, could in reality make any figure at all; nay, that those countries, particularly Egypt, could send colonies into, and attempt the conquest of, almost the remotest regions, immediately after the first planters had settled there; absurdities so glaring, that even none in Ctesias can exceed them! Besides, if Eusebius espoused this opinion, as he seems to have done, by his citation from Diodorus, provided we fall in with bishop Cumberland's explanation of Sanctionatbo, he is inconsistent with himself: for he asserts Hercules to have vanquished Antæus about three hundred and ninety-three years before the destruction of Troy, as we find by consulting his Chronicon. Now, allowing that event to have preceded the christian æra twelve hundred years, which is higher than it has even been fixed by the followers of Ctesias and Eratosthenes, both Hercules and Antæus must have lived betwixt seven and eight hundred years after the deluge; which, though much too early, in our opinion, must bring them down several hundred years lower than the age of Misraim. The Greek mythic writers, particularly Apollodorus, will have Atlas to be the son of Iapetus, and grandson of Noah, according to bishop Cumberland; but this hypothesis likewise, from what has been just advanced, must be acknowledged void of the least shadow of probability. In fine, after the most diligent and impartial examination of all the different hypotheses of historians and chronologers, relating to Atlas and Antæus, we find none so little clogged with difficulties as that of the incomparable Sir Izaak Newton. That illustrious author supposes Ammon, the father of Sesac, to have been the first king of Libya, or that vast tract extending from the borders of Egypt to the Atlantic ocean; that the conquest of this country was effected by Sesac in his father's life-time; that the Libyans, headed by Neptune, afterwards rebelled against Sesac, slew him, and then invaded Egypt under the command of Atlas or Antæus, the son of Neptune, Sesac's brother and admiral; that Hercules, the general of Thebais and Ethiopia for the gods or great men of Egypt, after the death of Sesac, reduced a second time the whole continent of Libya, having overthrown and slain Antæus near a town in Thebais, from that event called Antæa or Antæopolis; and lastly, that the first reduction of Libya, by Sesac, happened a little above a thousand years before the birth of Christ, as the last, by Hercules, did a few years under that period. Now, though we do not pretend to adopt every particular circumstance of Sir Izaak Newton's hypothesis, yet we cannot forbear observing, that it appears undeniably plain from Scripture, that neither the western extremity of Libya, nor even the other parts of that region, could possibly have been so well peopled before the time of David or Solomon, as to have sent a numerous army to invade Egypt; since Egypt and Phœnicia, from whence the greatest part of the ancestors of the Libyans came, and which were much nearer a nearer the place from whence the first dispersion of mankind was made, could not themselves have been greatly over-stocked with inhabitants any considerable time before the reign of Saul. And that such an invasion happened in the reign of Neptune, or at least of his son Anteus, has been fully evinced by that most excellent chronologer ^o.

To what has been already offered on this head we may add, that the Libyans are not taken notice of by Scripture, as a nation of any strength or power, till the fifth year of the reign of R. boboam king of Judah, who was then invaded by Sesac. A body of Libyan troops attended that prince in this expedition; and therefore Libya must be considered as then newly become subject to him. About thirty years afterwards they made likewise something of a figure; since in the fifteenth year of Asa, b Zerab the Ethiopian advanced to Mareshab with an army of a million of men, of which the Libyans formed a considerable part. As this was but a short time after the death of Sesac, and as Zerab must then have been master of Egypt, since otherwise he could not have marched his Libyan forces through that country, to attack Asa's dominions, it seems to us extremely probable from hence, in conjunction with what has been just observed, that Libya was annexed to the Egyptian monarchy by Sesac, and not before; as likewise, that Sesestris, and Sesonchosis, must have been the same Egyptian prince with Sesac, since those names denoted that conqueror who first reduced Libya, and formed the great Egyptian monarchy, according to profane authors. No mention is made of the Egyptians on this occasion, since soon after c the death of Sesac, i. e. a little before the Trojan war, the Ethiopians, for a short time, were masters of Egypt, as appears from Pliny and Herodotus. If therefore all that vast tract, known by the name of Libya, was so inconsiderable, that it deserved little or no attention, till the days of Rehoboam and Asa, how obscure must the country, called by the Phœnicians Mauritania, a small part of it, have been in every age preceding Sesac? We may therefore infer from hence, that Anteus, or Atlas, could not have lived much earlier than the age Sir Isaac has assigned him; however early some particular colonies of Canaanites, or Phœnicians, a sea-faring people always intent upon discovering unknown countries, might have settled in the western parts of Africa. However, we are far from insisting upon what is here advanced as true, d but only beg leave to submit it, with all possible deference, to the judgment of our learned and impartial readers p.

THE sentiment we would here recommend to the consideration of the learned is V r g i l and also countenanced by Virgil and Trogus Pompeius, who hint the following remarkable T r o g u s countenanced his opinion.
 particulars relating to it: 1. About nine hundred years before the commencement of the christian æra, Libya was independent on Egypt, since the eastern, if not the western part of it, was governed by a king of its own, named Iarbas. This tallies extremely well with what Sir Isaac has observed of the fall of the Egyptian empire, founded by Ammon and Sesac; for, according to him, that empire was broke to pieces about the year before Christ 940. by the civil wars in the reign of Amenophis, e which, in a great measure, occasioned the revolt of the nations upon the coasts of the Mediterranean and Euxine seas. 2. The Libyans much nearer Egypt, a polite and civilized kingdom, than those bordering on the Atlantic ocean, had only a few villages, consisting of small huts, probably the same as the modern Dashkras, mentioned by Dr. Shaw, when Dido arrived in Africa; though possibly Utica, built and inhabited by Phœnicians, might then have made a better figure. Tingis likewise, as it appears to lay claim to a more antient founder than Anteus, being on the sea-coast, was perhaps a town of some note before the time we are now upon. Nay, as we have observed from Procopius, some parties of Canaanites might erect a castle there, though before that time, if any traces of a town were in being, it could only f have been an inconsiderable Dashkra, or perhaps little better than a collection of thickets and caves of the earth. 3. The Libyans, even in and near the territory of Carthage, were a sort of barbarians at Dido's arrival there, living, in a manner, like wild beasts, and standing in need of Dido's Phœnician followers to polish and civilize them. These, and some other inferences, that might be drawn from the above-mentioned authors, add no small weight to what Sir Isaac has advanced with regard to

Atlas or Antæus, as well as the rise and fall of the Egyptian empire; but this we must supersede, as not so properly belonging to that branch of ancient history, to which we are obliged at present to confine ourselves.

Nothing further remarkable till the Roman times.

We find nothing worth relating recorded of the Mauritanians from the defeat of Antæus to the Roman times. Livy only tells us, that Syphax's kingdom bordered upon the Mauri, which is nothing more than an implication, that such a nation did then exist. Justin indeed, from Trogus, intimates, that, in some of the earliest ages of Carthage, the Mauri were neighbours to the Carthaginians, and had some disputes with them; but he gives us no particulars of moment concerning that people. Diodorus Siculus likewise says, that, in the interval between the overthrow the Carthaginians received from Gelon, and the first Punic war, they had frequently Mauritanian mercenaries in their armies, without hinting any thing farther relative to the nation we are now upon. Nor ought this to be wondered at, since we are informed by Sallust, that nothing of the Mauri, besides their name, was known to the Romans, so late as the Jugurthine war; and the most ancient Greek writers scarce ever considered them as a particular nation, but only as a branch of the Libyans. How Bocchar, king of Mauritania, lent Masiniſſa a body of troops to escort him to his dominions, and what was consequent thereupon, our readers will find related at large in the Numidian history.

Plutarch insinuates, that the elder Juba pretended to be lineally descended from Hercules; but that biographer seems not to give overmuch credit to such a pretension. However, 'tis natural enough to suppose, that the person who obtained this country, upon the dissolution of the Egyptian empire, founded a family that might continue for many generations. Possibly Bocchar, and Bocchus father-in-law to Jugurtha, were of this family; since the affinity of names, and the country they governed, sufficiently intimate them to have been of the same family, and of the blood royal of Mauritania. Be that as it will, Bocchus, from the account Sallust gives us of him, seems to have been a perfidious prince. After two defeats, the Romans menaced and cajoled him into an infamous action, i. e. to deliver (N) his son-in-law Jugurtha into their hands, after the most solemn engagements to support him, and even a promise made to put Sylla into his power. Jugurtha indeed was a prince not only capable, but even guilty, of the most enormous crimes; but this will not vindicate, nor even palliate, the conduct of (O) Bocchus. What is here hinted at may be found related at large in some former parts of this work.

What happened to Bogud.

HISTORY is silent as to any farther particulars of the Mauritanian affairs, till the time of Bogud (P), who was cotemporary with Julius Cæsar, and his adopted son Octa-

(N) Orosius intimates, that Bocchus did not enter into an alliance with Jugurtha till after Marius had taken Capſa; which contradicts Sallust and Plutarch. He also describes the first general action betwixt the two African princes and Marius, which he affirms to have happened near Cirta, as the most bloody and dubious one the Romans were ever concerned in. The Romans, says he, after having been extremely harassed by the enemies parties, were attacked by their whole army, wherein was a body of sixty thousand Mauritanian and Numidian cavalry, whose horses raised such clouds of dust, that the heavens were thereby obscured; which, together with the shower of darts thrown on this occasion, turned the day into night. The battle was fought with such obstinacy, that it continued three days; neither had the Romans at last won it, being reduced to the last extremity by thirst, occasioned by the intolerable heat of the climate and season, had there not fallen a most seasonable shower of rain, which greatly refreshed them, rendered the handles of the Africans darts so slippery, that they could not throw them, and made their shields, covered with dried elephants skins, that imbibed all the water, so ponderous, that they could not use them; which of course determined victory to declare against Bocchus and Jugurtha. But as this relation, in many particulars, runs counter to Sallust and Plutarch, or rather seems to be a confused account of several actions mentioned by them, we shall leave our readers to give what credit to it they please (13).

(O) Either this prince, or another of the same name, undertook an expedition against the western or Hesperian Ethiopians, as we learn from Strabo. According to that author, Bocchus found, in the country of these Ethiopians, some reeds of such an enormous size, that the largest joint of them would contain eight chanixes of corn; which, together with some asparagus equally large, he sent as curiosities to his wife. What success attended this expedition, we neither find in Strabo, nor any other author (14).

(P) Suetonius informs us, that Julius Cæsar fell in love with Bogud's queen Eunæ, or Eunoe, a Mauritanian lady. As he made both her and her husband presents of an immense value on this account, 'tis not improbable, that he enjoyed her by her husband's consent (15).

- a vius. Bogud, in conjunction with Publius Sittius, not a little contributed to Cæsar's great success in Africa, as has been already observed. In Spain likewise he enabled Cæsar to gain the ever-memorable victory at Munda, which gave the finishing stroke to the Roman republic. After that emperor's death he sided with Antony against Octavius; and endeavoured to make a diversion, in favour of the former, in Spain. But whilst he was employed in this expedition, the Tingitanians revolted from him, and, being supported by a body of Spaniards in the interest of Octavius, and some of Bocchus's troops, defeated him upon his return into Africa; which put Bocchus in possession of Tingitania. Octavius, or Augustus, afterwards confirmed this acquisition to him, and honoured the inhabitants of Tingis with the privileges of Roman citizens. Bogud was at last killed by Agrippa at Metbona, as our readers will elsewhere find; and after Bocchus's (Q) death Tingitania was reduced to the form of a Roman province.

- Augustus* gave the younger Juba, a prince extremely in his favour, the two Mauritanie, together with part of Gatulia, some time after his marriage with the younger Cleopatra, instead of his father's kingdom, i. e. Numidia, which still remained a Roman province. 'Tis true, Strabo, as has been observed by Mr. Bayle, affirms, that Augustus restored Juba to the kingdom of his father, and moreover granted him the Mauritanie; but this geographer limits the Roman province, and the kingdom of Juba, in such a manner, as shews, that Numidia belonged to the Romans. We must not omit observing here, that the translator of Dio has committed an egregious blunder, in his Latin version, which seems to have proceeded purely from inattention: Cæsar, says he, gave Juba, &c. 17, (i. e. Egypt) and his father's kingdom; whereas Dio there affirms, that Cæsar gave (R) Juba HER, (i. e. Cleopatra) and his father's kingdom. That this observation, made first by Mr. Bayle, is indisputably true, appears sufficiently from hence, that this Juba was never king of Egypt. Suidas relates, that the younger Juba was whipped publicly when led in triumph; but this seems highly improbable, and has not the countenance of any other author to support it. Ptolemy (S), his son by Cleopatra, daughter to Antony and Cleopatra, surnamed

(Q) Pliny relates, that one king Bocchus, having fastened thirty men to stakes, in order to their being destroyed by the same number of elephants, ordered certain persons to irritate those animals; but that, notwithstanding all their efforts, they found it impossible to make them subservient to that prince's cruelty. The same author likewise mentions an African historian of this name; but whether or no he was of royal extraction, he tells us not (16).

(R) Juba had a noble education bestowed upon him at Rome, where he imbibed such a variety of knowledge, as afterwards equalled him to the most learned Grecians. He did not leave that city, till he went to take possession of his father's dominions. By the lenity of his government he so won the hearts of all his subjects, who ever retained the most grateful sense of the felicity they enjoyed under him, that they ranked him among the gods, and, according to Pausanias, erected a statue in his honour. He was extremely well versed in the Affrian, Arabic, Greek, Punic, African, and Latin histories, as well as those of other nations. He wrote the history of Arabia; the antiquities of the Affrians and Romans; the history of theatres, of painting, and painters; of grammar; of the nature and properties of different animals; a particular treatise upon the herb Euphorbia, which he so called from his physician, who first discovered the many excellences of it, in which he greatly celebrates its singular virtues; a piece concerning the source of the Nile; besides many other works ascribed to him by Suidas, Ammianus Marcellinus, Pliny, Athenaus, &c. a few fragments only of which are now extant. Pliny intimates, that his learning rendered him more illustrious than his crown; and frequently cites him, as asserting or confirming the most curious particulars. According to Ammianus Marcellinus, Juba, from some Punic authors, affirmed the Nile to have had its source in a high mountain of Mauritania. The abtë Sevin has favoured the world with a short dissertation on the life and writings of the younger Juba, wherein he has inserted a catalogue of all his works. That he died in the year of Rome 776. or 777. may be inferred from Strabo and Tacitus (17).

(S) Ptolemy's pedigree has been discovered by the following Roman inscription, communicated to Dr. Shaw by father Ximenes, which exhibits that of his father Juba:

Tacfarinas raises troubles in Africa; but receives several defeats, and is at last killed.

Tacfarinas, a native of Numidia, who had served among the Roman auxiliaries, a little before the third consulate of Tiberius, occasioned fresh troubles in Africa. At first he assembled a great number of barbarians, inured to robberies, and all kinds of rapine, by the allurements of plunder; out of which he formed a considerable army, and disciplined it after the Roman manner. The gross of the army consisted of Musulanians, a powerful nation bordering upon the Sabara, still wild, and without towns, of whom Tacfarinas declared himself general. These were joined by a large body of Mauritanians, commanded by their general Mazippa, whom Tacfarinas had found means to draw into the war. The Cinibians likewise, a nation by no means despicable, he forced to come into his measures. With the regular forces he encamped, and detached Mazippa to make excursions; and harass the Romans by perpetual alarms, with the irregular troops. Furius Camillus, the Roman commander, advanced against the Africans with only a single legion, and what troops the allies could spare him. This he did in order to draw them to a general action, since they seemed willing to decline an engagement, it being their interest to protract the war. Though Camillus's troops were but a handful, in comparison of the barbarians, he drew them up in order of battle, posting the legion in the centre, and the light cohorts, with two wings of horse, on the right and left. He had no sooner made this disposition than the barbarians attacked him, but were quickly routed with great slaughter. However, the next year Tacfarinas renewed the war, making dreadful incursions into the very heart of the country, and doing irreparable damage where-ever he moved. He posted from place to place with such celerity, that none of the Roman detachments could come up with him. After he had committed many devastations, he surrounded a Roman cohort, commanded by one Decrius, an officer of distinguished merit, in a fort near the banks of the Pagida. The Romans behaved with great bravery; but their commandant being killed, they were obliged to abandon the fort to the enemy, and betake themselves to flight. Lucius Apronius, Camillus's successor, caused this ignominious cohort to be decimated, and every tenth man, drawn by lot, in conformity to the antient custom, to be executed with a club. This rigour had such an effect, that Tacfarinas's army was routed, and forced to raise the siege of Thata, by a squadron of five hundred veterans only. This defeat determined Tacfarinas to resolve never for the future to attempt a siege, but to carry on the war in a desultory manner, flying when attacked, and, upon a retreat, assailing the rear. As long as the African observed this method, he eluded all the efforts of the Romans; but withdrawing to the maritime places, and being, by the prospect of an immense booty, confined to his camp, he was attacked by Apronius Cæsianus with a body of cavalry, auxiliary cohorts, and a detachment of legionary foot. The dispute was neither long nor bloody; for the barbarians were soon overthrown, many of them slain, and the rest obliged to disperse themselves in the Sabara. However, Tacfarinas, though often repulsed, still repaired his forces, and arrived at such a pitch of arrogance, as to send ambassadors to Tiberius, threatening him with eternal war, if he and his army had not a proper settlement assigned them. Tiberius, incensed to the last degree at such unparalleled impudence, ordered Blasus, who commanded the Roman forces in Africa, to offer a general indemnity to the Africans, and to endeavour, by all means possible, to get Tacfarinas into his hands. Blasus, in order to put an end to this war, made the following disposition of his forces: he detached Scipio, his lieutenant, to a post from whence Tacfarinas committed his depredations upon the citizens of Leptis, and then retreated amongst the Garamantes; his son he sent to protect the territory of the Cirtæsi; and between both he marched himself with the flower of his army, erecting forts and redoubts in proper places as he advanced. These measures, with some others equally good, had the desired effect; for Tacfarinas's forces were dispersed; his brother taken, and he obliged to hide himself in the desert. Notwithstanding which, a great body of Mauritanians, through Ptolemy's indolence, having joined him, as likewise a strong a reinforcement from the king of the Garamantes (T), he once more made head against the Romans. But Dolabella, having fortified the proper posts, and executed the chiefs of the Musulani, who were meditating a revolt, advanced against the enemy, who, he was informed, had taken post near the castle of Auzea. After a forced march he came up with them, and intirely defeated them, putting to the sword Tacfarinas himself, with a vast number of his followers. A body of Mauritanians, king Ptolemy sent to assist Dolabella, did not a little contribute to this victory, which, for some time, settled peace in the Roman provinces, Mauritania, and Gætulia w.

Ptolemy having been cut off by Caius, as related above, Ædemon, one of his freed-men, in order to revenge his death, assembled a body of forces in Mauritania. Caius being soon after assassinated, his successor Claudius, in order to disperse this corps, sent thither a Roman army, which was the first that ever appeared in that country. Though they performed no great exploits the first campaign, yet, as the enemy retired before them, the senate persuaded Claudius to accept of triumphal honours for the success of his arms in Mauritania. The following year, Suetonius Paulinus, the Roman general, defeated the enemy, ravaged all the country as far as mount Ailas, and penetrated into Gætulia. Sidius Geta, who succeeded Paulinus in the command of the Roman army in Africa, gave Salabus, the Mauritanian general, two overthrows, and pursued him into the Sabara. Having been supplied here with water in a wonderful manner, when his troops were upon the point of perishing, Geta concluded a peace with Salabus upon his own terms. 'Tis probable, that, by this treaty, Mauritania was delivered up intirely into the hands of the Romans; since we find it soon after divided into two provinces, the one called Tingitania, or Mauritania Tingitana, from the city Tingis, and the other Mauritania Cafariensis, from Cæsar, a surname Claudius had in common with the other Roman emperors. That prince appointed two Roman knights to preside over these provinces. Soon after, the Romans routed a body of Gætulians that infested some parts of Numidia, and thereby restored tranquillity to all their African dominions. 'Tis observable, that Augustus settled nine colonies, and Claudius three only, here; which, in a region of so vast an extent, could neither have sufficient power thoroughly to subjugate the natives, nor influence to conciliate their affections to the Romans i.

that remained there. The same historian also informs us, that before the general action here mentioned, Dolabella forced Tacfarinas to raise the siege of Thubursicum, which he abandoned at his approach (19).

CHAP. III.

The history of the Gætulians.

e AS the limits of Gætulia have not been settled, either by Ptolemy, or any of the other ancient geographers, 'tis impossible for us to define them. From several authors it may however be inferred, that they were not always the same. In Pliny's time the Gætulians possessed a considerable part, at least, of Tingitania; the Maurusii having been so extremely weakened by long and bloody wars, that they could not make head against them. Virgil affirms this people to have extended themselves from the Regio Syrtica to the Atlantic ocean; and Festus Avienus seems to have fixed their eastern boundary not far from the western confines of Marmarica. However, nothing certain concerning the extent and situation of their country can be drawn either from those authors or Strabo, who only intimates the Gætulians to have been a large nation, taking up a considerable part of Libya Interior, and possessing some territories in the neighbourhood of the Syrtis. Pliny says, that Gætulia was terminated on the

the south by the river Nigris, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Nigir, which, according to a him, separated it from Ethiopia. But notwithstanding the indefinite terms in which the antients have laid down this region, by comparing their several accounts and descriptions, we shall find the northern limits thereof contiguous to, and frequently coinciding with, the southern parts of Numidia and the Mauritania; and, by consulting the best observations of the moderns, that it could not have reached to any great distance in the Sabara. Dr. Shaw (A), in one place, seems to insinuate, that the proper Gætulia did not extend farther to the east than the meridian of Siga, i. e. about 0° 10' E. of London, provided Tackumbreet be the ancient Siga, as he imagines; since he there tells us, that the Melanogætuli and Garamantes occupied the tract behind Numidia, Africa Propria, and the Regio Syrtica, from that meridian to Cyrenaica: b whereas in another place he fixes some Gætulian tribes in the remotest part of the district of Zaab, and meridian of Constantina, above six degrees more to the eastward than Siga. Whether or no either of these seemingly jarring accounts be true, or which of them is so, we shall not take upon us to determine; but only observe, that Guzula, or Gezula, a province of the kingdom of Morocco, at the foot of mount Atlas, seems to have preserved some traces of the ancient Gætulia. Could we lay any great stress upon an affinity of names, this province was a principal part of Gætulia; in which case Dr. Shaw's first notion would have probability on its side. But, as the concurrent testimony of the antients favours the latter, we know not what to say. However, the ascertaining the bounds of this rude and barbarous region is not a matter of such importance, as to deserve any great regard. We shall therefore leave our geographical readers to chuse which of these notions they please, or to reject both of them, if they think proper.^a

Its towns, rivers, mountains,
&c.

As the Gætulians, before the time of Jugurtha, led their flocks from pasture to pasture, living, for the most part, in tents, without any fixed habitation, our readers will not expect to find many towns in this country. Some however Virgil insinuates there to have been, though his commentator Servius appears to be of a different opinion. Philostratus makes the Gætulians to have inhabited the interior part of mount Abinna, or Abyla, and consequently, by intermixing them with the Maurusii, allows some of them to have dwelt in towns. Pliny also intimates, that the Gætulians in his time were masters of a good part of Masæsyliæ; and Apuleius assigns them some districts, at least, of Numidia Propria; which testimonies, if admitted, evince the same thing. But Pliny and Ptolemy render it indisputable, when they mention the cities Autolala, Talubath, &c. as appertaining to the Gætulians. The principal tribes of proper Gætulia were the Baniuræ, Darræ, and Autololes (B), according to the last-mentioned geographers. 'Tis probable, that the Baniuræ bordered upon Tingitania, as the Darræ did upon the Ethiopians called Perorsi and the Pharusii. The Autololes seem to have been by much the most powerful, and to have spread themselves over that part of Tingitania bordering on the coast of the Atlantic ocean. Their capital city Autolala, from which they derived their name, we know nothing farther of, than that it stood betwixt the Subus and the Salatbus, the only two rivers of note, except the Gir and the Nigir, that watered Gætulia. Of Talubath nothing has been transmitted down to us by the antients, but the bare name. As the Sabara began not far from the southern foot of mount Atlas, this country was undoubtedly, for the most part, sandy and desert; however, it was interspersed with several fruitful spots. Mount Sagapola, eminent for nothing but its being the limit of Gætulia on the side of the Melanogætuli, and containing the sources of the Subus and Salatbus above-mentioned, seems to have been the only mountain of any note in the region c

(A) Dr. Shaw also tells us, that Gætulia extended into the desert or Sabara; which supposes, that nothing but desert must be left to the direct southward of it. Therefore Melanogætulia, and the country of the Garamantes, in conformity to the situation assigned them by the antients, must have lain E. S. E. of Gætulia, and consequently have begun in an eastern direction from it (1).

(B) Pliny says, that the Vesuni, or, according to some MSS. the Nesuni, were a branch of the Autololes, who, separating from their brethren, settled upon the borders of Ethiopia, and afterwards formed a distinct nation. Orosius informs us, that the Autololes, or, as the MSS. falsely have it, Autoles, were called, in his time, Galaulis (2).

- a we are now upon. As for the promontories, &c. we meet with none meriting any attention; though from Pliny it may be inferred, that the Promontorium Solis, and some ports already mentioned, might have been in a territory afterwards annexed to the proper Gætulia. The only curiosity here, deserving a place in history, was the vast quantity of the purple-fish produced in that part of the Atlantic ocean washing the Gætulian shore, with which the rocks on this coast were frequently covered. The Teladusii, Soræ, Dryitæ, Elulii, Mazices, Nacmusii, and other obscure nations, inhabiting either Numidia, or the confines of that country and Gætulia, in the time of Ptolemy, deserve so little regard, that our readers will scarce expect a bare enumeration of their names. However, we must not omit observing, that as Ptolemy
- b places the Pharusii to the north of mount Sagapola, they may be considered as a clan or canton of the Gætulians; especially since Pliny affirms their district to have stretched itself out as far as the Atlantic ocean, and Mela makes them to have attended Hercules in his expedition against the Hesperides. 'Tis not therefore probable, that mount Pharusus, near four degrees east of the Mulucha, should have been so denominated from the Pharusii; except we will suppose this ridge of mountains to have been the eastern limit of that nation, and that they were so numerous and powerful as to have spread themselves over a tract extending from thence to the Atlantic ocean. In such a case we might, with Dr. Shaw, allow, that the inhabitants of mount Pharusus were part of the Pharusii. Perhaps this notion may be countenanced by Mela
- c and Pliny, when they intimate the Pharusii to have been an opulent people in antient times, and to have bordered upon the Nigritæ, in the neighbourhood of the river Nigir, which, with Ptolemy, they make one of the boundaries of the Gætulians. The vicinity of the Nigritæ and Pharusii is likewise taken notice of by Dionysius Afer and Strabo ^b.

- ACCORDING to Josephus and St. Jerom, Cbavilab, or Havilab, the son of Cush, ^{The antiquity of the Gætulians.} was the father of the Gætulians; for which reason we find them called Evilæi, or Havilæi. As it is well known, that Havilab, or Cbavilab, settled in Arabia Felix, and that from him his descendants there assumed the name of Cbaulotai and Cbaulafii, the same words with Evilæi, it cannot well be doubted, but that Gætulia was
- d first peopled from Arabia Felix, as has been already hinted. This likewise renders probable the authority of the antients, who assert, that the Gætulians intermixed themselves with the Persians, and that the Pharusii, in particular, were of Persic extraction; since Persia and Arabia being in a manner contiguous regions, many Persians probably attended some of the Arabian colonies passing into Africa, or at least followed Sesac and Hercules in their Libyan expeditions. We find no obscure traces of the Daræ, a Gætulian tribe above-mentioned, in Leo and Marmol, who describe a province, bounded on the west by those of Gezula and Sus, called Dara, corresponding nearly with the tract assigned that people by Pliny; and 'tis well known, that the Darrbæ are a nation of Arabia Felix, taken notice of by Stephanus, Ptolemy, and
- e Pliny; which may serve as an additional argument in favour of an early migration of Arabs into Gætulia. To which we may farther add, in support of that migration, that, considering how remote Gætulia was from Arabia Felix, what a series of ages had passed from the first plantations of colonies there to the most early occurrences of that country transmitted down to posterity by the Greeks and Romans, what other nations were intermixed with the first migrating Arabs, viz. the Persians, Indians, &c. the word Gætulia, or Cbetulia, is no very strange corruption of Cbavilab, Cbevilab, Cbavilab, Cbevilab, Cbavilat, or Cbevilat. Both Pliny and Ptolemy have remembered the river Daras, or Darat, which they say produced great numbers of crocodiles. If our readers should be disposed to allow the modern Darodus,
- f or Darodt, to be that river, as 'tis not improbable some of them may, they would be convinced, that Ptolemy had not only placed his Darat, or Darodus, vastly too much to the southward, but likewise made his Mauritania Tingitana to comprehend a great part of Gætulia, if not the whole country. 'Tis certain, that the names and situation of the provinces of Gezula and Dara render this not a little probable. The word Dara seems to signify a generation or habitation of shepherds, and is therefore very applicable to a tribe of Gætulians, who, as well as the modern Darans and Gezulians, had scarce any other possessions than their flocks. Both the name therefore and man-

net of life of this people plainly pointed out the nation from whence they deduced a their origin. Some antient authors related, that the Tyrians had, in very early ages, many cities here, and in the neighbouring parts of Libya Interior, which were destroyed by the Nigrites and Pbarusii; but this notion is rejected as fabulous by Strabo c.

Their government, &c.

THE first Gætulians, according to the Punic historians, were some of the most antient inhabitants of Africa, extremely rude and barbarous, without any form of government, laws, or manners, especially such as ever prevailed in a civilized state. They lived upon the flesh of wild beasts, eating upon the ground, after the manner of cattle. They roved about the country, taking up their lodging where-ever the night surprised them. Some of the Pbarusii, or Pbaurusii, at first, if any credit b may be given to Strabo, lived in caves like the Troglodytes. But this state of barbarity, Sallust tells us, continued only till Hercules came amongst them; which is a farther proof of what Sir Isaac Newton has advanced with regard to the age of that hero; since, as we have lately observed, the Gætulians were far from being perfectly civilized in the time of Jugurtha, and therefore Hercules did not probably precede that age so long as the generality of the antient chronologers supposed. It is believed by some good authors, to whose sentiments we pay a great deference, that the Gætulians, however rude and barbarous, at least towards the Roman times, were under the direction of certain (C) phylarchs, or heads of Kabyles, as their successors at this day are. However, if they had then any fixed or stated laws, we are now intirely c ignorant of them. If they had any (D) customs likewise, different from those of their neighbours the Numidians and Mauritanians, the knowledge of them has not reached us. As all the authors mentioning them are utterly silent as to any particulars relating to their religion, we must suppose it to have been the same with that of their neighbours already taken notice of, or with that of their progenitors the antient Arabs, which will hereafter be briefly described. Leo relates, that many of the antient Africans erected magnificent temples in honour of the Sun and Fire, which they worshipped, wherein they had a perpetual fire; though others of them adored another planet. Probably the Gætulians were some of the former, as being partly descended from the Persians, who professed the Magian religion. Their language must undoubtedly d have born a near resemblance to the antient Arabic, and the other Oriental tongues. This does not only appear from what has been already advanced, but likewise from the Showiabian vocabulary given us by Dr. Shaw, most, if not all, of whose words are easily deducible from the Arabic, Hebrew, Chaldee, and Syriac. Our readers will not expect to meet with any arts or erudition in such a country as Gætulia, and therefore will not suppose, that we have any thing to offer on that head here d.

A brief account of the Gætulians till the time of Vespasian.

WITH regard to the transactions of this nation, we have not much to say. Herodotus and Scylax take no notice of the Gætulians, which renders it probable, that, when those writers lived, they were very obscure. The first authors that mentioned them were probably some of those old historians from whom Livy extracted the materials for his work; since he gives us to understand, that a corps of them served under Hannibal in the second Punic war. That general, according to him, having taken and razed Acerræ, formed a design upon Casilinum, and sent a body of Gætulians, under the command of their general Isalca, to attack it. Isalca soon took post before the town, when, finding every-where a profound silence, and not observing a creature to appear, he imagined, that the garrison kept themselves still within the town through fear; which encouraged him to attempt forcing open the gates: but e

(C) Strabo calls these phylarchs kings, and tells us, that they so delighted in horses, that amongst them they brought up yearly an hundred thousand colts. He likewise informs us, that these horses, as well as the Gætulian larger cattle, had hoofs longer than those of any other nation (3).

(D) One custom, however, we must not pass over here. Lucan seems to observe, that the Gætulians were mixed with their cattle in their mapalia, as Dr. Shaw relates of the Bedouens in the kingdoms of Algiers and Tunis at this day. The former author also insinuates, that many of the Gætulians were carried about the country, with their Penates, in carts or waggons, after the manner of the antient Scythians (4).

- a he was repulsed by two Prænestine cohorts ; who, falling out upon him, cut many of the Gætulians to pieces, and obliged the rest to retire, with great precipitation, to the Carthaginian army, which was advancing to support them. Whether or no Massinissa, who so greatly extended his conquests in Africa, ever subdued them, history informs us not ; but we are assured by Sallust, that his grandson Jugurtha taught them to keep their ranks, and instructed them in military discipline. However, they served that prince more by plundering the allies of the Romans, than by their bravery in time of action ; for the army he had raised and disciplined in Gætulia was easily routed by Marius near Cirta. That part of Gætulia under the dominion of Juba, for it does not appear that the whole country was ever subject to him, revolted
- b to Julius Cæsar ; but, that with Numidia it was reduced into a Roman province, we cannot positively affirm ; especially, since Augustus gave a part of Gætulia, probably this, with the Mauritania, to the younger Juba, as an equivalent for Numidia, his father's kingdom, which, says Dio, had before put on the form of a province. Be that as it will, it was ravaged by Sittius, as has been already observed, when Juba had drawn all his forces out of it, in order to join the Pompeians ; which might possibly occasion the aforesaid revolt. About the year of Rome 759. the Gætulians rebelled against king Juba, massacring all the Romans settled in his dominions, and committing most dreadful ravages in all the provinces subject to him. Dio ascribes this defection to the resentment of the Gætulians, who were extremely incensed against
- c the Romans for imposing a prince upon them, and not permitting them to live under their government. But however this may be, Cornelius Cossus gave them so complete an overthrow, that they were obliged to submit upon the terms he thought fit to prescribe. This was looked upon at Rome as so considerable an exploit, that he had triumphal honours decreed him, and was permitted to assume the cognomen Gætulicus. Notwithstanding which, this people so recovered themselves, that in the elder Pliny's time they had settlements in Numidia and Tingitania, as may be inferred from that author and Philostatus *.

C H A P. IV.

The history of the Melanogætuli, Nigritæ, and Garamantes.

- d PTOLEMY places the Melanogætuli, or black Gætulians, between the mountains Sagapola and Ufargala, in a district south-east of Gætulia Propria, to which it is contiguous, and north of the river Nigir. They were a nation undoubtedly different from the Gætulians, and considered in that view by Ptolemy, though Cellarius insinuates them to have been a tribe of that people. Their complexion not only evinces this, but likewise, that their progenitors were different from those of the Gætulians. Of course therefore the Daræ ought not, as Cellarius imagines, to be looked upon as a clan of the Melanogætuli ; nor does the situation of Leo's Dara above-mentioned quadrangle with such a supposition. Mount Ufargala is called by Leo Guar-gala, and by Dr. Shaw Huer gla. The former of those authors informs us, that near
- e the foot of this ridge of mountains there were, in his time, some castles, and a great number of villages, whose inhabitants were very rich, as being adjacent to the Agades, an opulent trading nation, and all of them perfectly black. Ptolemy says, that the Bagrada derives its streams from some fountains on mount Ufargala ; but the latest observations demonstrate this to be a mistake. The modern district of Wad-reag in the province of Constantina, containing a collection of twenty-five villages, ranged in a N. E. and S. W. direction, seems to correspond with a part of the country of the Melanogætuli, according to Dr. Shaw. Ma-jyre, the nearest of these villages to Zaab, a territory answering, as should seem, to the south-eastern part of Gætulia, is ten leagues to the S. of El-Fytbe, the last village of Zaab. Tum-marnab, the next
- f place of note, is six leagues to the westward of Ma-jyre, and twelve to the N. E. of Tuggurt, the capital of Wad-reag, and the Tegort of Leo. Tuggurt stands in a plain, without any river running by it ; the inhabitants, as well as those of the other villages

villages of Wad-reag, being supplied with water by wells, dug a hundred, and sometimes two hundred, fathom deep. This method they are obliged to have recourse to, their territory being in a manner destitute both of rivulets and fountains. They dig through different layers of sand and gravel, till they come to a sleeky kind of stone like unto slate, which is known to lie immediately above the abyss, called by them The sea below-ground. This stone is no sooner broken through, than a flux of water ascends so suddenly, and in such abundance, that the person let down to perform the operation has sometimes been overtaken and suffocated by it, though raised up with the greatest dexterity. The country likewise of the Beni Mezzab, situated thirty-five leagues to the S. of the mountains of the Ammer, supposed to be a part of the Mons Phruræsus of Ptolemy, the large village of En-gousab, thirty leagues to the S. W. by W. of Tuggurt, and the populous city of Wurglab, with their dependencies, even to the banks of the Nigir, our learned and ingenious traveller believes might have been included in Melanogætulia. As Ptolemy places the Melanogætuli next to the Pharusii in a southern direction, fixing his Nigritian Ethiopians in a tract lying to the N. of the Nigir; and as Mela, Pliny, and Strabo, seem to give the Nigritæ exactly the same situation with regard to the Pharusii and the Nigir, but are quite silent as to the Melanogætuli; we cannot help thinking the Melanogætuli and Nigritæ one and the same people. If this be admitted, it will appear extremely probable, that their territories extended to the Nigir, and that they had some places of note in those parts; since, according to Ptolemy, many towns stood not far from that river, of which the principal were Pesside, Saluce, Nigira, Tbige, Cupbe, Thamondicana, and Vellegia. The most noted rivers of this country were the Gir and the Nigir. The Gir, or, as it is now called in our best maps, Gbir, had its fountains on mount Phruræsus, or, according to Dr. Shaw, the mountains of the Ammer. It took its course through part of the Sabara, in a S. E. direction, some degrees to the southward of the tropic of Cancer. The ingenious traveller just mentioned believes the modern Wed Adge-dee to be the Gir of Ptolemy, Agathemerus, and Claudian. But the principal river of Nigritia, and one of the most famous in the world, is that called by Ptolemy the Nigir, by the Nigritians Wed, or Huid Nijar, i. e. The black river, and by the Europeans the Niger. This river, according to the best modern geographers, has its source near a ridge of mountains in the kingdom of Gorban, not far from the confines of Abassia, or upper Ethiopia. It crosses the whole region of Nigritia in a western direction, and, after being swelled by the accession of several rivers in its march, at last discharges itself into the Atlantic ocean. The Negroes likewise call it the river of Senegal, and the Arabs the Nile of the Nigritians; this last nation considering it as a branch of the Nile, or rather the Nile and the Niger as two branches of the same river. According to Pliny and Leo, it overflows the adjacent territories in the same manner as the Nile; which, if true, may be another reason for the Arabic appellation. If any credit may be given to Leo, and the African historians, Sabtecha, the son of Cush, first peopled the Sabara betwixt the mountains of Atlas and Nigritia, and therefore probably Nigritia itself, or at least part of it. From the same author it appears, that the various Nigritian dialects bear an affinity to the Chaldee, Arabic, and Egyptian tongues; to which we may add, and consequently to the Ethiopic, which does not differ widely from them. As for the customs, &c. of the people we are now upon, they must be reserved for that branch of the modern history to which they most properly belong. Our readers may likewise there expect to find an accurate geographical description, and natural history, of this country from the best observations that have been made; since it would be absurd to insert them here, as the antients were so little acquainted with it. The Carthaginians, however, had undoubtedly some knowledge of the Nigritæ, since it appears probable from Frontinus (A), that one part of their armies consisted of Nigritian

(A) From the passage of Frontinus here referred to it is evident, that the Carthaginians had Melanogætulian or Nigritian troops in their service before the time of Gelou, and consequently that they had some knowledge of the Blacks above five hundred years before the birth of Christ. This will enable us to account for a strange phenomenon in antiquity, i. e. several antique coins with a Negro's or Nigritian's head upon them. One of these coins is to be found in the earl of Pembroke's invaluable cabinet, and another in that of the reverend and learned Mr. Wise, custos archivorum, and fellow of Trinity-college, in the university of Oxford. That of my lord Pembroke, being well preserved, is a most noble curiosity. Mr. Wise received his from one of the authors of this history, who had it from Mr. Beswick, whose brother was for some time the British consul at Tripoly, near which city it was found. As the Carthaginians

- a tian troops. They used scythed chariots in their wars, and were armed after the manner of the western Ethiopians, i. e. with bows and arrows of the same make, as we learn from Strabo. According to the same author, the Pbarusii, and therefore, probably, the Nigritæ, adjacent to them, travelled in caravans through the deserts to Cirta, and kept open a communication with the Maurusii, carrying with them bottles filled with water, tied to their horses bellies, lest they should die of thirst in the vast deserts they were obliged to traverse. From this passage it is undeniably clear, that these Pbarusian and Nigritian merchants must have lived at a vast distance from Cirta, and those places of Mauritania to which they resorted; a point that evinces the Negroes, or Blacks, to have held an early correspondence with the ancient Mauritanians, Numidians, and Carthaginians.

- b THE Garamantes were situated to the S. E. of Gætulia, and E. of the Nigritæ. ^{The Garaman-}
 The limits of their country we cannot take upon us to ascertain (B); though, from ^{tes.} what the antients have delivered in general concerning it, we may presume, that it extended to the borders of the (C) proper Ethiopia. That it consisted of many large territories, may likewise be inferred (D) from Herodotus, Virgil, Festus Avienus, and others. However, it was not of any very considerable breadth, according to Strabo. Dr. Shaw believes, that part of the ancient Garamantes spread themselves over that tract comprehending the districts of Gad-demz, Fezzan, and some of the more distant cities and villages of the kingdom of Tripoli. Be that as it will, the region we are now upon abounded with wild beasts, and its most ancient inhabitants were so savage, that they fled at the sight of a person belonging to any other nation. They were at the same time intirely destitute of arms, and had not the courage to defend themselves, if attacked; from which circumstances 'tis apparent, that they industriously avoided all kinds of correspondence with other nations. However, in process of time they built towns, or rather dashkras, the principal of which were Garama, the metropolis, near mount Girgiris, and the source of the Cinyphus, Debris, and Matelgæ. They likewise associated with the Marmaridæ, a neighbouring people; and carried on a trade with the Carthaginians, Arabs, Persians, and Ethiopians. This could scarce be avoided, if one branch of the Carthaginian commerce extended to those remote countries by means of caravans, passing to Carthage from thence through the sandy deserts of the Garamantes; which we cannot think improbable. Though several arguments might be offered in support of this opinion, we shall content ourselves here with observing, as a strong presum-ginians had a communication with Nigritia, 'tis probable, that they sent some of their artificers upon certain occasions thither; and since they coined money in a very elegant manner, as above observed, we may conclude, that, upon some extraordinary event, either in Nigritia, or their own dominions, they struck those pieces. This will receive a farther accession of strength from the country wherein Mr. Wife's was dug up, which was subject to the Carthaginians; that nation being in possession of all the maritime territories extending from their capital city to the borders of Cyrenaica (1).

(B) That the Misulani, Misulami, or Misulani, were seated near the country of the Garamantes, or at least not at a very great distance from it, appears from Tacitus. But we can neither precisely determine the situation of this Numidian tribe, tho' at the foot of mount Andus, nor that of many others, viz. the Nasabuses, Mucumi, Tulensu, Machusa, Taladusa, &c. (2).

(C) Virgil joins the Garamantes with the Indians, only to denote, that they were both very remote nations, and that the Roman empire was to extend, or rather did extend, to the farthest parts; for they were not contiguous to each other, Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, &c. lying between them. So Horace, when he would intimate, that the merchant traversed the remotest regions for gain, says, where he is not to be understood as intending precisely the Indians, but any nation at a vast distance from Rome. Servius and others confirm what we here suggest (3).

(D) We might here give our readers a catalogue of the names of towns and clans, said to have appertained to the Garamantes by Pliny and Ptolemy; but as the situation of none of them can be defined, and nothing but their names has been transmitted down to us by those authors, we think an insertion of it intirely superfluous. No rivers of note, belonging to the country of the Garamantes, except the Cinyphus, or Cinypus, and the Gir, are taken notice of by the antients; nor do they mention any mountains in it, except those called by Ptolemy Girgiris and Vallis Garamantica (4).

tion of its truth, that, according to several authors, the Garamantes, Persians,^a and Ethiopians, supplied the Carthaginians with vast numbers of gems, which were almost invaluable. Norwithstanding the cowardice of the most ancient Garamantes mentioned by Herodotus, yet, in after-ages, their posterity seem to have been of another disposition, as may be collected from Pliny, Tacitus, and Festus Avienus. Some of them roved about the deserts of Libya in the same manner as their successors the modern Bedoueens do at this day; whilst others inhabited the (E) dasskras scattered up and down these parched and unfruitful plains. The former lived very frugally in their mapalia, and supported themselves by hunting, which sometimes they continued to the winter solstice; the wild beasts being refreshed by the copious rains which fell at that time, and affording them then excellent diversion. Nay, according to Herodotus, they hunted the Troglodytes themselves, a barbarous nation living in caves under-ground, in vehicles, drawn by two pair of horses, made for that purpose. Nigritia, and the country of the Garamantes, seem, for the most part, to have been peopled at first from Egypt and Ethiopia, and consequently to have been the descendants of Misraim and Cush, though we doubt not but some colonies of Arabs likewise settled here. It appears from some of the most perfect Egyptian mummies now remaining, that the features of the ancient Egyptians much resembled those of the present Negroes; which is a proof, that the latter must have been originally nearly related to the former. The language, or languages, therefore spoken in these regions bore a great affinity at first to the Egyptian, Arabic, and Ethiopic; and may at this time, probably, be impure dialects of them. We have no farther particulars of moment relating to the religion of the Garamantes, than that they, in common with the Arabs, Indians, and Ethiopians (F), worshipped Jupiter Ammon (G), representing him, for the most part, with a ram's head, or, at least, with ram's horns, and had a famous temple sacred to him. Pliny mentions a surprising fountain near Debris, whose waters, from noon to midnight, grew extremely warm, but from thence to the sun's next approach to the meridian were so cold as to be congealed. Matrimony did not prevail amongst the Garamantes, the men making use of the women just as they fell in their way. At first they were governed by heads of tribes, or phy-larchs, as the Gætulians, Arabs, &c. but afterwards monarchy seems to have taken place amongst them, as we learn from Tacitus. Pliny mentions a king of the Garamantes, who was brought back from exile by two hundred dogs, that resisted all who opposed them. Though Ptolemy asserts them to have been a large and powerful nation, extending themselves from mount Ufargala to the lake or morass Nuba, yet we find scarce any of their affairs recorded in history. Masinissa took refuge amongst them, after he had been driven out of his dominions by Syphax. As the roads to their country from Mauritania were rendered impracticable by robbers, the Romans knew little of them till after the expiration of the republic. Lucius Cornelius Balba intirely subdued them, for which he had a triumph granted him by Augustus. However, by some means or other, they afterwards shook off the Roman yoke; since we are informed by Florus, that, some years after, Cossus detached Curinius with a body of troops against them and the Marmaridæ; and by Tacitus, that the king of the Garamantes joined Tacfarinas, in the reign of Tiberius, against the Romans. After

(E) Herodotus informs us, that in the country of the Garamantes there was a pillar, or rather mountain of salt, with a fountain issuing from the summit of it, and palm-trees covering the adjacent lands; that the natives first laid fresh earth upon the salt, and then sowed their corn there; and that they bordered upon the Lotophagi, whom we shall presently have occasion to mention (5).

(F) The great veneration in which the nations here mentioned had Jupiter Ammon, as well as the form under which he was exhibited to public view in this temple, appears from the following lines of Lucan:

Ventum erat ad templum, Libycis quod gentibus unum
Inculsi Garamantes habent: stat corniger illic
Jupiter, ut memorans, sed non duc fulmina vibrans, Aut similis nostro, sed tortis cornibus, Ammon.

(5) Herodotus. l. iv.
Lucan. l. i.

(6) Herodotus. l. iv. Diod. Sic. l. iii. Lucan. l. ix.

(7) Virg. Æn. iv. 611.

Non illic Libyca posuerunt ditia gentes
Templa, nec Eois splendent donaria gemmis, Quamvis Æthiopum populis, Arabumque beatis Gensibus, atq; Indis unus sit Jupiter Ammon.

Herodotus says, that Ammon was represented by an image with a ram's head, because Hercules saw his statue covered with the skin of a ram; and Diodorus, because Jupiter, in all his wars, wore a helmet resembling the head of that animal. But this representation seems to have been rather an allusion to the great numbers of sheep produced in Libya (6).

(G) 'Tis intimated by Virgil and Silius, that Tarbas, cotemporary with Dido, was a descendant of Ammon, and that he reigned over this country. But the authors, from whom they extracted this notion, are now lost (7).

- a the last defeat and death of Tacfarinas, they sent ambassadors to Rome to appease the resentment of Tiberius; which we suppose was done by an absolute submission to him, since it appears probable, that the Roman empire extended on that side almost, if not intirely, to the northern bank of the Nigir ^b.

As for the Nubæ, Perorsi, Tarualæ, Mimaci, Astacusi, Aroncæ, Dermones, Mattites, Gongalæ, Nabathræ, and many other obscure nations inhabiting that part of Libya Interior called by the antients the western Ethiopia, and extending from the Nigir to the Line, we have nothing to say of them; the old geographers having handed down to us only their bare names. However, it will be proper to observe, that the vast tract occupied by them comprehended the upper or proper Guinea, together with the kingdoms of Gago, Guber, Bilo, Temian, Ouangara, Dauma, Biafara, Mujac, Medra, and some districts of that of Gorban. Hence it appears, that the antient Nigritia was but a part of the modern Negroland; and that in early times the Nigritæ, or Negroes, went by the general name of Ethiopians. As we find likewise the promontory Soloës, or Soleentia, situated in the country we are now upon, and several places to the south of it, taken notice of by Hanno in his perip'us, we may conclude from hence, that the Carthaginians had a knowledge of the Blacks some hundred years before the destruction of their state by the Romans. That the Greeks also were not ignorant of them in the age of Scylax, may be inferred from that author; but as both he and Hanno stuffed their journals with fables, scarce any thing probable relating to them can be drawn from thence. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus have given us faint descriptions of the customs and dispositions of some few of their clans, which will hereafter be touched upon. Pliny and Ptolemy were greatly in the dark with regard to all particulars of moment concerning the western Ethiopians; and Strabo only intimates, that, as scarce any intercourse had ever been kept up between them and the Roman empire, the accounts published of them, in his age, were little better than downright fictions. To infer therefore a collection of such idle tales, would be unbecoming an historian; since it could neither afford instruction, nor give any real entertainment, to the rational part of his readers ^c.

CHAP. V.

The history of the Libyans and Greeks inhabiting the tract between the borders of Egypt and the river Triton, comprehending Marmarica, Cyrenaica, and the Regio Syrtica.

SECT. I.

The history of the Libyans of Marmarica.

- d MARMARICA, according to Scylax, Pliny, and Agathemerus, with whom Strabo and Ptolemy agree in the main, was bounded on the east and west by Egypt and Cyrenaica; on the south by the Sabara, or deserts of Libya Interior; and on the north by the Mediterranean. After passing the Glaucum Promontorium, cape Deris, the port Leucaspsis, and other inconsiderable promontories and harbours, just mentioned by the antient geographers, we come to Paratonium, called Ammonia by Strabo, a city of considerable note. Florus styles this city and Pelusium the two horns

horns of Egypt; from whence it appears, that he looked upon Marmarica as part a of Egypt, and Paratonium as a fortress of great strength. The last article is confirmed by Hirtius, who seems to intimate, that he received some annoyance from it, though the garison could not hinder him from supplying himself with water. We learn from Procopius, that it remained for a long time dismantled, but at last had its fortifications repaired by the emperor Justinian. At some distance from Paratonium towards the frontiers of Cyrenaica, stood Apis, a town so denominated from the Egyptian deity of that name. Pliny relates, that it was famous on account of certain sacred mysteries celebrated in it; which, in conjunction with the name, insinuates vast numbers of the Egyptians and Marmaridæ to have resorted hither, in order to pay their devotions to Apis. Trisarchis, Zagylis, and other places on the sea-coasts, enumerated by Ptolemy, are so obscure, that they merit no regard. The principal Libyan nations inhabiting this region were the Adyrmachidæ and Ammonii, as appears from Scylax and Herodotus. As for the Zygrita, seated near the Greater Catabathmus, and the Buzes, lying more to the south, they are rarely mentioned by the ancients. However, it may not be improper to observe, that the chief towns of the former were Azicis, Tuceitora, and Tachorsa; and the capital of the latter Tbanuthis. Pliny mentions the Mareotæ as a people seated near the Adyrmachidæ. Some authors seem to make the Marmaridæ a nation inhabiting a particular territory contiguous to the greater Catabathmus; but we are inclined to believe, that Marmaridæ was a name common to all the Libyans of Marmarica. If so, all these Libyans drank chiefly beer brewed at Alexandria; though sometimes they used Libyan wine. The Adyrmachidæ, according to Silius, fought with an ensis falcatus, or scymetar; and, if Scylax may be credited, were seated not far from the Canopic mouth of the Nile. Ptolemy, on the contrary, places them, in his nome of Libya, more remote from the sea. It was a common custom with their wives to wear a chain of brass on each leg; to take great pains in dressing their hair; and if they happened to find a louse, to kill it with their teeth, in revenge of the bite they received, and then to spit it out again. Their virgins, before marriage, were brought into the king's presence, that if any one of them pleased him above the rest, he might lie with her. We learn nothing farther concerning them, except that they wore the Libyan habit, from whence probably they derived their name, Addermuch in Arabic denoting a particular kind of garment, and agreed almost in all points with the Egyptians, which tallies with what has been already observed. The (A) Ammonii, so called from Jupiter Ammon, or Ammun, their chief deity, lay nearer Cyrenaica, and about ten days journey from Thebes in the upper Egypt. Ptolemy mentions a place named Alexander's camp, and the city of Ammon, as appertaining to this nation. Arrian, on the other hand, will not allow Ammon to have been a city; but says, that it was only the spot of ground on which the temple of Ammon stood. It seems probable from Herodotus, that the Ammonii were a pretty populous nation, had a king of their own, and made war upon their neighbours; though part of their territories could be considered only as a barren sandy desert. Pliny makes the temple of Ammon fifteen days journey from Memphis, and mentions the Ammoniac nome of Egypt. Diodorus Siculus relates, that though the aforesaid (B) temple was furrounded by a sandy desert,

(A) Herodotus affirms the Ammonii to have been originally a colony of Egyptians and Ethiopians; and that they spoke a language composed of words taken from both those nations (1).

(B) Diodorus Siculus tells us, that this district was fifty stadia square, and that the inhabitants there enjoyed a perpetual spring. He likewise intimates, that within the first wall of the castle stood the palace of the ancient kings of Ammonia; within the second the Gynaecium, containing the apartments of the royal family; and within the third places for the household troops to lodge in. He farther relates, that at a small distance from the walls there was another temple of Ammun, shaded with fruit-trees, and having a fountain close by it, called Fons Solis, from the surprising effects of the Sun upon its water. The image of Ammun, according to him, was adorned with emeralds, and other precious stones of great value, and gave responses to those who came to consult the oracle in a singular and unusual way; being carried about in a golden ship by eighty priests, who advanced to the place whither the god, by a nod, directed them, great multitudes of matrons and virgins at the same time celebrating his praises in songs composed after the manner of their country.

Diodorus also gives us to understand, that when Alexander the Great was introduced into the temple of Ammon, the senior vates addressed himself to him in the following terms: God save thee, my son, and assume to thyself this title, which Ammon confers upon thee. To whom, according to the same author, that prince replied: I accept it, father; and, provided you'll enable me to conquer the world, I shall ever esteem it as the greatest honour to be called your son. Upon which the priest approached the altar; and when the persons lifting up the image, according to custom, upon

- a yet its proper district abounded with trees bearing great plenty of fruit, and was beautified with fountains; that it had several streets or villages in the neighbourhood of the temple, a castle fortified with a triple wall, and near it a holy fountain, called the fountain of the Sun, since the qualities of the water varied wonderfully every twenty-four hours. Pedonia, Pnigeus, Climax, and other inconsiderable mediterranean towns, deserve not the least attention; nor are the small islands on the coast, Pedonia, Phocusæ, Ænesipasta, Ædonis, or Ædonia, important enough to be described. We learn from Herodotus, that Cambyfes, having advanced to Thebes, in his way to Ethiopia, detached from thence a body of fifty thousand men, to lay waste the country of the Ammonii, and burn the temple of Jupiter Ammon. But after several days march over the deserts, a strong and impetuous wind beginning to blow from the south, at the time of their dinner, raised the sands to such a degree, and brought in such a torrent upon them, that the whole corps was overwhelmed thereby, and perished. Alexander the Great, near two hundred years after, met with better success in his journey to the temple aforesaid. Authors are not intirely agreed whether the Marmaridæ are to be looked upon as Libyans or Egyptians; but the greatest part rank them amongst the former. Father Calmet, in particular, thinks, that Marmarica was first peopled by the descendants of Lebabim, the son of Misraim, mentioned by Moses. However, he believes, that the limits of the Lebabim, or Lubim, are not known, and consequently, that they might have reached much farther than
- b the borders of Cyrenaica; especially, since almost the whole continent of Africa is sometimes called Libya. If then the Marmaridæ were Libyans, what has been already delivered concerning the origin, religion, customs, &c. of the Numidian and Libyan Nomades, &c. will, in a great measure, hold true of them. Be that as it will, Herodotus assures us, that there was a great affinity betwixt them and the Egyptians, in most points of moment. Though therefore, in compliance with the general opinion, we have here detached Marmarica from Egypt, yet, as from very remote antiquity it was subject to the kings of Egypt, and consequently ought to be considered as appertaining to that monarchy, for an account of the transactions of which it was the theatre, we must beg leave to refer our readers to the history of Egypt, as well as
- d those of the Persians, Macedonians, and Romans, who successively subdued this kingdom^a.

The history of Cyrenaica.

- e CYRENAICA was bounded on the east by Marmarica, on the west by the Regio Syrtica, on the north by the Mediterranean, and on the south by the Sabara. Limits of Cyrenaica.
- In the geography of Cyrenaica, we find none of the antients inconsistent with themselves but Strabo, who, almost in the same breath, asserts it to have extended as far as Egypt, and maintains that Marmarica lay betwixt those two regions. The maritime towns Darnis, Cbersis, Phycus, Aptungis, &c. were of no great repute, and therefore we shall pass them by; as likewise the promontories Phycus and Zephyrium, the ports Parætonius, Naustathmus, &c. with several other places of less note. The principal towns in this tract were Cyrene the metropolis, Arfinoe or Teuchira, Berenice, Ptolemais or Barce, and Apollonia, from whence the best part of it was named
- f Pentapolis. Adriane or Hadrianopolis, so denominated from the emperor Adrian, a signal given, moved forwards, the priest answered, That the god had granted his request. He then inquired whether any of his father's murderers had escaped justice? To which the oracle cried out: Express thyself better, since no mortal can kill thy father; but all the murderers of PHILIP have been brought to condign punishment. The pretended deity afterwards told him, That the uninterrupted course of success he had met with, was a full proof of his divine origin; and that he should, for the future, ever continue to be victorious. In this manner did the artful priests of Ammon sooth Alexander's vanity, and draw from him many valuable presents; after which he returned with his army to the confines of Egypt (2).

could not vie with the others in point of antiquity, though it was no despicable a place. The castle Diacherfis, Tower of Hercules, port Diarrhæa, promontory Boreum, near the Greater Syrtis, deserve little attention; nor is any thing further to be said of Automala, or Automalax, than that it was a fortress of considerable strength upon the frontiers of the Regio Syrtica^b.

City of Cyrene.

THE city of Cyrene, now called Cairoan, or Corene, stood at some distance from the sea, upon a spot of ground in figure resembling a table, according to Strabo. It was large and populous, abounding with all the elegancies, as well as necessities of life. Its territory produced vast numbers of excellent horses, which probably made the Cyreneans, whether Libyans or Greeks, apply themselves to the study and practice of every thing relating to those animals more than most other nations. Berenice,^b Teucbira, Ptolemais, Apollonia, and Adriane, stood along the coast of the Med. terranean; and their inhabitants carried on a considerable trade. Cyrene derived its name from the fountain (C) Cyre, near which it was situated. Bochart deduces Cyre from the Phœnician קור kur, the radix of מקור makur, fons; which, considering that the Carthaginians assisted the Greeks in settling themselves here, and were acquainted with the country long before their arrival, is by no means improbable. We shall pass by here the religion, language, customs, &c. of the proper Cyreneans; since whatever has been said of their Greek ancestors, on each of these heads, is equally applicable to them^c (D).

Nature of the soil, &c. of Cyrenaica.

THOUGH a great part of Cyrenaica and the Regio Syrtica was a perfect desert, yet there were some fruitful plains in both those countries. The inhabitants were very subject to fevers, which some have attributed to the insalubrity of the air. Except the Lathon, we find no considerable river of Cyrenaica taken notice of by the antients, and some of them have even fixed this in Mauritania. The Montes Velpi and Anagombri are the only mountains that seem to claim any relation to the country we are now upon; as the Palus Paliuri is the only fountain or lake. Some authors have placed the gardens of the Hesperides here, but others in Mauritania. The latter opinion appears to us the most probable, since it better corresponds with the word Hesperides, which imports a western situation; and therefore we have already taken notice of those gardens in the history of Mauritania. Some parts of Cyrenaica and the Regio Syrtica were famous for the production of the silphium, a plant or shrub^d greatly celebrated by the antients. The Libyans looked upon the stalk, juice, leaves, fruit, and every thing belonging to this plant, as most precious; and consequently esteemed it infinitely above all other vegetable productions. Strabo intimates, that the Libyan barbarians had destroyed almost all the roots of the silphium in their excursions before his time, which is confirmed by Scribonius Largus. Pliny relates it to have been so scarce in his age, that a stalk of it was presented to Nero as a singular curiosity; and yet, that the laser, a gum proceeding from the silphium, or laserpitium, as we find it sometimes called, was not difficult to be met with in the reign of Severus, may be inferred from Galen. Aristotle, Aristophanes's scholiast, Tzetzes, Hesychius, and Suidas, insinuate the figure of the silphium to have been struck on the Cyrenean coins; which is confirmed by many of them, that are still to be found in the cabinets of the curious. The Carthaginians carried vast quantities of the laser and silphium from Charax, a city near the confines of Cyrenaica, into their dominions, for which they supplied the Cyreneans with wine. This vegetable the Cyreneans offered to their first king Battus, whom they deified, looking upon it as the most valuable

(C) Justin says, that this Cyre, or Cyra, was a mountain, but at the same time intimates, that it abounded with fountains; which countenances Bochart's etymon, as well as the notion we have followed (3).

(D) It may not, however, be improper to take notice of one particular custom of the Cyreneans, which seems to have been peculiar to them. When any person of distinction amongst them was invited to an entertainment, he brought a great number of friends, chariots, &c. with him (4).

a produce of their country ; for which reason we find it on the reverses of several of that prince's coins. That Cyrenaica likewise abounded with a most rich and uncommon oil, we are informed by Theophrastus. Athenæus relates, that the roses, violets, and all other flowers growing in this country, except the saffron, were famous for the fragrant odours they emitted ; and that in the time of Berenice a most charming ointment was made of the Cyrenean roses. As for the silphium, great quantities of it were imported into Greece, and many other countries. The antients prepared it various ways, both for food and physic, as appears from Athenæus and Hippocrates, to omit many other authors^d.

THE principal nations of this tract, or at least contiguous to it, were the Barcæi, Principal nations of this tract.
b the Pŷlli, and the Nasamones ; the Aŷyŷtæ, Macatutæ, &c. being too obscure to merit any regard. Barce or Barca, the capital of the Barcæi, we find mentioned by Strabo, Pliny, Scylax, and Ptolemy ; the two former of which make it to have occupied the same spot that Ptolemais afterwards did, but the two latter are of a different opinion. It seems to have stood to the west of Cyrene, and had a port near the Greater Syrtis. As Ptolemais was a maritime city, it is most probable, that it stood by the port of the Barcæi, and not where Barce did ; especially, since that capital was an hundred stadia from the sea, according to Scylax. Herodotus affirms Barca to have been built by the brothers of Arceŷiaus III. king of Cyrene, above a generation before the beginning of Cyrus's reign ; but we rather think, that it was of Phœnician, if not Egyptian, or Libyan extraction ; for Barca was a Phœnician name, well known in these parts of Africa, as appears from Silius Italicus, and others. Servius intimates the citizens of it to have come originally from Carthage, which would tempt one to believe, that Barca, Dido's brother, who attended her into Africa, with some of his countrymen, settled here. It is evident from Virgil and Silius, that the Barcæi spread themselves over several considerable parts of Libya ; and from Servius, that their metropolis made the greatest figure of any city in the region we are now upon, except Cyrene. St. Jerom confirms the last authorities, when he asserts this town to have been situated in a desert ; and its inhabitants, or at least their descendants, to have dispersed themselves over several districts lying as far to the westward as Mauritania, c and the eastward as India. The Barcæi learned, says Stephanus, the art of managing horses from Neptune, and of driving chariots from Minerva ; which evidently points out their high antiquity. They agreed, in most particulars, with the other Libyan Nomades already mentioned. The modern kingdom and desert of Barca, extending from Egypt to the confines of the kingdom of Tripoli, correspond with the antient Marmarica and Cyrenaica ; though they undoubtedly received their name from the Barcæi. This may be looked upon as an additional proof of the rank this people formerly held amongst the various nations of Libya^e.

THE Pŷlli and Nasamones, according to Pliny, Silius, and Lucan, must have been seated near the Greater Syrtis ; or behind the Regio Syrtica and Cyrenaica, if we chuse
e to follow Strabo. The Pŷlli, as Herodotus informs us, having once had all their reservoirs of water dried up by the south wind, advanced into the Sabara, in order to make war upon that wind ; but it blowing with extreme violence, they were overwhelmed with torrents of sand, and all perished. After which tragical event, their neighbours the Nasamones annexed the territories they possessed to their own dominions. Herodotus represents the Nasamones as a powerful nation in his time, and remarkable for some singular customs then prevailing amongst them. During the summer-season, they left their cattle on the coast, and dispersed themselves over the plains of Ægila, in order to get the fruit of the palm-trees, with which that place abounded. Here likewise they found an immense quantity of grasshoppers, which,
f having dried in the sun, they pulverized, and infused them in milk. The liquor composed of these two ingredients was highly esteemed by them, as a most pleasant and rich kind of drink. They had many wives, which they used in public, like the Massagetæ, after having erected a staff for a mark. The bride, amongst them, a lay the first night with all the guests invited to the wedding; and received from each of them the next morning a present, which he had brought with him for that purpose. When they took an oath, they laid their hands on the sepulchres of those who were generally esteemed to have been the most just and excellent persons amongst them. At their divinations, they went to the tombs of their ancestors; where, after certain prayers, they fell asleep, and grounded their predictions upon the dreams that then happened to them. In pledging their faith to each other, they mutually presented a cup of liquor; and if they had none, the parties took up some dust from the ground, which they put into their mouths. From some authors it appears, that the Nasamonæ were looked upon by the ancients as little better than a great gang of b robbers; since they made frequent incursions upon the territories of their neighbours, which they plundered and ravaged in a dreadful manner. We learn from Philostratus, that a people of the same name was seated in Ethiopia. The Libyan nations here mentioned possessed the countries they inhabited long before the Greeks built Cyrene.^f

Battus the Theræan, according to Herodotus, with a colony of his countrymen, settled first in Plataea, an island on the coast of Libya. From thence they removed to that part of the continent opposite to this island, and seated themselves in a delightful province, surrounded with agreeable hills, and watered by two rivers running on each side, called Aziristus. After six years residence here, the Libyans conducted c them to Irasa, a most charming country to the west of Aziristus. In this region, near a fountain sacred to Apollo, they fixed their habitations, and built Cyrene, about the third year of the thirty-seventh olympiad, according to Eusebius. We find nothing farther remarkable related of Battus the first, except that he lost the stammering in his speech by the following accident. Being one day wandering alone in a desert place, he was surprised by a lion, which, unexpectedly rushing upon him, struck him with such terror, that he lifted up his voice in an extraordinary manner. This, according to some authors, so frightened the lion, that he immediately fled, and at the same time delivered Battus from the impediment he before laboured under. His son Arcesilaus the first probably made no great figure, since history is intirely d silent as to any particulars of his reign. Battus II. son to Arcesilaus, built the city of Zoa, and reigned forty years, and his son Arcesilaus II. sixteen; which is all that we know of them. Battus III. son to Arcesilaus II. surnamed The happy, being strengthened by the accession of a vast number of Greeks, who came to live under his government, defeated Apries, king of Egypt, in a great battle, near the fountain Thestis in Irasa. The victory was so complete, that scarce any of the Egyptian troops returned home; so that Adicran, a neighbouring Libyan prince, who had drawn Apries upon Battus, could not afterwards make head against the Cyreneans, nor consequently give them any obstruction in the possession of those territories they had before wrested from him. Arcesilaus III. the son of Battus III. succeeded him; whose e brothers, on account of some disputes they had with him in the beginning of his reign, retired out of his dominions, and, as Herodotus will have it, built Barca. Before that city was finished, they found means to excite Arcesilaus's Libyan subjects to a revolt. However, he marched against them with an army, and pursued them into the eastern parts of Libya. But having there assembled a powerful body of forces, they came to a resolution to give him battle; which soon after they did, and totally routed him, cutting seven thousand of his men in pieces. Arcesilaus, in a short time after this disaster, was dispatched by his brother Aliarchus, who, in his turn, was put to death by that prince's wife Eryxo. Battus IV. Arcesilaus's son, surnamed The lame, mounted the throne after his father's death. In his reign Demonax, f a Mantinean legislator, arrived at Cyrene; and, at the king's desire, introduced several alterations into the preceding form of government. Arcesilaus IV. son to the former prince, endeavouring to put the Cyrenean constitution upon its former footing, was driven by his subjects to Samos; his mother Pberetima at the same time escaping to Salamis in the island of Cyprus. Euelthon, who then reigned there, made her many magnificent presents, but found means to evade sending an army to reinstate her son in the possession of his dominions. Arcesilaus afterwards retired to Barca, having married the

- a daughter of Alazar, king of the Barcai; but was assassinated there, together with his father-in-law, as he was walking in the market-place. In the mean time Pheretima established her authority at Cyrene; and, after her son's death, applied to Aryandes, the Persian governor of Egypt, for assistance, to revenge Arcefilaus's death, who, she pretended, was murdered for his close attachment to the Medes. She had some grounds for such an application, since her son had put himself under the protection of Cambyfes, and acknowledged himself a tributary to him. Aryandes first sent a herald to Barca, to demand whether the Barcai had been guilty of the assassination of Arcefilaus; and, upon their acknowledging it, he sent a land-army, commanded by Amasis, and a fleet, under the conduct of Badres, to take vengeance of the assassins. The Persians soon invested the city of Barca, and carried on the siege ineffectually for the space of nine months. However, (E) at last they made themselves masters of it by treachery. Amasis, after the reduction of Barca, put the city into the hands of Pheretima; who caused all the men concerned in the murder of Arcefilaus to be impaled round the walls, and affixed near them the breasts of their wives, which she ordered to be cut off for that purpose. The place, by her consent, the Persian general gave up to his soldiers to be plundered; though he spared those persons who had been averse to the assassination of Arcefilaus, and permitted Pheretima to put Barca into their hands. Badres, the Persian admiral, had a strong desire, before his return to Egypt, to plunder Cyrene; but was prevented by Amasis:
- c The Libyans extremely harassed the Persians in their march, cutting in pieces all the stragglers they met with, which must have been many, since they attended the enemy to the borders of Egypt. All the prisoners were sent to Darius Hystaspis, in whose reign those transactions happened, who settled them in a district of Bactria, which was from them denominated Barca. Pheretima is said afterwards to have been devoured alive by worms, which the historian looks upon as a punishment inflicted upon her by Providence for her enormous cruelty. From this time the Cyreneans, and Libyans with whom they were intermixed, till the conquest of the Persian empire, are not very remarkable in history. Aristotle gives us to understand, that in his time Cyrene was a republic; which seems to imply, that, upon the extinction of
- d Battus's line, Demonax's form of government took place; tho' the Cyreneans might have been tributary to, or at least under the protection of, the Persians. It appears from Sallust, that the people of Cyrene were free, when the contention happened betwixt them and the Carthaginians about a regulation of limits; and that they were governed by their own laws, till the Macedonians subdued Egypt, we find asserted by Strabo. Towards the beginning of the ninety-fifth olympiad, one Ariston seized upon Cyrene, put five hundred of the principal citizens to death, and obliged all the others to abandon the city: but matters were soon after composed, and all former acts of hostility buried in oblivion. Alexander had not been long dead, when Timbro invaded Cyrenaica, overthrew the Cyreneans, and obliged them to buy a peace with
- e five thousand talents of silver, and half of their armed chariots. However, Mnasiclus a Cretan, one of his officers, afterwards spirited them up against him, forced him to abandon the port of Cyrene, and obtained several considerable advantages over him. Notwithstanding which, Timbro, bringing them to another general action, intirely defeated them, though he was soon after overthrown by Ophellas, and taken

(E) Herodotus relates, that when the Persians endeavoured to sap the foundations of Barca, an artificer in brass discovered their subterraneous approaches in the following manner: He carried a brazen shield round the city within the walls, and, applying it to the ground, heard no noise where the earth was solid; but when he came to the parts which were undermined, the shield rung. Upon which discovery, the besieged fell to countermining, killed all the Persians they found in the mines, and dismounted all the enemies engines of battery. Amasis therefore, finding he could not take the city by force, had recourse to the following stratagem: He opened a large trench in the night, which he covered with slight planks of wood, and threw a proper quantity of earth upon them; which rendered that part like the adjacent ground. Early the next morning, after a conference with the besieged, he concluded a treaty with them upon the spot that was undermined, the terms of which were to the following effect: "That the agreement should continue in force as long as the earth on which they stood should remain in the present condition; that the Barcai should pay a competent tribute to the king of Persia; and that the Persians should introduce no innovations into Barca." The Barcai then opened their gates to Amasis, upon the faith of this treaty. That general, finding himself master of the town, in order to free himself from the oath he had just taken, ordered the covering of the trench to be broken down, and afterwards treated the inhabitants in the manner here related (f).

prisoner. This victory rendered that general master of Cyrenaica, and he delivered a it into the hands of Ptolemy. However, it seems probable, from what we have observed in the history of the Carthaginians, that Opbellas, by some means or other, obtained the sovereignty of this country. Magas, the brother of Ptolemy Lagus, whose daughter Ptolemy Philadelphus married, reigned at Cyrene fifty years, as we learn from Agatharchides. That this prince was a man of genius, appears from Polyænus, who has transmitted to us an account of one of his stratagems. Plutarch intimates, that Nicocrates, tyrant of Cyrene, being in love with Aretephila, the wife of one Phadimus, or, as Polyænus will have it, Melanippus the priest of Apolo, killed her husband in order to enjoy her; and that she dissembled her resentment, till she found an opportunity of destroying him; which she at last did, and thereby delivered her country from servitude. But whether this last event happened before the time of Magas, or afterwards, we are not given to understand. Be that as it will, it remained under the kings of Egypt, till Ptolemy Physcon made it over to his bastard son surnamed Apion, who, in the year of Rome 658. left it by will to the Romans. The senate, instead of accepting it, permitted all the cities to be governed by their own laws; which immediately filled the country with tyrants, those who were most potent in every district endeavouring to make themselves sovereigns of it. This threw the kingdom of Cyrenaica into great confusion; but Lucullus in a good measure restored the public tranquillity, on his coming thither during the first Mithridatic war. The descendants of those (E) Jews, settled here by the first Ptolemy, c are said to have greatly contributed to the disturbances just hinted at. Be that as it will, all troubles could not be finally removed, till this country was reduced to the form of a Roman province, which happened about twenty years after the death of Apion, and seventy-six before the birth of Christ. Strabo tells us, that in his time Crete and Cyrenaica formed one Roman province. Upon a revolt Cyrene was ruined by the Romans; but they afterwards rebuilt it. In process of time it fell to the Arabs, and at last to the Turks, who are the present possessors of it &c. For some of the principal learned men it produced, we shall refer our readers to the following note (F).

(E) Amongst the descendants of these Cyrenean Jews may be ranked Jason, who wrote the history of the Maccabees in five books, of which the second book of Maccabees, still extant, is an abridgment; Simon, who carried our saviour's cross; and others mentioned in the acts of the apostles (5).

(F) This country produced several persons who made an illustrious figure in the republic of letters, amongst the principal of whom may be ranked the following:

1. Aristippus, a disciple of Socrates, and the chief of the Cyrenæic sect. He lived about the ninety-sixth olympiad, and the year of Rome 360. He was the first that took money of his scholars for teaching them philosophy. He once sent his master Socrates twenty mina's; but that philosopher refused it, saying, God would not permit him to receive it. Xenophon was an enemy to him; on which account he wrote a treatise against pleasure, in order to expose him. Theodorus and Plato likewise were very severe upon him. He could adapt himself to all persons, places, and times, and, without difficulty, act any part: which rendered him agreeable to Dionysius. He went frequently to court, kept several mistresses, and, amongst the rest, the famous Lais; and lived deliciously, in conformity to the principles of his philosophy. When he was censured by an acquaintance for living too luxuriously, he said, That if it were not a good thing to feast and eat well, people would not practise it on their holy festivals. He was extremely quick at repartees, as appears from Digenes Laertius. He asked a certain person, who reproached him for having had a sumptuous entertainment, Whether he would not have lived in as elegant a manner, if he could have done so for three oboli? To which the other replied, he would. Then, said he, I find you are fond of money, and not of pleasure. One time a fellow pursuing him with approbrious and scurrilous language, and asking him, Why he made such haste away? Because, said he, show art accustomed to give foul language, and I am not accustomed to bear it. Dionysius had once three harlots to wait upon Aristippus, out of whom he ordered that philosopher to chuse one; but he carried them all three off, saying, That PARIS had greatly suffered by preferring one goddess to another. One desired to know of him what he would have for educating his son; to whom he answered, Five hundred drachma's. I can buy a slave, answered the other, for that sum. Do so, replied Aristippus, and then you will have two. He wrote three books of the history of Libya, which he dedicated to Dionysius; and a volume consisting of twenty-five dialogues, composed partly in the Ætæic, and partly in the Doric dialect. The principles of his philosophy were these: The soul has two particular motions, or sensations, viz. pain and pleasure; all pleasures are alike; virtue is only so far to be esteemed, as it conduces to

The history of the Regio Syrtica.

THE Regio Syrtica, so called because the two Syrtis were the northern extremities of its eastern and western limits, was bounded on the north by the Mediterranean; on the south by the country of the Nasamones and the Sabara; on the east by Cyrenaica; and on the west by Africa Propria. The tower of Euphrantas, and the town of Charax above-mentioned, were the principal maritime places in the neighbourhood of Cyrenaica, as Auxiqua, Leptis Magna, Garappa, Abrotonum, Sabrata, and Tacape, were on the sea-coast betwixt the rivers Cinyps and Trilon. As for Gerisa, Iscina, Amuncla, Sicapba, Musta, Butta, and several other obscure mediterranean towns mentioned by Ptolemy and the Itinerary, we scarce ever find them taken notice of by any antient historian. The Cinyps of Scylax, however, seems to have been a city of some repute. Pliny and Herodotus intimate, that there was in this region a fruitful district called Cinyphe, which, as well as the city above-mentioned, might have been so denominated from the river of the same name. To pass by the Samanycii, Damenfii, Nigbeni, Nycpii, Nigintimi, Muchthufii, and many other inconsiderable tribes recited by Pliny and Ptolemy, the only nations of this country deserving any regard were the Cinetbii, Gindanes, Maca, and Lotophagi. The Cinetbii, or Cinibii, mentioned by Ptolemy, situated behind the Machyni, about the Lesser Syrtis, were a respectable nation, as we learn from Tacitus. The Gindanes, according to Herodotus, sensuality. For all the other particulars of his life, we must refer our readers to Diogenes Laertius. His name seems to confirm what several authors have suggested of the Cyrenians, viz. that they were famous for being good horsemen.

2. Arta, daughter to Aristippus, who presided over the Cyrenaic school after the death of her father.

3. Aristippus the younger, son to Arta, by whose instructions he became a famous philosopher, and from thence was styled Metrodidactos.

4. Anniceris, who reformed the Cyrenaic sect, or rather founded another that was called the Annicerian.

5. Callimachus, a celebrated poet and historian, the son of Bastus and Mesasma, and disciple of Hermocrates the grammarian. He married the daughter of Euphrates Syracusanus, and lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus, being then the royal librarian. Several pieces we find ascribed to him, tho' he was no voluminous author, it being a trite observation with him, That a great book was a great evil. The principal of these were: 1. A satirical poem upon his adversary, whom he called Ibis. 2. Those hymns which are still extant. 3. Artia, or a treatise upon the origin and causes of sacred things, taken notice of by Martial. 4. A poem intitled de coma Berenices. Suidas mentions another Callimachus, nephew to this, as a tolerable poet; but 'tis generally agreed, that he did not make any great figure in the learned world.

6. Eratosthenes, the son of one Aglaüs, or, according to others, Ambrosius, a celebrated philosopher and mathematician, in great favour at the Egyptian court. He was the scholar of Aristo the Chian, Lysanias the grammarian, and the poet Callimachus. He flourished in the hundred-twenty-sixth olympiad, being about that time librarian to the king of Egypt. He first asserted the ambit or circumference of the earth to be two hundred and fifty-two thousand stadia; on which account we find him styled the measurer of the earth. Besides his philosophical pieces, he wrote some poems, several historical and astronomical tracts, a collection of dialogues, and some observations relating to comedy. He died at eighty-one years of age.

7. Carneades, the son of Epicomus, or Philocomus, and founder of the third academy, which differed but little from the second founded by Arcehilas. He pretended to discover an uncertainty in the most evident notions, and was a grand stickler against the Stoics, attempting vigorously to confute Chrysippus one of their principal pillars. Carneades did not much apply himself to physic and natural philosophy, but cultivated morals with particular diligence. His surprising eloquence made him feared by the Roman senate, during his residence at Rome with two other ambassadors. Whilst he was there, he is said to have disputed admirably well for justice one day, and the next against it. He gave himself up so intirely to study, that he neglected frequently all other things; insomuch that he sometimes sat at table, and forgot to eat, till roused from his thoughtfulness by his maid Malissa. According to Diogenes Laertius, he died in the eighty-fifth year of his age, about the fourth year of the clxii. olympiad, though Cicero stretched his life to ninety, which makes it difficult to determine precisely the time of his death. The former author says, that when Carneades understood, that Antipater had poisoned himself, he did the like; and likewise makes an eclipse of the moon to have then happened. He is said to have written many letters to Ariarathes king of Armenia. For a fuller account of him we must beg leave to refer our readers to Diogenes Laertius, Cicero, Anlus Gellius, Valerius Maximus, and others.

8. Cronus Apollonius, the master of Dionysius the logician, whose name was assumed by his scholar (6).

were seated not far from the Cinyps; their wives wore as many borders on their gowns as they had lovers, and she who had the greatest number was the most esteemed. The Maca bordered upon the Garamantes, and were a pretty potent nation. They shaved their heads all over, except the middle of the crown, where they permitted a lock of hair to grow. When they made war upon any of their neighbours, they wore the skins of ostriches instead of armour. In the winter they drove their flocks to the sea-side, and in summer to the inland places near some fountain or river, for the sake of water, according to Scylax. They are called likewise by the antients Maca Cinypii, and Maca Syrtisæ, from their vicinity to the Cinyps and the Greater Syrtis. But the Lotophagi were the most famous people of the tract we are now upon. If we may believe Scylax, they extended themselves almost from the Greater to the Lesser Syrtis. That author calls them Libyes Lotophagi, and tells us, that the lotus served them both for meat and drink; from which circumstance they derived their name. Pliny says, that some authors called them Alachbrow, and that many of them were found about the Philenorum Ara. Strabo likewise affirms the country of the Lotophagi to have extended from the Lesser Syrtis, which he calls Lotophagitis Syrtis, to the confines of Cyrenaica; and that this people were not sensible of the want of water in the burning sandy region they inhabited, since the root, stalks, &c. of the lotus supplied them with rich liquor as well as delicious food. Homer relates, that in his time the island Meninx, on the coast of Byzacium, abounded with the lotus, and was the chief seat of the Lotophagi; as also, that Ulysses touched here in his return to Ithaca. A good part of the Regio Syrtica was a perfect desert; but the other part productive of corn, oil, fruit, and particularly both the tree and plant of the lotus. Herodotus tells us, that the fruit of the tree was of the same size with that of the lentiscus, but exceedingly sweet like the date; as also that the Lotophagi made wine of it. Pliny says, that the lotus was transplanted to Italy, but that its qualities were pretty much altered by that transplantation. He likewise asserts its fruit to have been of the size of a bean, and of the colour of saffron, when ripe; tho' he allows this to have been different, according to the different degrees of maturity at which it arrived. In Africa it resembled that of a myrtle. The best species of this tree produced a fruit without any kernel; but that of the other had a kernel in it as hard as a stone. The wine expressed from it tasted like mead, being extremely sweet; which quality it derived from the fruit itself, but would not keep above ten days. The berries, bruised and mixed with wheat, the Libyans laid up in large vessels, which served them for food. Theophrastus and Dioscorides make the plant lotus to have resembled a lily, and represent it both as physic and food. Some of the moderns think one species of it to have been the same as the solocasia, or faba Egyptia, and the other as the nymphaea Nilotica. But though it might agree with these plants in many particulars, yet that it differed considerably from them, is evident from the figure of it, which we find on the reverses of many antient Egyptian coins. Several of these coins, struck in the times of Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius, exhibit the leaves, stalk, and fruit of the plant lotus, and consequently give us a tolerable idea of it; however, the moderns can come to no certain conclusions concerning either the plant or the tree. The principal river of this tract was the Cinyps, which derived its stream from a fountain, or a hill, called Zuchabari, in the country of the Maca, and emptied itself into the Sinus Syrticus. The word Zuchabari in Punic, Phœnician, or Libyan, signified the bill of the Graces, as we find it called by Herodotus. The river Cinyps, according to Bochart, derived its name from the great number of porcupines produced in the country adjacent to it. The chief mountains of the Regio Syrtica were Gigius and Tbizibi, of which yet we find nothing related but the bare names. The promontories Hippus and Cephalæ scarce deserve to be mentioned. Of the islands appertaining to this country the most noted were Meninx and Cercina; Ptolemy's Gaia, Pontia, and Misynus, being quite obscure. The island Myrmex more properly belonged to Cyrenaica, as it was not far distant from the port of the Barcai. Pliny makes Meninx (F), near the Lesser Syrtis, to be twenty-five miles long, and twenty-two broad; and further observes, that it had two towns,

(F) This island was called Girba about the middle age, and is at this day known by the name Zerbi or Zarbi (G).

^a viz. Meninx facing the coast of Africa, and Tboar opposite to the Lesser Syrtis. We find it named Lotophagitis, not only by the authors above-mentioned, but likewise by Polybius and Eratosthenes. As for Cercina, it lay N. E. of Meninx, was twenty-five miles in length, about twelve in breadth, had a tolerable good town of the same name, and two most commodious harbours. Thus stands the geography of the Regio Syrtica, with which tract the northern part of the kingdom of Tripoli seems at present to correspond ^b.

As the inhabitants of this region agreed in all points of moment with the other Libyan Nomades, whose history has already been given, we can say nothing of their antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, &c. (G) without being guilty of a repetition. The transactions they were concerned in, before they became subject to Carthage, could not, we apprehend, have been very considerable. However, we believe them to have been subdued by the founder of the Egyptian empire, whom Josephus and Sir Isaac Newton take to be the same prince with Sesac. How long they remained subject to the Egyptians, history informs us not; but 'tis probable a corps of them formed part of Zerah's numerous army, for the reasons already offered. Part of the Regio Syrtica seems to have been under the dominion of the Cyreneans till the regulation of limits agreed upon between that people and the Carthaginians mentioned by Sallust; but when this happened, cannot be precisely determined. After that regulation it continued in the hands of the Carthaginians till it was wrested out of them by Masinissa; for that it was wrested out of them by that prince, appears clearly from Appian. In after-ages it met with the same fate as the rest of his dominions, an ample account of which has been already exhibited to our readers in the history of the Numidians ^c.

Thus have we gone through the history of all the principal Libyan nations, which, we may venture to assure our readers, has not been done by any other author. Some few particulars, however, relating to them, hitherto omitted, we must not pass over in silence. Herodotus observes, that the Libyans in general went by the name of Atlantes or Atlantides, though at the same time he remarks that appellation to have been applied to one particular nation; who, he tells us, cursed the Sun every day, as he advanced towards the meridian, pursuing him with the bitterest invectives, because he consumed both them, and their country, with his burning rays. From that author and Diodorus it likewise appears, that the Atlantides were seated upon, and in the neighbourhood of mount Atlas, which, from its height, the Libyans styled the pillar of heaven, i. e. the high or lofty pillar; which evinces the Libyan language or languages to have been related to the oriental tongues. Herodotus also intimates, that no one of this nation did either eat flesh, or was ever disturbed in his sleep by dreams; the last of which properties was probably the consequence of the first. In the territories of the Atlantides, as well as the neighbouring countries, the inhabitants reaped considerable advantages from several mines of salt, which was of two colours, viz. white and purple. Herodotus farther says, that many of the Libyans built houses of this salt, which, as no rain ever fell in those parts, were very durable. To what has been already offered with regard to the Nigritæ, we must beg leave to add, that they were known to the Egyptians, Ammonii, and Cyreneans, before the time of Herodotus. For that author, when in Egypt, learned from some Cyreneans, who had the relation from Etearchus king of the Ammonii, that five bold Nasamonian youths, sent to make new discoveries thro' the deserts of Libya, at last came to a city inhabited by

(G) From Egypt to the lake Tritonis the Libyans were breeders of cattle; ate flesh, and drank milk; but abstained from beef and pork, as well as the Egyptians. The women of Cyrene accounted it a crime to strike a cow. For the customs, manners, and religion, of the Libyans inhabiting the country to the west of the Triton, we must refer our readers to Herodotus (7).

men of a low stature, by which ran a great river abounding with crocodiles, that Etearchus judged to be the Nile. This relation tallies extremely well with Marmol, who assures us, that the people seated on the northern bank of the Nigir are perfect dwarfs (H); and also seems to add some weight to the authority of the Arabian geographers, who make the Nile and the Nigir different branches of the same river, and assert the source of this river to be in Ethiopia. From hence we may deduce the probability of the Negroes being descended from the Ethiopians, and likewise the region of Nigritia's being peopled very early, as Leo suggests. For the Ethiopians on the banks, or near the source, of the great river above-mentioned, observing how the adjacent grounds were fertilized by its inundations, as they increased, might follow it westward, every one striving to be the first possessor of a great quantity of such excellent soil, and therefore advance forward till the Atlantic ocean put a stop to any farther progress. If this be admitted, it will follow, that the Blacks are not so different from all the rest of mankind as some are willing to suppose; that their descent from Adam is easy and natural, in opposition to what our modern infidels pretend; and that their colour is only an accidental consideration. But these points will be fully discussed in that branch of the modern history which they will naturally fall under. The word Libya may be deduced either from the proper names Lebaim, Lubim, &c. above-mentioned, or from the Hebrew laab, with which the Arabic lub corresponds, signifying dry, parched, &c. or rather a dry parched country, &c. Such an appellation agrees extremely well with what the antients have related of Libya, and particularly the tract betwixt Tripolis and Pentapolis, which went by the names of Xerolibya and Libya Propria. Dr. Hyde, however, thinks that this word may be more naturally deduced from labi, a lion, or rather a yellow, flame-coloured lion, with which species of animals Libya was known to abound; or else from labab, a flame, since the burning sands of Libya, by the continual reflexion of a vast quantity of the solar rays, appeared, at some distance, to travellers like a flame. As these sands were frequently so heated as to be almost in a state of inflammation, we must own some regard due to such an etymon. As for the word Africa, or, as the Arabs pronounce it, Afrika, which seems to have been unknown to Herodotus, Aristotle, Strabo, and the other most antient Greek authors, Dr. Hyde takes it to be the same with the Phœnician or Punic חברקה Harbarca, Havarca, Havreca, &c. or אברקה Avreca, i. e. The BARCA, or the country of BARCA. This our readers will allow extremely probable, especially since Barca was a most remarkable part of Africa, as above observed; and the Romans, who first brought the name of Africa into Europe, might not pronounce it exactly in the same manner as the Carthaginians and Phœnicians, from whom they received it. The principal difficulty in this etymon will vanish, when we consider, that the Orientals for the most part pronounced the second letter of their alphabet like a V, and that nothing was more usual with them than to add a letter to, or take one from, the beginning of a word, as might be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner necessary. We must not omit observing here, that the first division of the world was into two parts only, viz. Asia and Europe, or the eastern and western parts, Europe comprehending both the continent now going under that name, and Africa; which division still prevails amongst many of the Orientals. This may not only be inferred from a variety of authors, but likewise from the words Europe and Asia themselves, the former importing occidental or western, and the latter half. When that vast region now called Africa was first considered as a distinct part of the world, we cannot take upon us to determine; nor whether Europe and Africa were ever joined together by an isthmus uniting Spain and Mauritania, as some authors suggest; nor lastly, if this should be admitted, when, or by what means, such an isthmus came to be destroyed, the Nubian geographer declaring this to have been effected by labour and art, and Averroes by an earthquake. The island Cerne, taken notice of by Hanno and Scylax, seems to have been somewhere on the coast of Libya Interior; but in what part of the ocean it lay, cannot be discovered from the antients, who

(H) From the situation of the Nasamones, it is evident, that these youths must have approached the northern bank of the river, which the dwarfs here mentioned are said to have inhabited. Now Marmol assures us, that on the southern bank of the

Senegal the inhabitants are large and lusty, but on the opposite side small and puny; which last article, agreeing so well with Herodotus, almost demonstrates the river here hinted at to have been the Nigir (S).

(S) Marmol.

- a differ widely amongst themselves with regard to its situation; which probably induced Strabo to deny the very being of it. We must own ourselves likewise as much in the dark in relation to Plato's island Atlantis, which he makes of a larger extent than Asia and Africa together. Some of the moderns are disposed to think, from several circumstances, that it was that vast continent called now America; others, that it lay nearer the pillars of Hercules; and lastly, others, that every thing related of it is to be considered as a downright fiction. Much may be said in defence of each opinion; however, the first appears to us the most probable. For Ammianus Marcellinus affirms Plato on this occasion not to have written fable, but a true history; and Proclus cites Marcellus an Ethiopic historian in defence of what that philosopher has advanced concerning this island. Crantor also, Plato's first interpreter, takes this relation to be a true history. That the island here under consideration was not so near the Streights as some modern authors suppose, seems probable from Diodorus Siculus, who tells us, that the Phœnicians in early times sailed beyond Hercules's Pillars, along the African coast, and, there meeting with storms and tempests, were carried to the remotest parts of the ocean, and, after many days, came to a vast island at a great distance from Libya, and lying very far west. This place, continues the same author, had a fruitful soil, navigable rivers, &c. and, from the Phœnicians, the Carthaginians came to the knowledge of it. And in the same place he says, that the Carthaginians would not permit any other nation to settle in this new region, but reserved it for themselves, that, if ever they should be driven from their native soil, they might have a place to retire to. Ælian brings Silenus expressly asserting to Midas, that there was a vast continent beyond Europe, Asia, and Africa, which ought to be considered as islands surrounded by the ocean. These, and other passages, that might be extracted from the antients, induced the learned Perizonius to conclude, that the inhabitants of the old world had some faint knowledge of America, derived to them either from the Egyptian and Carthaginian traditions, or from the figure of the earth, which was not unknown to them^b.

The history of the Ethiopians.

S E C T. I.

Description of Ethiopia.

- d SEVERAL of the antients gave the name of Ethiopians to all persons either perfectly black, or of a very swarthy complexion. The Arabs therefore, and other Asiatics, as well as a great number of Africans, came under this denomination. The Africans we find divided into the western or Hesperian Ethiopians, and the Ethiopians above Egypt, situated to the E. of the former. The Hesperian Ethiopians inhabited that vast tract called Libya Interior, the history of whose principal nations we have already gone through. The eastern African Ethiopians, for so those above Egypt may be properly styled, were much better known to the antients than the others, by reason of their commerce with the Egyptians, and looked upon by them as the proper Ethiopians. These are the people, whose transactions, from the earliest accounts of time, we are now to relate; which we hope to do in such a manner

ner as will prove satisfactory to all, at least the most candid part of, our readers^a.

Limits and extent of Ethiopia.

Ethiopia then, or rather Ethiopia Propria, was limited on the north by Egypt, on which side it extended to the Lesser Cataract, and the island Elephantine; on the west by Libya Interior; on the east by the Red Sea; and on the south by a part of Africa unknown to the antients, but probably that including the modern kingdoms of Gingiro, Alaba, Machida, and part of Adel or Zeila. However, as the proper Ethiopia might be of a different extent at different times, particularly on the sides of Libya Interior and Libya Incognita, we cannot pretend to fix, with any precision, its frontiers. Nevertheless it seems, for many ages at least, to have been the same tract which at this day comprehends the kingdoms of Dongola, Sennar, and Abassia, with part of Adel or Zeila; and consequently to have taken up seventeen degrees of longitude, and to have reached from the tropic of Cancer to within six degrees of the Line. Ludolphus intimates, that the modern geographers, depending upon the authority of Paulus Jovius, have extended the southern limits of Abassia much farther; but at the same time that author rightly observes them to be guilty of a mistake. It is of no great consequence to our readers how this point stands, and therefore we shall not dwell any longer upon it^b.

Different names of Ethiopia.

THE proper Ethiopia had various names given it by the antients. Sometimes they called it India, and its inhabitants Indians; which appellation they applied to many of the remotest nations, as we have observed in the history of the Garamantes (A). This country was likewise denominated Atlantia and Æthiopia, according to Pliny and Strabo, or, as Hesychius will have it, Aeria. It also went, in very early ages, under the name of Cephenia. But we apprehend it to have been most usually called Abassene, a word approaching very near, both in sound and signification, to the modern Habash, Habesh, or Abassia; the true etymology of which will be exhibited to our readers, when we come to the history of Arabia^c.

(A) Bochart thinks, that the Garamantes were a colony of the Amantes or Hammaientes of Pliny and Solinus, seated to the W. of the Greater Syrtis. This notion he grounds not only upon the neighbouring situation of those nations, but likewise upon the affinity of their names. For as גר gar signifies in Hebrew to inhabit, Gar-Amante might originally have denoted The habitation or dwelling of the Amantes; or rather גר ger, from the aforesaid verb, may be naturally supposed to have signified colonus, advena, &c. and then Gar-Amante will be equivalent to One belonging to a colony of the Amantes. The last nation that ingenious author likewise believes to have been the same with the Ammonii or Amonii, whose name, by an easy transposition of letters, entirely agrees with that of Moses's Ananim or Anamai. Several things, according to him, concur to render this conjecture probable: 1. The Ananim in all likelihood deduced their name from the word אָנָם Anam, which might have denoted a sheep in the Egyptian language, as a word composed of the same letters did in Arabic. 2. According to some authors, the idol of Jupiter, in the territory of the Ammonii, was called Ammon from the ram that pointed out the spot of ground his temple was erected upon; and it is well known, that the Ammonii, in the opinion of the antients, were so denominated from Ammon or Ammius, a name the Egyptians gave Jupiter. 3. That part of Libya, where Moses seems to place the Ananim, abounded with sheep, which supplied the natives not only with food, but cloaths, and agreed very well in situation with the country of the Ammonii. 4. The idol of Jupiter Ammon had either ram's horns, or a ram's head upon it; which seemed to point at the origin of the word Ananim. If we admit what Bochart has advanced on this occasion, the etymon of the name Nasamones or Nasamon, applied to a neighbouring people, may easily be discovered. For Nasamon, on this supposition, must be apparently the same as נַשְׁמוֹן נַשְׁמוֹן Nase-Amon, i. e. Homines Amon or Ammonii; and consequently the Nasamones, as well as the Garamantes, were a branch of the Ananim. That the Garamantes, in their own tongue, were styled Gar-Amame, Ger-Amame, or, by contraction, Gar-Ame, Ger-Ame, &c. appears from the name of their metropolis Garama, or, as the Nubian geographer intimates it to have been denominated in his time, Germa. This observation will go a good way towards confirming those ingenious conjectures which we have here inserted from the learned Bochart; especially, since Herodotus affirms that part of Libya adjacent to the country of the Ammonii to have been famous for the sheep it abounded with. These nations were nearly related to the Ethiopians, as we learn from the same Herodotus (1).

- a. ON the other hand, we find Chaldaea, Assyria, Persia, &c. styled Ethiopia by some very good authors; nay, it must be allowed, that the ancients called all those countries, extending themselves beyond each side of the Red Sea, indifferently India or Ethiopia. The eastern people at this day sometimes name that kingdom India, which the Europeans call Abassia, particularly the Persians, who for the most part give the appellation of Siab Hindou or Hindi, to an Abassine or modern Ethiopian. It appears from several authors, that the Red Sea itself went formerly under the name of the Indian Sea; and Ludolphus observes, that the ancients denominated all those nations under the Torrid Zone, whose names they were ignorant of, Indians^d.

- ACCORDING to the Jews, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and other versions (B), ^{Called in Scripture Cush.}
 b Cush, when taken for a country in Scripture, is always to be understood of the proper Ethiopia. This notion is supported by Philo, Josephus, Eusebius in Eusebius, Eustathius, the author of the Alexandrian chronicon, and the concurrent testimony of the Greek and Latin fathers. Notwithstanding which, Bochart, depending upon the authority of Jonatban's Targum, and several plausible arguments, affirms the land of Cush to have been situated in Arabia; and consequently maintains, that Cush never in scripture denotes the proper Ethiopia. But neither of these opinions ought to be looked upon as strictly true: for Cush is sometimes in Scripture undoubtedly to be taken for the proper Ethiopia, as may be evinced not only by the great authorities above-mentioned, but several circumstances likewise which evidently point at that country; and, on the other hand, it must be allowed, that some of the sacred writers give the name of Cush to the whole peninsula of Arabia, or a part of it bordering upon the Red Sea, or both. When the prophet Jeremiah asks his countrymen, Whether the CUSHITE can change his skin? he must be considered as having in his eye a proper Ethiopian. For the nation there pointed at was black, differing greatly in colour from the Jews; the prophet's question being proverbial, of the same import with that common adage of profane writers, to wash the ETHIOPIAN or BLACKMOOR white. Now this cannot be understood of the Arabs, who were of much the same complexion with the Jews, as Bochart himself not only allows, but proves; but the Abassines, or proper Ethiopians, might easily and naturally have given occasion to such a proverb. In the book of Isaiah we find Egypt, Pathros, and Cush, joined together, and consequently Cush taken for Ethiopia. For it appears from various authors, and even Bochart himself, that the land of Pathros was either the upper Egypt, or a part of that country near the confines of Ethiopia; and therefore Cush, in this passage, must naturally refer to Ethiopia, since the region here denoted by that word was S. of the upper Egypt, and contiguous to it. In defence

(B) The eastern people affirm Cush the son of Canaan, and grandson of Ham, to have had a son whose name was Habashai or Habochi, the father of the Abyssinians or Egyptians, whom the Persians call Black Indians. The Hebrew grammarians derive the word Habashai, which signifies Ethiopia, from Habousha, which denotes a people raised from a mixture of different nations, originally of different countries. According to D'Herbelot and others, the Abyssinians, Nubians, and Fungi, are all comprehended under the word Habashai. The inspired writers are silent as to Cush the son of Canaan, and his son Habashai. We find mention made there only of Cush the son of Ham, and his sons Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, Sabtecha, and Nimrod. It is said, that Arabia Felix went formerly under the name of Ethiopia, because the Abyssinians, who conquered it, possessed it for a long time. Dhou-Iren king of Taman drove them from thence with the assistance of the Persians. Some authors believe, that by Cush upon the river Gihon is meant only the antient country of the Scythians upon the Araxes. Herodotus intimates, that the first habitation this people had was upon the Araxes; and that, being forced from thence by the Massagetae, they passed this river, and retired into the country of the Cimmerians. Justin makes the Phasis and Araxes to be, as it were, the limits of the Scythians on the south side. Diodorus Siculus says, that the Scythians who were near Media abode at first upon the Araxes, and that the Saca and Massagetae are different branches of the Scythians. The words Cuthai and Cutha, whence some have deduced Scythia or Scutia, are the same as Cush. The Chaldees generally put the Tan where the Hebrews use Schin, and therefore say Cut or Cuth instead of Cush. The Cuthians, who came to and inhabited the country of Samaria, did originally belong to that part of Media which bordered upon the Caspian sea, and therefore must have appertained to the Cush we are speaking of. There are very sensible footsteps of this name to be met with in various parts round about this country, as the district of Cotacene; the cities of Cisamum, Cotomana, Oya, Cotaca, Cotamba, Cotaa; the Coryi, Coffai; river of Ciffa, &c. of our second assertion, several passages of Scripture may likewise be produced. ^a When the LORD threatened Egypt with utter desolation, he declared, That he would lay it waste from the tower of SYENE to the border of CUSH (C). Now that the border of CUSH and the tower of SYENE are intended here to represent two opposite limits of Egypt, cannot be denied; and that Syene was the Egyptian frontier on the side of Ethiopia, appears from Pliny and Strabo: therefore CUSH evidently denotes Arabia, or at least that part of it adjacent to Egypt, which was diametrically opposite to the tower of Syene, and not Ethiopia, whose border extended to that tower. Moses's wife Zippora was a native of CUSH, and at the same time a Midianite; the prophet Habakkuk makes the territories of CUSHAN or CUSH, and Midian or Madian, to have been the same; Josephus, Ptolemy, and St. Jerom, mention a city of Arabia ^b on the coast of the Red Sea, called Madian; from all which we may infer, that part of Arabia at least goes sometimes in Scripture under the name of CUSH. Job intimates, that CUSH was famous for the excellent topazes it produced: now none of the ancients have taken notice of the Ethiopian topaz; whereas Pliny relates, that the best topazes came from the Arabic island Cbitis or Cbutis, whose name seems to have been the same with CUSH or Cuth; and Agatharchides Cnidius, Diodorus, and Strabo, have likewise mentioned this island; therefore some of the sacred writers denominated at least part of Arabia CUSH. In that day, says the LORD, shall messengers go from me in ships, to make the careless CUSHITES afraid, &c. which menace may be supposed more properly to point at the Arabs, whom the Egyptians and others visited in ships on the Red Sea, than the Ethiopians, with whom they had a communication by land. But, to omit other passages that occur, both the Arabs and Ethiopians might have very properly been styled CUSHITES, since the descendants of CUSH formed a great part of both nations. Nay, that the Arabs themselves had the appellation of Ethiopians, and Asiatic Ethiopians, clearly follows from what has been advanced by Xenophon and Herodotus. However, we cannot help thinking, that the ancient Hebrews rightly looked upon the Ethiopians as the proper CUSHITES. For Zerab's most formidable army consisted chiefly of CUSHITES, neighbours to the Libyans, i. e. the Ethiopians, of which people only he is called king by the sacred historian; though from Sir Isaac Newton, and what we have already observed, it may be proved, that he was in possession of all the dominions of Sefac, i. e. Egypt, Libya, Troglodytica, Arabia, ^d &c. The extremely numerous host he commanded adds great weight to this notion. Pliny intimates, that the Ethiopians, whom he distinguishes from the Arabians, were masters of Egypt not long before the destruction of Troy; which, considering that

(C) Our readers will observe, that, out of compliance to a great number of learned men, we have here given this text the most received interpretation; though we must own ourselves by no means inclinable to come into it. The words in the original are, מִמִּגְדוֹל וְעַד גְּבוּל כוּשׁ i. e. From Migdol to Syene and the border of CUSH; or From Migdol and SYENE, and to the border of CUSH. If we admit the first of these translations, we must suppose an ellipsis of the preposition עַד betwixt מִמִּגְדוֹל and כוּשׁ, than which nothing is more frequent in the Hebrew Scripture; as may be inferred from Deut. c. xxxiii. ver. 17. Mich. c. vii. ver. 12. and many other passages enumerated by Noldius. If we prefer the latter, we must admit a suppression of the copulative ו before כוּשׁ, which is likewise extremely common in the original of the Old Testament, as appears from Gen. c. xxvii. ver. 33. Cant. c. viii. ver. 6. Jud. c. ix. ver. 2. and an infinite number of other instances produced by the same Noldius. Now Migdol is the proper name of a town about twelve miles from Pelusium on the Nile near the coast of the Mediterranean, and diametrically opposite to Syene; and of course, in conjunction with Syene, denotes the whole breadth of the land of Egypt, agreeably to the prophet's intention. This city we had mentioned by the prophet Jeremiah, c. xlv. ver. 1. and c. xlvii. ver. 14. who joins it with Takpanhes, or, as the Greeks called it, Daphne, and Daphne Pelusia, another city in the neighbourhood of Pelusium. This circumstance, in conjunction with the Septuagint, which has therein Μαγδαλῶν, as Migdol, and εἰς Μαγδαλὼν in Migdol, renders extremely probable the version of this passage, which we would propose to the consideration of our learned readers. In the mean time we cannot but own ourselves greatly surprised at Cellarius, who has with so much boldness insinuated, or rather affirmed, that the Greek interpreters have, in agreement with the Vulgate, translated the text at present under consideration ἀπὸ πύργου Συήνης ἕως ὁρίων Ἀιθιοπῶν Whereas both the Vatican and Alexandrian MSS. of the Septuagint have it ἀπὸ Μαγδαλῶν ἕως Συήνης ἕως ὁρίων Ἀιθιοπῶν Which, together with the Arabic version expressing it From Migdol and ASUAN to the borders of ETHIOPIA, seems to render indisputable what is here advanced; and consequently, to evince, that this famous passage is so far from proving CUSH to point out Arabia, that, on the contrary, it evidently demonstrates that word sometimes to denote the proper Ethiopia (3).

We cannot therefore allow, that Ludim is the only name given in Scripture to the Ethiopians, as M. Bochart undertakes to prove. Most of the arguments he offers to evince this point are extremely frivolous, as our readers will find upon an examination of them, and the others not of any considerable force. But, supposing them to prove, that the word Ludim, in all places of Scripture he cites on this occasion, is to be understood of the Ethiopians, which is the utmost that he could ever have pretended to; yet it will not follow from hence, that Ethiopia is never called Cush by any of the sacred writers. Such an assertion cannot be maintained, though it ^b should be granted, as we are willing to do, that part of the Ludim took up their habitations in Ethiopia. And yet several learned men have come into Bochart's opinion ^c.

THE antients believed the blackness of the Abassines or Abyssinians to be occasioned by the intense heat of their climate, and therefore called them Ethiopians. We find them likewise called Ætherii and Aerii by Hesychius, Pliny, and Strabo. Pliny relates, that the Blemmyes, an Ethiopian nation seated near the borders of Egypt, had no heads, their mouths and eyes being fixed on their breasts. This ought undoubtedly to be looked upon as fabulous, and might possibly proceed from their having very short necks; however, that some Blemmyan captives exhibited an extremely odd appearance at Rome, we learn from Vopiscus. The Nobatae inhabited one of the banks of the Nile, near the island Elephantine, having been removed thither from Oasis, in order to have a watchful eye upon, and repress the courses of, the Blemmyes. Some authors refer the Troglodytes to Egypt, and others to Ethiopia; be that as it will, they were a very savage nation, living in caves, according to Strabo, feeding upon serpents, lizards, &c. and having a language consisting of no articulate sounds, but resembling the shrieking of bats, according to Herodotus. The Nubians we find just mentioned by the antients as a people of Ethiopia, but nothing particular related of them. Some authors assert the Pygmies to have been a canton of the Troglodytes, and others one of the Nubians; but 'tis generally agreed, that they had ^d their situation not far from the Ethiopic shore of the Red Sea. Nonnosus in Photius tells us, that they were extremely short, black, and hairy all over. Most of these nations are represented by Strabo as inconsiderable, and little better than so many gangs of robbers. Bochart thinks, that the Troglodytes, including the Pygmies or Pygmaei, were styled by the Hebrews סִכְיָי, i. e. Succbæi, from סִכְיָי succbab a den; for that word signifies as well a cave or den, as a tent. Hence it is natural to suppose the Troglodytic town Succba, on the coast of the Red Sea, mentioned by Pliny, the modern Suaquem, the seat of a Turkish bashaw, deduced its name. In support of this notion it may be observed, that the Septuagint and Vulgate versions render סִכְיָי Τρωγλοδυται, Troglodytæ, a word derived apparently from τρεῦγλαν, i. e. a cave, den, ^e passage, &c. and rank this people among the Cushites, Libyans, and other nations, that formed the numerous army of Sesac. The Aualitæ or Abalitæ were seated near the Abalitic gulf, which is all that we have to say of them. Agatharchides, Diodorus, Strabo, Ptolemy, and Agathemerus, inform us, that the Struthopbagi, who lived upon ostriches as big as stags, were seated immediately to the south of the Memnones. The Acridopbagi, Cbelonopbagi, Ichthyopbagi, Cynamolgi, Elephantopbagi, Rhizopbagi, Spermatopbagi, Hylophagi, Ophiopbagi, &c. derived their names from the locusts, tortoises, fish, bitch's milk, elephants, &c. they fed upon. The Acridopbagi were very small, swift, black, and short-lived, the oldest of them not exceeding forty years of age. They used locusts for food, with which they were plentifully supplied by certain winds that covered their country with them, as we learn from Diodorus and Strabo. ^f As for the Cbelonopbagi, they covered their houses with the shells of tor-toises, and lived upon their flesh. The Ichthyophagi occupied a maritime part of a Ethiopia, bordering on the Red Sea, and not far from the frontiers of Egypt. As they lived upon all kinds of fish, large as well as small, Aben-Ezra takes them to be the צִיִּים Tziim of the psalmist, to whom God gave the heads of Leviathan, under which name, according to that author, Moses comprehends all fish of a vast size, for meat. This notion seems to receive some accession of strength from several circumstances hinted at in the passage referred to. For the Troglodytes made their very bread of the flesh of fishes dried in the sun; the psalmist is there speaking of Pharaoh, and the Egyptians, who were drowned in the Red Sea, and afterwards thrown upon the Troglodytic shore; Tziim properly imports a nation inhabiting a barren dry country, such as was that of the Troglodytes; and other texts of Scripture, compared b with this, not a little favour such an opinion. They built their houses of whale-bones, and shells of fishes. The ribs served for rafters, and the jaws for portals. They fed their very cattle with fish. Some of them inhabited caves in mountains, formed by vast quantities of sea-weed from time to time thrown on shore, and consolidated by the force of the tide beating upon it, and perpetually bringing a fresh accession of matter to it, together with the heat of the sun. From this, as well as from what has been advanced by several authors, it appears, that the Red Sea was exceeding shallow at certain times; that it was covered with an immense quantity of this sea-weed, which gave it a very green colour; and that from hence the Hebrews denominated it יָם סוּף yam suph, i.e. The sea of the weed. The Cynamolgi kept great c numbers of dogs, in order to hunt wild beasts, and sometimes fed upon bitches milk. Pliny fabulously relates, that they had dogs heads. The Elephantophagi seem to have had their situation in the southern parts of Ethiopia, and destroyed elephants in a very dextrous manner, as will be related elsewhere. The Rhizophagi were seated not far from the conflux of the Astaboras, Astapus, and the Nile. Their territory abounded with morasses that produced a great number of canes, whose roots served them for food. The Spermatophagi and Hyllophagi formed two neighbouring cantons; the first of which fed upon the fruits that fell from the trees in the summer, but the rest of the year upon a sweet plant with a stalk something resembling that of a turnep; and the latter, with their wives and children, upon the buds and tender d shoots of trees. The Hylogones, neighbours to the Elephantophagi, lived for the most part in the woods, and generally slept on trees. Their curious method of killing lions, leopards, and other wild beasts, we shall hereafter describe. The Pamphagi used every thing indiscriminately for food; and the Agriophagi fed upon the flesh of wild beasts. The Opbiophagi or Serpent-eaters inhabited a very fertile tract, as we learn from Pliny. The Ethiopian Anthropophagi or Man-eaters, mentioned by Marcianus and Ptolemy, seem to have been the Cafres, and not a people of proper Ethiopia. As for the Gapacki, Ptoemphanes, Catadupi, Pechini, Catadra, and other obscure Ethiopic tribes, we know nothing of them but the bare names. The number of nations inhabiting antient Ethiopia will not surprise us, when we have seen Ludol- e phus's description of the kingdom of Abyssinia (D) s.

Cities.
Auxume:

THIS region did not abound in cities and towns of any considerable note. Auxume, Auxumis, or Axome, the metropolis of Ethiopia, according to Arrian and Nonnosus in Photius, undoubtedly was the same city as the modern Axuma, or, as the Abassines call it, Afcum. The noble palace, beautiful structures, &c. this city was formerly so famous for, sufficiently appear from the present remains of it. It

(D) To the clans or tribes here enumerated may be added the Hippophagi or Horse-eaters of Agathemernus, who were bounded on the south by the northern borders of Libya Incognita; the Macrobii, a powerful nation, some of whom attained to the age of an hundred-and-twenty years, according to Herodotus; the Sambri, not far from the Nubian city Tennupis upon the Nile, all whose quadrupeds, even the elephants themselves, were without ears; and the Asacha, a mountainous people continually employed in hunting of elephants (4).

- a stands about forty-five Portuguese leagues from the Red Sea, and in 14° 30' N. lat. It looks now like a village, being almost totally ruined, and scarcely affording shelter to a hundred inhabitants. Some authors relate, that there may be seen here the remains of a magnificent temple, which have supported themselves against the injuries of time. The Portuguese, who first visited this country, called Axuma corruptly Cbaxumo or Cassumo. Behind the temple above-mentioned, which was an hundred and ten feet in length, had two wings on each side, and a double porch, with an ascent of twelve steps, stand several obelisks of different sizes, and others have been thrown down by the Turks. Amongst the rubbish is a great square stone, on which appears some part of an antient inscription, so effaced by time, that it is not legible, and nothing can be distinguished except some Greek and Latin letters, and the word Basilus. When the Abassine monarchs were formerly crowned here, they sat on a throne of stone in the inner porch of the aforesaid temple. Pfelchis or Pfelcha, and Premnis, through which Petronius marched in his Ethiopic expedition, stood upon the western bank of the Nile, but their true situation cannot be discovered. Napata, where Candace queen of Ethiopia resided, was on the opposite bank, but in what direction it is to be sought for, we cannot precisely inform our readers. Ptolemy mentions two towns called Premis or Primis, one of which might possibly have been the Premnis of Strabo. The emporia or marts of Nalis, Mondus, Abalis, Mosylon, Coloe, and Opone, probably made a good figure in antient times, though we have no particulars of moment handed down to us concerning them. Petronius reduced Pfelcha, Premnis, and Napata, in the above-mentioned expedition, razing Napata, and leaving a garrison of four hundred men in Premnis, with provisions for two years. Pliny mentions a city of the Nubians upon the Nile called Tenupsis, with which possibly either Couxa, Nuvála, Galva, Duncála or Ielúc, all placed by the Nubian geographer near the conflux of the Nile and the Astaboras, may correspond. Duncála, the Dumcála of Jacutus, the Dungála of Leo, and the present Dongola, the capital of the Nubians, all whose cities are seated upon the Nile, seems to bid the fairest for it. None of the other towns taken notice of by the old geographers deserve the least attention ^b.
- Ethiopia*, as appears from the best modern geographical descriptions of Abassia, ^{Mountains.}
- d as well as the antients, was extremely mountainous; though we find no mountains of note taken notice of by the antients, except the mounts Garbata, and Elephas or Phalangis. Whether or no the mountains of Tigre, the highest of which is Lamalmon, beginning about two days journey from the Red Sea, answer to either of these, we shall not presume to assert; though that they did, by the situation assigned them, seems not improbable. Be that as it will, the path over Lamalmon, whose ascent is vastly steep and dangerous, is so narrow, that the person who gives way to another there falls headlong into an abyss, and is irrecoverably lost. Several provinces of Abassia, viz. Bagendra or Bagemeder, Gojam, Waleka, Shewa, &c. are but one continued chain of mountains, the principal of which are those of Ambara and Samen.
- e The Aorni, as the Abassines call them, are rugged rocks of such an incredible height, that the Alps and Pyrenees are but low hills in comparison of them. Curtius relates, that the Indians called a famous rock in their country Aornos, as being above the flight of a bird; but that author mistakes the etymology, since the word, from what has been here observed, cannot be looked upon as of Greek extraction. Amongst the mountains, and even frequently in the plains of Abassia, arise steep and craggy rocks of various forms, some resembling towers, others pyramids, &c. so even on the sides, that they seem to be the effect of labour and art; insomuch that men, cattle, &c. are craned up by the help of ladders and ropes. And yet the tops of these rocks are covered with woods, meadows, fountains, fish-ponds, &c. which
- f very copiously supply the animals seated thereon with all the conveniences of life. The most remarkable of these rocks is Gesben or Amba-Gesben, on the confines of Ambara, towards Shewa, prodigiously steep, in the form of a castle built of free-stone, and almost impregnable. Its summit is about half a Portuguese league in breadth, and its circumference at the bottom near half a day's journey. The ascent at first is easy, but afterwards so steep and rugged, that the Abassine oxen, which will otherwise clamber like goats, must be craned up and let down with ropes. Here the princes of the blood were formerly confined, in low cottages amongst shrubs and wild cedars, ^a with an allowance barely sufficient to keep them alive. There is, according to Kircher, in the province of Gojam, a rock so curiously hollowed by nature, that at a distance it resembles a looking-glass; and opposite to this another, on the top of which nothing can be so softly whispered, but that it may be heard a great way off. Between many of these rocks and mountains are vast profundities or abysses, which appear most dreadful to the eye. The natives call every one of the rocks above-mentioned Amba, as Amba-Salam, Amba-Gesben, Amba-Dorbo, Amba-Damo, Amba-Samet, &c.

Ethiopia.

IN so mountainous a region as Ethiopia the air cannot be always alike, and perhaps there is no country in the world where so many different seasons may be found in so small a compass. The Ethiopic, as well as the opposite coast of the Red Sea, ^b together with those low open places called by the modern Abassines Kolla, and the islands of this sea, are intolerably scorched by the solar rays in the summer-season; inasmuch that Gregory the Abassine related the heat in the island of Suaquema or Suaquena to be so intense as to excoriate any part of the body, melt hard Indian wax in a cabinet, and sear a garment like red-hot iron. However, the air is much more temperate in the mountainous parts; nay, according to Tellezius, the summer heats are milder in several districts of Abassia than in Portugal; and even in Samen the cold is more dreaded than the heat. In some provinces of Ethiopia the winter is extremely severe, in others as warm as the summer in several parts of Europe. The Ethiopians have little or no snow, but only a small sort of hail that sometimes covers the ground, ^c and at a distance looks like snow. Frequent and dreadful thunders, however, they have, attended with tempests that terrify both man and beast, which proceed from the excessive variety of air. Ludolphus thinks, that Gregory's four seasons, Matzau, Tzadai, Hagai, and Cramt, are in reality but three, i. e. the spring, which begins on the twenty-fifth day of September; the summer, consisting of two parts, the first called Tzadai, beginning upon the twenty-fifth of December, and the second denominated Hagai in the Abassine tongue, commencing on the twenty fifth of June; and lastly, Cramt, or winter, which concludes the Ethiopic year. The climate here in general is so healthy, that 'tis no uncommon thing for the natives to arrive at an hundred years of age; however, towards the beginning of the spring, that is to say, ^d in the months of September and October, an epidemic fever sometimes makes great havock amongst the inhabitants of Tigre.¹

THE days and nights in Ethiopia, as lying betwixt the tropic of Cancer and the Line, are for the most part nearly equal. The winds that blow on the mountains are generally speaking salubrious and pleasant; but the atmosphere over the plains, for want of them, stagnates, and becomes unwholesome. The wind Sendo, however, is far from being beneficial to the Abassines. It is a whirlwind so impetuously violent, that it throws down all before it, and therefore in some respect may seem to answer its name, which in the Ambaric dialect signifies a serpent or snake. Gregory told Ludolphus, that it might be seen, and represented an immense serpent, whose ^e head moved on the ground, and the body erected itself in curls and windings up to the sky. The soil in those parts capable of cultivation is extremely fertile, and produces vast quantities of grain, pulse, and fruit. Metals likewise, particularly gold, minerals, vegetables, and a surprising variety of animals, it abounds with; but these our readers will expect a description of in another place. We find it asserted by the best authors, that the Abassines have sometimes two, and sometimes three harvests in a year. They neither sow nor mow for the sake of their cattle, the perpetual heat, and continual distillation of moisture from the mountains, producing grass in great abundance, and covering the fields with a most beautiful verdure thro' all the different seasons of the year. Though they have most delicious grapes, and ^f honey is very cheap amongst them, yet they almost intirely confine themselves to malt liquor, which is not very unlike that brewed in some parts of Europe.¹ (D).

- a Or all the rivers, that water Ethiopia, the most famous is the Nile, which has ^{Rivers.} its source in that country. Many of the ancient geographers, and in particular Pto- ^{The Nile.} lemy, placed the fountains of this river beyond the Line, on some mountains which they called the mountains of the moon. But the moderns, particularly the Portuguese, have discovered this to be a mistake. What they have advanced on this head has been in a great measure confirmed by Gregory the Abassine in a letter to M. Ludolphus. According to that curious person, the spring-head of the Nile first appears in a tract called Secut, upon the top of Dengla, near the frontiers of Gojam, to the W. of Bagemdra, Dara, the lake of Tzana, and Bada. From thence it takes its course towards Ambara, leaving Gojam on the right, and Bagemdra on the left. Having
- b passed the limits of Ambara, and in such a manner surrounded the kingdom of Gojam as always to leave it on the right, it washes the confines of Waleka, and then approaches the farthest bounds of Mugara and Shewa. Then, running between Bizama and Gonga, it comes into the country of the Chankalas; from whence, winding to the right, and gradually leaving the western climate on the left, it advances towards the kingdom of Sennar. But before its arrival there, it is greatly increased by the accession of two large rivers from the east, viz. the Tacaza falling out of Tigre, and the Guangua descending from Dambea. After taking a view of the kingdom of Sennar, it moves to the borders of Dongola, and so to the kingdom of Nubia (E); from hence, turning to the right, it reaches at last a region called Abrim, where its
- c stream becomes unnavigable by reason of the cliffs and rocks, and soon afterwards enters Egypt. The travellers therefore from Sennar and Abassia, after having crossed Nubia, leave the Nile to the E. and cross upon camels a desert of fifteen days journey, where neither tree, water, nor any thing else but sand, is to be seen. From Abrim it continues its course to Rif or Upper Egypt, where the above-mentioned travellers again come up with it; and, after having traversed the kingdom of Egypt in a northern direction, empties itself into the Mediterranean near Alexandria. Father Payz, who viewed the fountains of the Nile himself, adds, that the source of this river consists of two round spring-heads, very deep, upon an eminence, the ground about which is quaggy and marshy; that, however, the water does not issue out
- d from thence, but from the foot of the hill, about a musquet-shot from whence, towards the east, the river begins to flow; that, winding then to the north about the fourth part of a Portuguese league, it receives another river, and a little farther two more from the east, soon after which it enlarges itself with the addition of several other streams; and lastly, that about a day's journey farther it swallows up the river Jema, and, after flowing twenty Portuguese leagues in a western direction, turns to the east, and plunges itself into a vast lake (F). 'Tis remarkable, that all the rivers of Ethiopia, at any considerable distance from the ocean, except the Hanazo rising in Hangota or Angote, and the Hawash or Awaxe running through the kingdoms of Dawara and Fatagara or Fategur, flow into the Nile. The Etesian winds contribute
- e little or nothing to the inundations of the Nile, though some authors have falsely imagined the contrary, nor the snow melted from the Ethiopian mountains, according to others, as Seneca and Ludolphus have fully evinced. But the prodigious mass of waters flowing from all parts, and proceeding from the immoderate showers

(E) 'Tis observable, that Gregory here distinguishes the kingdom of Sennar from that of Nubia, though at present they are looked upon to be the same. However, in our opinion, Gregory's authority is superior to that of Pomert and the missionaries, upon which that of the modern geographers depends. We find no mention of Sennar in any of that numerous tribe of oriental and other authors cited by the excellent Goliut in his incomparable notes upon Alfraganus, though they take notice both of Nuba or Nubia, and the country of the Fungi; therefore it should seem probable, that Sennar is only a part of Nubia, or else a kingdom different from it. The Nubian geographer intimates, that in his time the city of Senna, probably Sennar, was an inconsiderable place, and its district or territory distinct from the kingdom of Nuba or Nubia. Ludolphus makes the modern kingdom of Sennar to be the same with the country of the Fungi, and a part of the ancient Nubia (5).

(F) This is probably the lake of Tzana, through which the Nile passes, still preserving the colour of its own water. From hence, turning to the south, it washes on the left hand the principal kingdoms of Abassia, viz. Bagemdra, Ambara, Waleka, Shewa, Damota, &c. and takes along the rivers of those countries, viz. the Bashlo, Tzobha, Kecem, Jema, Roma, and Wencis. Then on the right hand surrounding Gojam, and swelled with the Muga, Abaja, Afwari, Temai, Gult, and Tzul, all rivers of that region, it bends again towards the west, leaves Abassia upon the right, and runs in a northern direction through several thirsty nations, and sandy deserts, in order to fertilize Egypt with its inundations (6).

with which the countries under the Torrid Zone are washed, when the sun returns into a the winter signs, undoubtedly occasions them. Juba makes the Nile to have had its source in Mauritania, as we learn from Ammianus Marcellinus; which runs counter to fact, as well as most other authors who have treated of this river. Perhaps he might extend the southern parts of Mauritania as far as the Niger, which agreed almost in all points with the Nile, as just observed; and therefore mistake the latter for the former, which he might falsely imagine had its rise in Mauritania, because it ran by the borders of that region. Strabo countenances this opinion, when he intimates, that the rivers in the southern parts of Mauritania abounded with animals and vegetables like those produced in and about the Nile (G). The modern Abassines, tho' they are not ignorant of the fountains from which the Nile deduces its source, are far b from being perfectly acquainted with the course of that river after it leaves them. However, the constant and antient tradition amongst them is, that near a certain mountain, at some distance from the city of Sennar, it divides itself into two streams, one of which runs to the westward, and forms the river Niger, and the other in a northern direction takes its course through Egypt. This we learn from the Nubian geographer, who at the same time intimates, that the channel running to the east of this mountain, watering Nubia and the land of Egypt, is divided in the Lower Egypt into four parts, three of which fall into the Syrian sea, and the other discharges itself into a salt lake near Alexandria. 'Tis probable, that the separation of these two streams is caused c by some rocky mountain meeting the river above-mentioned, and splitting it into two channels. Leo Africanus adds great weight to the authority of the Nubian geographer, when he assures us, that the Nile flows through the region of the Nigritæ. The Abassines, according to Gregory above-mentioned, say that the Niger separates from the Nile in the country of Dongola; that the greatest flow of water passes into Egypt; and that the other stream, descending towards the region of Elway, at last throws itself into the Atlantick ocean. All which seems to be confirmed by what we have lately observed from Herodotus, and by Pliny, when he assures us, that the Nile and the Niger agree in colour and taste of water, produce the same sort of reed, the same sort of paper, the same sort of animals, and increase, as well as overflow, at d the same seasons. If the above-mentioned particulars be admitted, it seems possible for the king of Abassia either so to stop up the fountains of the Nile, or so to divert the course of the river proceeding immediately from thence, that Egypt should not be overflowed; which would prove the total ruin of that kingdom. This receives some accession of strength from Elmacinus, who relates, that the khalif Muhsan sent Michael the patriarch with magnificent presents to the Abassine monarch, to prevail upon him to open the channel that conveyed water to Egypt, which for some time had been stopped. His petition that prince immediately granted. The consequence of which was, that the Nile, which had before greatly failed, rose three yards in one night, and rendered the land of Egypt as capable of cultivation as ever. e This has induced some authors to assert, that the grand signor pays an annual tribute to the king of Abassia, that his Egyptian subjects may enjoy all the advantages of the Nile's inundations which their ancestors have done. Gregory, cited above, intimated to Ludolphus, that he had heard from some Abassines of undoubted veracity, that near the Cataracts of the Nile the land to the east was a perfect plain; and that, by only opening a passage through one mountain for that river, it would flow rather that way than into the Mediterranean through (H) Egypt. However, we must own ourselves far from being certain as to this point; though a gentleman of most profound erudition, and unexceptionable authority, has informed us, that he met with a young Abassinian at Jerusalem, who intimated to him, that such a kind of notion still pre- f

(G) 'Tis not improbable, that the Segelmeffa was one of these rivers mentioned by Strabo; since, according to the Nubian geographer, it nearly resembled the Nile, in almost all particulars: nay, we are told, that the river Sus at present fertilizes all the adjacent country by its inundations, as the Nile does Egypt; which adds no small weight to the authority of Strabo (7).

(H) It is observable, that the kings of Abassia are still persuaded, that the keys of the Nile are in their hands, and that they can, when they please, change its course, as the king Teklimanont threatened the bashaw of Cairo towards the beginning of this century, that is, about the year 1706. That prince, being greatly incensed at the assassination of the sieur Du Roule a Frenchman at Sennar, threatened the bashaw with his resentment, in case an immediate stop was not put to such flagrant violations of the law of nations; telling him, that he could make the Nile the instrument of his vengeance, since God, by placing in his hands the fountains, passage, and increase, of that river, had put it in his power to make it do either good or harm (8).

a veiled amongst his countrymen. The present Ethiopians call their part of this river Abawi, though in the old Ethiopic language we find it styled Gejon or Gewon, probably by an ancient mistake from the Greek word Γαῖρ, Geon, or Hebrew Gibon, Gen. ii. 13. since some authors have imagined that river to be the Nile. The prophets Jeremiab and Isaiab give the river we are now upon the name of Sibor or Sichor, i. e. The black river, from the colour of its water, as the Greeks did that of Melas, and the Latins Melo, for the same reason. And, agreeably to this notion, Virgil says:

b *Et viridem Ægyptum nigra fecundat arena,
Et diversa ruens septem discurrit in ora
Usque coloratis amnis devexus ab Indis.* VIRG. Georg. l. iv. v. 291—294.

Dionysius Afer and Stephanus Byzantinus say, that the Ethiopians denominated that part of this river running through their territories Siris, which is evidently the same as Sibor; but that, as soon as it reached Syene, it received the name of (I) Nile. Besides the Nile, the ancient geographers mention two other rivers, called Aylaboras and Astapus, meeting near the island or peninsula Meroe, and joining the Nile soon after. As these rivers had their sources to the east of the Nile, the first deducing its streams from the lake Coloe in the district of Amaza, and the other from some fountains betwixt the mounts Garbata and Elephas not far from the Anahitic gulf, we must submit it to our readers, whether the modern Tacaza and Mareb, considering the situation and direction assigned them by the modern geographers, do not intirely correspond with them. Pliny, Heliodorus, and Sirabo, mention a third considerable river falling into the Nile, whose name they do not intirely agree in; but as it has been omitted by several of the ancient geographers, and especially by Ptolemy, who had the best means of informing himself as to the truth of every particular relating to it, we shall

(I) To what has been said of the Nile we shall beg leave to add the account of the rivers flowing into it, given us by the patriarch Alphonso Mendez. "The Nile, says he, receives several rivers, the most remarkable of which are the Baxilo or Bachilo, which divides the kingdoms of Bagemeder or Bagemdra and Amhara; the Gulcem, which bounds the same kingdom of Amhara and Oleca; the Malack and Anguer, which, having joined their streams, water the countries of Damos, Nareva, Bizamo, the Gafates, and the Gongas. The Tacaza, called by the antients Aylaboras, hath three different sources near the mountains, which separate the two kingdoms of Angote or Angota and Bagemeder; it runs towards the west thro' the desert of Oldeba; then, entering Dambar, falls into a large bed of sands; and afterwards, having crossed part of the kingdom of Decan, discharges itself into the Nile. 'Tis said, that besides crocodiles and river-horses, there are in this river abundance of torpedoes, which immediately benumb the arm of any man that touches them. The Mareb, rising two leagues from Debaroa, falls, after a long course, from a rock thirty cubits in height, and sinks under-ground; but in the winter it runs through many other provinces, and by the monastery of Alleluja, and then loses itself. The army, when they invaded these regions, dug into the land, and found under-ground both good water, and excellent fish." To which we shall beg leave to subjoin a short description of the course of the Nile, as delivered to us by the best modern geographers since the time of Gregory and Ludolphus. It arises in the kingdom of Gejam, and proceeds from thence in a N. E. direction to the lake of Dambea or Tzana; afterwards it moves S. E. to the kingdom of Bagemeder, or, as Gregory calls it, Bagemdra; then, still running S. E. it approaches the kingdom of Amhara; from whence, continuing its motion S. E. it advances to the kingdom of Oleca, betwixt which and Amhara it receives a considerable river, as it did before the Bachilo on the confines of Amhara and Bagemdra. From the kingdom of Oleca it moves to that of Choa in the same direction, and from thence by Debra through Galla, and the kingdom of the Casutes, to that of Gonga. Afterwards it visits the country of the Changalas, N. E. of Gonga. From thence in a northern direction it flows to the city and kingdom of Sennar; and then to Corte or Corti in Nubia, through the desert of Bahiouda N. W. from Sennar. Betwixt Sennar and Corti it passes by Barbar, near which is a Cataract N. E. of the former place, from whence it turns to the W. and reaches Corte. Kanife W. of Corte next receives a vitic from it; and then Dongola N. of Kanife. Continuing its course N. E. it arrives at the Greater Cataract; and afterwards takes its leave of Nubia near the Lesser Cataract. Lastly, having traversed Egypt in a northern direction, it discharges itself by several mouths into the Mediterranean. We could not dispense with being thus particular, in relation to the source and course of a river the most celebrated of all others taken notice of by antiquity, on account of the vast advantages accruing from its inundations to the countries through which it passed; especially since the antients sought after the causes of these inundations, and the head of this river, in vain (9).

superfede all farther accounts of it, and conclude here what we have to say of the rivers of Ethiopia (K) ^m.

Lakes, promontories, ports,

WE find no remarkable fountains and lakes in Ethiopia besides the sources of the rivers above-mentioned, except the lake of Psebo above Meroe, that of Tzana being, as far as we can collect from the old geography, unknown to the antients. The principal promontories were, Basium, Mnemium, Aspis, Saturni promentorium, Mosylon, Dire, Zengisa, Noti Cornu, Prasum, and Raptum, the last of which was inhabited by Canibals or Antropophagi. But the three last capes seem rather to have belonged to the Cafres or African barbarians than the proper Ethiopians. The chief ports and empories of Ethiopia were those of Adulis, Mondus, Opone, Mosylon, and the principal city of the Aualitæ, seated upon the Red Sea. From their country into these places the Arabs imported fruit, corn, wine, cloaths, &c. and exported from thence to Ocelis and Musa, opposite harbours in Arabia, spices, cassia, perfumes, ivory, myrrh, and several other (L) commodities. To which we may add the haven and fortress of Sabid, probably the Sabat of Ptolemy, now in a ruinous condition. The most noted islands appertaining to Ethiopia were Meroe, if that should not rather be deemed a peninsula, the Sporades of Agatharchides, Astratæ, Ara Palladis, Gythitis, Myronis, Daphnine, Magi, Acantbine, Isis, Mondus, and Menutbias (M). Meroe contained a large tract, together with a very considerable city, its metropolis, of the same name. Josephus informs us, that its original name was Saba, but that Cambyfes, from his sister, afterwards called it Meroe; which seems to be confirmed by Strabo, tho' it does not appear from Herodotus, that this prince penetrated so far into Ethiopia. Timosthenes, Ptolemy Philadelphus's admiral, related, that the city of Meroe was sixty days journey from Syene. Eratosthenes made this distance six hundred and twenty-five miles; Hipparchus in Strabo five thousand stadia, which agrees with Eratosthenes; Artemidorus six hundred miles; and Sebosus computed sixteen hundred miles from the farthest or most northern part of Egypt to this famous town. But, according to Pliny (N), the road between Meroe and Syene was discovered in the reign

(K) We must not omit observing, that as the advantages afforded the fields in other countries by the rains are derived from the rivers in Ethiopia, the places perfectly dry in winter are overflowed in summer. Several of these rivers do not empty themselves into the sea, as in other regions, but are sucked up in the sand; so that it is more difficult to discover their mouths than the sources of other streams (10).

(L) 'Tis remarkable, that most of these commodities have for a long time failed in Ethiopia, as the lotus and silphium in Egypt and Cyrenaica; but Arabia and India sufficiently supply the European merchants with them (11).

(M) To which we may add the island in the great lake of Psebo, sometimes occupied by the Libyans, and at other times by the Ethiopians, just as success attended their respective arms, according to Strabo. From the situation that author assigns this lake, in conjunction with what we shall offer concerning Meroe in note (N), our readers may possibly be induced to believe, that the present lake of Tzana or Dambæ is the Psebo of the antients (12).

(N) The computation we find in Pliny is as follows: From Syene to Hiera fifty-four miles; from thence to Tama seventy-five miles; from thence to the borders of the Ethiopians called Eunymis: an hundred-and-twenty miles; from thence to Atina fifty-four miles; from thence to Pisara twenty-five miles; from thence to Targedus an hundred and six miles; from thence to Napata eighty miles; and lastly, from Napata to the city of Meroe three hundred and sixty miles.

What part of Sennar or Abassia answers to Meroe, we shall not take upon us to determine. The Jesuits have pitched upon the kingdom of Gojam, as being almost encompassed by the Nile, and consequently a peninsula, as Meroe was thought to have been by some of the antients. But M. Ludolphus has intirely overthrown this notion, by proving, amongst other things, that nothing related of Meroe by Diodorus, Strabo, and Pliny, is applicable to Gojam; Meroe being nearer Egypt. Besides, as that learned author observes, had Meroe been Gojam, and the antients had known that country, they must consequently have known the source of the Nile; which we find they did not. Vossius believes the city Baroo or Baroa, situated in 16°. 22'. N. lat. where the Bahrnagas generally resides, to correspond with the capital of Meroe. As this opinion depends upon the supposition, that the present Mareb or Moraba is the Asaboras of the antients, which must be admitted, it seems to have some appearance of truth. Mr. Senex's map of this country, which to us ap-

- a reign of Nero to be eight hundred and seventy-four Roman miles long. The Nubian geographer does not differ greatly from some of these computations; for he intimates, that travellers are generally above two months in traversing Nubia, or that vast tract lying betwixt the confines of Egypt and Abassia. We find, that when Ethiopia was in its most flourishing state, the city of Meroe made a prodigious figure, insomuch that, if some of the antients may be credited, it could send into the field an army of two hundred and fifty thousand men, and contained four hundred thousand artificers, though in Pliny's time it was but a small town. Several queens of this part of Ethiopia, called Candace, that having for a considerable number of years been a sort of surname to them, held their residence here. Strabo makes it to have
b been ten thousand stadia from Alexandria, and the capital of Ethiopia. As the other islands are in a manner obscure, they merit no regard; only it may be proper to observe, that Hardouin, Bochart, and Salmasius, believe Madagascar to be the ancient Menubias, though Isaac Vossius takes it to have been the same with that island which the moderns call Zanzibar. How far either of these notions may be true, we cannot take upon us to say; neither is it of any consequence to our readers which of them, or whether either of them, is so^a.

- THE principal curiosities of this country are: 1. The rocks called Amba-Dorbo, Curiosities. or the rock of the ben above-mentioned. 2. The solid gold found on the banks of several rivers about the size of a tare or vetch, taken notice of by Pliny, with which
c the provinces of Damot and Enarea are said to abound. 3. The iron, copper, and gold mines some parts of it are so famous for. 4. The mountains of salt in a district upon the confines of Tigre and Angota, called the land of salt. In the mountains the salt is soft, and cut out with little labour, but hardens by being exposed to the open air. 5. The mountain of red salt mentioned by the patriarch Alphonso Mendez, and said to be indued with many medicinal virtues. 6. The mineral stibium, called in the Ethiopic tongue cuebel or cobol, which is produced in several provinces. 7. The various extraordinary animal and vegetable productions, which our readers will meet with in the modern history of Abyssinia^o (O).

pears the most accurate of any that has been hitherto published, seems to point out the tract answering to the ancient Meroe. We find there a sort of peninsula with many of the distinguishing characteristics of Meroe handed down to us by the antients. This peninsula is formed by the Rahd, the Nile, the Goxe, the Mareb or Moraba, the Takezel or Tacaza, and a river composed of these three last, which unites its stream with that of the Nile in near 18° N. lat. The chief places seated on the Nile in this peninsula are Chantedi, Ghenedetoul, Garri, Kelsain, Cotragne, Nogue, and Halckharas; upon the Rahd Enbuloul and Gesen; and upon the conflux of the Moraba and Tacaza the city of Derkin or Dequin: which we mention in order to give our readers a better idea of the tract we have in view. Now the peninsula of Meroe resembled a shield, and was three thousand stadia long, and one thousand broad, according to Strabo; it was likewise surrounded on the west by the Nile, and on the east by the rivers flowing into it. Solinus says, that Meroe was formed by the Nile, and six hundred miles from the sea; and Mela, as corrected by Salmasius, pretty nearly agrees with him. Pausanias intimates, that the Nile entered a great lake beyond Meroe, which it passed through, and traversed the whole country of Ethiopia. The rivers Astapus and Astaboras, i. e. the Tacaza and Moraba, joined the Nile above Meroe, i. e. the city of Meroe. All which particulars, as well as several others suggested by Pliny, Timotheus, Sebosus, Erasosthenes, and the Nubian geographer, in the passages here referred to, considering the many turnings and windings of the Nile, are more applicable to the peninsula at present under consideration, than any other part of Sennar or Abassia that can be assigned for this purpose. From the same chart, and the authors it is deduced from, we must allow it probable, that Mr. Senex's river Rahd, arising out of Dambas east of the Nile, is the Guangua of Gregory; as also that the Goxe, Mareb or Moraba, and Takezel or Tacaza, may be reputed the Astobabas or Astusapes, Astaboras, and Astapus, of the antients. Some modern writers seem inclined to believe, that the Mareb of the present Abassines answers to the Astusapes of the antients, though we have here supposed the Goxe to be that river (13).

(O) To these curiosities we may add the gold mines near the coast of the Red Sea mentioned by Agatharchides, which, according to that author, also produced the finest and whitest marble in the world (14).

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, customs, arts, &c. of the Ethiopians.

IT appears from what has been advanced in the former section, that the sacred writers did not always apply the name of (P) Cush to one particular country. They sometimes understood by it that region watered by the Araxes, which was the seat of the antient Scythians or Cuthites; and sometimes that country on the eastern shore of the Red Sea, contiguous to Egypt. In some passages likewise they seem to have had in view the whole peninsula of the Arabs, or at least the greatest part of that peninsula. But, notwithstanding what has been offered to the contrary by many persons of vast erudition, we cannot help believing, that it most usually and properly denoted the tract situated above the Upper Egypt, comprehending the modern kingdoms of Dongola, Sennar, and Abassia. In order to evince the probability of such a notion, we shall not only beg leave to refer our readers to the remarkable passages already cited on this occasion, but likewise observe, that the prophets Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, make the Cushites neighbours to the Libyans; which can only hold true of the proper Ethiopians. The psalmist also foretold, that Cush should stretch out her hands to God; and the prophet Zephaniah, that the suppliants of the LORD, from beyond the rivers of Cush, even the daughter of his dispersed, should bring his offering: both of which predictions seem clearly to point at the eunuch baptized by Philip, who came to worship at Jerusalem; since, as he was treasurer to queen Candace, it can scarce be doubted but that he and his retinue brought a valuable offering or donation with them; and since Candace was queen of the proper Ethiopia, or at least the peninsula of Meroe, a considerable part of it, as we learn from Pliny and Strabo. The words Cush and Aithiopes, therefore, in the texts here referred to, must be understood of the territories and people of the proper Ethiopia. Ezekiel prophesied, that the Egyptians from Migdol to Syene should fall by the sword; which not a little supports the interpretation of a famous text already given in favour of our present opinion. King Abasuerus in Esther reigned from the Indies to Cush, that is to say, as far as the modern Abassia; since Scythia or Arabia cannot be there meant as being contiguous to Persia, and Herodotus intimates Darius Hystaspis to have received tribute from the nations bordering upon proper Ethiopia. Nebuchadnezzar in Judith sent ambassadors to Gesem, and as far as the frontiers of Ethiopia: probably the kingdom so called to the south of Egypt. In fine, many of the most remarkable passages of Scripture, understood, for above a century past, of Arabia or part of it, may well enough be interpreted of the proper Ethiopia, as is acknowledged by Calmet himself. It is therefore but reasonable to conclude, that Cush the eldest son of Ham was the great progenitor of the Ethiopians.

*A body of Arabs crossing the streights of Babal Mandab passed into Ethio-

HOWEVER, most authors are agreed, that many of the early descendants of Cush settled first in the land bordering on the east side of the Red Sea, moving gradually from thence to the southern extremity of Arabia; and afterwards, by means of the easy passage over the streights of Bab-al-Mandab, transplanted themselves into Ethiopia. According to Eusebius, this migration happened whilst the Israelites were in Egypt; but Syncellus places it in the time of the judges. The Arabian Cushites were antiently called Abaseni, and made up a great part of the Sabaans or Homcrites, as may be inferred from several authors. The Ethiopians went under the same name, agreed in many points with the Arabian Cushites, and were believed by most of the Asiatic nations in Josephus's time to have had the same origin. Diodorus Siculus, it must be allowed, maintains, that they never came from any other country, and that they never were corrupted by foreign customs; though he asserts, that in several

(P) Sometimes in Scripture the word Cush comprehends both Arabia and the proper Ethiopia, as in EZEK. c. xxxviii. v. 5. Persia, Cush, and Libya with them; all of them with shield and helmet: i.e. Persia, Arabia, Ethiopia, Libya, &c. Compare also EZEK. c. xxx. v. 5. with JER. c. xxv. v. 20, 24.

- a things they corresponded with the Egyptians. However, notwithstanding what is advanced by that historian, our readers will naturally conclude, from what has been already suggested, that part of Cush's posterity moved gradually along the western shore of the Red Sea into Ethiopia, which, by this means, was tolerably well peopled, when the Arabian Cushites first found their way into it. The great difference of at least a considerable body of the Abassines from the Arabs, as well as other nations, the situation of the kingdom of Midian, where some of the earliest Cushites probably seated themselves, and the concurrent voice of antiquity, both sacred and profane, tend to evince the justness of such a conclusion. Bochart believes some traces of Obal, or, as the Arabians pronounce it, Aubal, one of Joktan's sons, to be discernable in the empory Abalites, the Abalitic gulf, &c. and consequently, that some of the children of Eber, after having insinuated themselves into Arabia Felix, migrated into Ethiopia. Some of the Ludim likewise might find a passage into this country, though undoubtedly the bulk of them moved towards the Atlantic ocean; since, as Moses intimates them to have been the first branch of Misraim's issue, they in all likelihood pushed forwards towards the main land of Africa. The Ethiopians therefore might very well vye with the Egyptians, and even be deemed superior to them, in point of antiquity, since Cush their great ancestor was the eldest son of Ham. They might likewise have been esteemed of equal antiquity with the Arabians, since from the kingdom of Midian the Cushites penetrated both into the southern parts of the peninsula of the Arabs and Ethiopia. The communication betwixt Egypt and Ethiopia, as well as the proximity of blood of Cush and Misraim, introduced that similitude of manners observable amongst their respective inhabitants, which we shall soon have occasion to take notice of.

- Pliny* relates, that Ethiopia was antiently divided into forty-five kingdoms, of which he insinuates that of Meroe to have been the most powerful and flourishing. But whether these were independent on one another, or under one supreme head, he no-where informs us. Be that as it will, as all the old oriental governments were absolute, and the Abassine princes known to the Europeans since their first intercourse with Abassia have been despotic, there is no reason to doubt but that the kings of Ethiopia always ruled with an (Q) uncontrollable sway. If we admit the Ethiopian tradition, that a long series of princes descended from Solomon reigned in the country we are now upon, it can scarce be denied, that their authority was unlimited, as that of the Hebrew monarch knew no bounds. It appears from Strabo and Pliny, that some Ethiopic nations were governed always by queens, whose common name was Candace, as that of the Egyptian kings was Pbaraob, Ptolemy, &c. Diodorus Siculus gives us to understand, that a good part of Ethiopia was composed of several elective monarchies (R), the heads of which were chosen out of their priests; and that all these princes made the laws of their respective kingdoms the basis of their government. However, as the same author remarks, that every new king, immediately after his election, was worshipped as a god, and considered as invested with the supreme authority by Divine Providence, though he had a particular regard to the laws and customs of his country through the whole course of his administration, we

(Q) This seems likewise in some measure to appear from the constitution of the present kingdom of Abassia. The king's authority there is so unlimited, that no man can in this country be called with justice proprietor of any thing, nor doth any man, when he sows his field, know that he shall reap it; for the king may bestow the fruits upon whom he pleases, and all the satisfaction the former possessor can hope for, is, that some man be appointed to bring in the estimate of the expences he had been at in cultivating it, in order to his reimbursement. But the arbitrator is always favourable to the present owner, whom he presumes to have more interest than the person dispossessed (16).

(R) Though the present kingdom of Abassia be so far hereditary, that only one family can sit on the throne, yet the reigning prince has the power of chusing out of the royal family whom he pleases for a successor, which, if he omits it, is done by the grandees of the kingdom, who elect him for their king, whom they judge most capable of so high an office. If this was the custom formerly, as does not appear improbable, it might easily have given occasion to this account of Diodorus, who cannot be supposed to have received an exact information of the customs, laws, and constitution of Ethiopia (17).

may look upon them all as arbitrary monarchs. The extraordinary honours paid a them leave no room to doubt, that they were the interpreters of these laws, and consequently made them subservient to their will; neither does this interfere with their conferring rewards, and inflicting punishments, according to the laws, that is, the political decisions and determinations, of their ancestors, since some of the most arbitrary governments in the world now do the like. But after all, the Greeks knew very little of the Ethiopians; and therefore from their authors we can form no adequate idea of any thing relating to them. Sesostris and Zerab must undoubtedly be considered as princes bearing an absolute sway over the dominions they governed, of which the proper Ethiopia was a part. The surprising conquests made by the one, and the prodigious army commanded by the other, in order to the reduction of a b powerful neighbour, seem to set this point beyond dispute.

Laws.

ACCORDING to Diodorus Siculus, the laws of Ethiopia agreed in substance with those of Egypt. This, continues the same author, the Ethiopians accounted for by asserting, that Egypt was first peopled by colonies drawn out of their country. In order to evince that point, they maintained the land of Egypt to have been at first, for a considerable period, intirely covered with water, and afterwards raised gradually, so as to become inhabitable, by the fresh accession of mud the Nile brought every year out of Ethiopia. This is likewise confirmed by Herodotus, who affirms Egypt to be the gift of the Nile, and that the whole region, except the territory of Thebes, in the time of Menes, was one continued morass. However, he makes the c Ethiopians to have been civilized by the Egyptians, and to have learned the customs and manners of that people, so late as the reign of Psammiticus I. which, considering what has been already advanced, will not easily be admitted for truth. Yet some customs and manners, as well as laws, the former nation might possibly have received from the latter about that time, though in many particulars they agreed long before. We cannot pretend to give our readers a complete enumeration of the particular laws, or political maxims, that prevailed antiently in Ethiopia; but the following seem to have been some of the principal of them. 1. Several tribes of Ethiopians looked upon it as a fundamental law to elect their princes out of the different orders of their priests. 2. No public executioner ever made his appearance in many d parts of Ethiopia, the malefactors there being obliged by a particular law to fall by their own hands. 3. According to the established order of succession amongst some Ethiopic nations, upon the death of the king, his sister's son (S) mounted the throne; and in case the female branches of the royal family failed of issue, they chose the most beautiful and valiant person amongst them for king. 4. It was esteemed a most enormous crime in any person capitally convicted to attempt making his escape into a foreign country. Diodorus relates, that a criminal condemned to die having once meditated a flight out of Ethiopia, after the sign of death had been sent him by the king, was detected by his mother, who thereupon strangled him with a garter, he not offering the least resistance, lest an indelible stain should thereby be fixed upon e his family. 5. The king of this region was obliged to dispatch (T) himself, whenever he received a message from the priests of Meroe, the most revered of any in Ethiopia, with an intimation, that the gods commanded him, for the good of his subjects, to do so. 6. If the king became maimed or wounded by any accident,

(S) We are informed by Plutarch, that a certain Ethiopian nation always elected a dog for their king, and paid him divine honours. The same author, however, judiciously observes, that all the high posts were filled with men. Possibly the modern kingdom of Zendeh, governed always by an elected monarch, who is said to resemble an ape, or rather to be an ape, may correspond with this nation. 'Tis certain Diodorus Siculus and Pliny style the animal now called a baboon cynocephalus, from the resemblance its head bears to that of a dog; which renders it not improbable, that the creature denominated cyon or dog by Plutarch was an ape or baboon; especially since the cynocephalus was produced only in Ethiopia. However, this we can only propose to our readers as a conjecture (18).

(T) This vast power the priests enjoyed till the time of Ergamenes king of Ethiopia, cotemporary with Ptolemy Philadelphus, who, being a martial prince, advanced to the golden temple of Æsculapius, where they resided, with a body of troops, and put them all to the sword. After this he made several regulations, and in a manner new-modelled the public worship of the Ethiopians, as we learn from Diodorus Siculus (19).

- a his domestics were forced to wound and maim themselves just in the same manner. 7. At the king's death all his household servants, either in compliance with the laws, or an indispensable custom, killed themselves, this being looked upon as the strongest testimony of their sincere attachment to him. 8. Some of the Ethiopic clans above Meroe on both sides the Nile, the preceding laws being chiefly confined to that peninsula, and the parts of Ethiopia nearer Egypt, elected the most industrious shepherds to preside over them; others bestowed the kingdom upon the most opulent persons they could find, imagining them the most capable of supplying with their riches the wants and necessities of the people^a.

- Jupiter Ammon*, according to the Greek and Latin authors, seems to have been Religion.
 b the principal object of religious worship in Ethiopia, though the natives (U) paid likewise divine honours to Isis, Pan, Hercules, Æsculapius, and others, whom they considered as the greatest benefactors to mankind. In short, if these authors may be credited, their religion differed not much from that of the Egyptians, which is not to be wondered at, considering their vicinity to, and intercourse with, that people. However, Diodorus assures us, that some of them were atheists, who looked upon the sun, by reason of his scorching rays, as their implacable enemy. Could we depend upon a tradition of the modern Abassines, the Ethiopians, or at least a considerable part of them, adhered zealously to the law of Moses from the time of Solomon to their conversion to christianity. According to this tradition, the queen of Sheba, whom our Saviour calls the queen of the south, and who ruled over at least a powerful nation of Ethiopia, had a son by Solomon named Menilebec, who was educated at that prince's court, and instructed there in the law of God through the great care of his father. Being afterwards anointed king of Ethiopia, and sent home to take possession of his kingdom, at the desire of several eminent Israelites, and doctors of the law, that attended him, he introduced there his father's religion, which continued amongst his subjects and their posterity till the time of St. Athanasius: What regard is to be paid to this tradition, we shall not take upon us to determine; since the learned are not a little divided in their sentiments concerning the situation of the kingdom of Sheba, whose queen had an interview with Solomon at his own court. St. Cyprian, Epiphanius, St. Cyril of Alexandria, cardinal Baronius, Suarez, Lorinus, Pineda, Bochart, and the Arabs in general, fix her residence in Arabia Felix. The last call her Belkis, and affirm her to have been the daughter of Hod-Had king of the Homerites. On the other hand, the Abassine nation, Josephus, Origen, St. Austin, the learned Hugo Grotius, the patriarch Alphonso Mendez, the fathers Balthasar Tellez, and Joan Dos-Santos, have placed this celebrated princess in Ethiopia. We have not room to insert here the arguments offered on both sides in defence of their respective opinions; but shall, however, observe, that the kingdom of Abassia seems to answer better the queen of Sheba's country, according to our Saviour's description of it, as being more to the south of, and more remote from, Judæa, than Arabia.
 c To which we may add, that it appears from Scripture, that some persons of distinction amongst the proper Ethiopians were of the same religion with the Jews, or nearly so, in the apostolical age, since queen Candace's treasurer (W), baptized by Philip,

AGATHARCHID. CNID. apud Phot. NIC. DAMASCEN.

(U) Diodorus Siculus tells us, that the Ethiopians valued themselves upon their being the first nation that had a religious establishment. They believed, that for this reason, adds he, their sacrifices were more acceptable to the gods than those offered by any other people. Which notion, continues Diodorus, Homer himself seems to countenance, when he introduces Jupiter, attended by the other gods, as present at an anniversary sacrifice, or grand entertainment, prepared for him by the Ethiopians. In order to reward their transcendent piety, according to the same author, the gods never suffered them to be conquered by any foreign prince, Cambyses, Semiramis, &c. failing in their attempts upon them. But in this, as well as in many other points, he was egregiously mistaken, as will appear in the sequel of this history (20).

(W) Father Calmet and others suppose this eunuch to have been one of those proselytes which the Jews call a proselyte of the gate, already by us described. But we must own, that this notion seems to us not a little improbable, since those were only confined to an observance of the seven fundamental laws of natural religion enjoined by Noah to his posterity immediately after the flood, according to the opinion of the Jews, whereas we find this man perusing, and consequently not unacquainted with, the writings of the Old Testament peculiar to the natural Jews. Besides, that a treasurer or prime minister of the queen of Ethiopia should take so long a journey as that from Meroe to Jerusalem purely to worship God, and offer an oblation to him, there, seems very strange, if he was such a mungrel-convert as the proselytes of the gate were, who, for the most

Philip, went with an offering to Jerusalem to worship God there, and was not unacquainted with the writers of the Old Testament; which cannot, we apprehend, be laid with so much propriety of the Arabians. This seems to us a sort of proof, that the Mosaic law was held to be of divine institution in Meroe, and the other parts of Ethiopia dependent on it, even a considerable time before the birth of our Saviour, if not as early as the age of Solomon; and consequently adds some weight to the arguments of those writers, who have asserted, that the queen of Sheba came out of Ethiopia. It likewise renders the authority of Josephus preferable to that of Diodorus Siculus and Stephanus, notwithstanding what M. Bockhart has advanced. For, if any regard was paid to the law of Moses in Meroe, before christianity made its appearance in the world, we cannot account for this better than by allowing, with the Abassines and authors above-mentioned, that this peninsula was the queen of Sheba's country, that her son introduced some knowledge of the public worship of the Hebrews there, and consequently that its metropolis was called Sheba or Seba before Cambyse's reign, as Josephus asserts, and not built by that prince, as Diodorus Siculus and Stephanus will have it. Be that as it will, this appears to have been a prevailing notion amongst some of the Jews and Greeks in Josephus's time, and Herodotus was then cited to support it, however his text, or that of Josephus, may be now corrupted; since the latter historian cannot fairly be supposed so profligate and abandoned a writer as to impose a known falshood and forgery upon the world, as Bockhart asserts him to have done. However, it must be owned, that Strabo suggests the people of Meroe in his time to have adored Hercules, Pan, and Isis, with another foreign god. But Strabo's authority in this point cannot overturn what is insinuated by Scripture: nay, he seems to be a little inconsistent with himself, since in the same breath he assures us, that the Ethiopians in general acknowledged an immortal God, whom they considered as the first principle of all things, and a mortal god, who had no name. Such a notion might easily be formed by remote nations, who knew very little of the Ethiopians, upon supposition that some of them for a certain period worshipped the true God, and held the memory of Moses in the highest veneration. Far more absurd things than these the Greek and Latin writers related of the Jews, with whom they had a more immediate communication; and therefore we ought not to be surprised at their transmitting to us so imperfect an account of the religious tenets of the Ethiopians; tho' it should be acknowledged, that, during a certain interval, they agreed in the main with those of the Jews. The author last cited likewise informs us, that the Ethiopians ranked in the number of their deities all their most eminent benefactors, and those who were distinguished by their birth. The sun, according to him, the people under consideration in the most early times so highly adored, that they reputed those to be atheists who cursed him at his rising, as some such there were inhabiting the Torrid Zone, because he forced them to shelter themselves from his intense heat in moist and marshy places. For this reason the Greeks and Romans gave the Sun the name of the Ethiopian Jupiter. The Ethiopians themselves called him Affabin or Affabinus, as we learn from Pliny. They consecrated likewise to him the cinamon-tree, an odoriferous shrub, which grew in their country. The priests only were allowed to gather that harvest, which they always ushered in with sacrifices of forty-four oxen, goats, and sheep, beginning the work that followed before sun-rising, and finishing it before his setting. The crop being gathered, they divided it into three parts with a spear, which was never used but on that occasion. They carried away two portions of it, and left on the same place that which fell to the sun; and forthwith, say Pliny, Solinus, and Theo-

part, if not always, resided in Judas. It is therefore much more probable, especially as scarce any instance can be produced of so eminent a personage's being ever found amongst the residing proselytes above-mentioned, who were, generally speaking, people of no figure, much less of one who exposed himself to the various dangers of so long a journey purely to worship God at Jerusalem, that this Ethiopian had been trained up in a religion not very different from that of the Jews. Nay, as he was a person of such power and authority at the Ethiopian court, it can by no means be deemed unlikely, that the established religion of Meroe at that time pretty nearly resembled the Jewish.

This appears to be in some sort confirmed by the prophet Zephaniah, who seems evidently to predict the conversion of the eunuch here under consideration, and even to insinuate, that he came to Jerusalem with an offering from queen Candace herself, since nothing is more likely, than that she was the daughter of his dispersed beyond the rivers of Ethiopia, that should bring his offering; which, if admitted, must be allowed no mean proof of what we would here suggest; but this, as well as every thing dependent upon it, must be left to the determination of our learned and judicious readers (21).

a phraſtus, if the diviſion had been performed with equity, the ſun's portion took fire of itſelf, and was conſumed (X). This ceremony ſeems to have been common to both the Ethiopians above Egypt, and the Sabaans ſeated in Arabia Felix. Banier believes the Ethiopians to have had gods natural, and gods animated, as well as the Egyptians; that they worſhipped the moon under the name of Iſis, and univerſal nature under that of Pan. We doubt not but this may be true; eſpecially, ſince they, in all likelihood, at firſt worſhipped the planets, or ſome of them, in common with the Egyptians and Arabians, and likewise paid divine honours to their deceased kings, as did thoſe nations together with the Mauritians. Among thoſe b princes deified by this laſt people were the famous Juba, and Verſotina, who was probably either one of their queens, or ſome other woman of the firſt diſtinction ſignaliſed by her glorious actions. The Ethiopians of Meroe, according to Herodotus, in his time, worſhipped Jupiter and Bacchus, and had an oracle of Jupiter. Some Ethiopian nations offered ſacrifices to the Day, which they eſteemed as a god, according to Lucian. An ancient tradition prevails amongſt the Abſſines, that the firſt Ethiopians adored a monſtrous ſerpent called in their language Arwe-midre; but this favours ſo much of fable, that our readers will probably think it deſerves little regard.

In a country of ſo vaſt an extent as Ethiopia, inhabited by various nations, it is natural to ſuppoſe, that no ſmall variety of languages, at leaſt of dialects, muſt have prevailed. The moſt ancient of theſe was undoubtedly that called by the c learned the Ethiopic, into which the holy Scripture was formerly tranſlated, and in which all the books of the Abſſines, both ſacred and profane, are written. Some authors have informed us, that this language nearly reſembles the Chaldee; but, according to Ludolphus, who ſpent above ſixty years in the ſtudy of it, it bears as great an affinity to the Hebrew and Syriac, and approaches nearer ſtill to the Arabic, from which to him it ſeems immediately to be derived. In ſhort, there is ſo perfect an agreement betwixt them, that whoever underſtands the one, may, without any difficulty, if we will credit him, make himſelf maſter of the other; nay, he aſſerts, that a competent knowledge of the Hebrew, or any other of the oriental tongues, will enable a ſtudent ſoon to make a very laudable progreſs in the Ethiopic. (X) For our part we are apt to believe, that the prieſts ſecreſly conveyed ſome coals under the heap that was allotted to the Sun; and that thoſe coals kindled ſome moments after, preciſely at the time of their retiring. Such pious frauds have been, and ſtill are, uſed in countries whoſe religion utterly diſclaims frauds and impoſtures of any kind whatſoever, in order to ſerve ſuch a turn as theſe prieſts of the Sun had in view: witneſs the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius at Naples, &c.

(Y) Of this we ſhall beg leave here to produce two inſtances: 1. The Hebrew lexicographers derive the Hebrew and Phœnician word Adamah, earth, from אדמה red, pretending the earth to be of a red colour, from whence it receives that denomination. But Kimchi takes no notice of this derivation in his collection of Hebrew roots; and how ſmall a part of the earth, in compariſon of the whole, is red, no naturaliſt ſtands in need of being informed. This etymon therefore is at beſt mal-à-propos. But the Ethiopic language ſuggeſts to us a much more proper one, when it propoſes to our view the word Adamah ſignifying beautiful, elegant, pleaſant, &c. from whence if we deduce the Hebrew and Phœnician Adamah, Eayib, it will not be remote from the ἀδμυ of the Greeks, though that ſeems to have had a more extenſive ſignification. Upon this ſuppoſition, Adam derived his name not from a certain fictitious redneſs, but from the beauty and perfection of his nature, being, as it were, the maſter-piece of the creation. And agreeably hereto the Ethiopians to the word Adam always annex the idea of ſomething perfect and beautiful. Nor is it improbable, that the city Admah or Adamah, before it was deſtroyed with Sodom and Gomorrah, ſeated upon the banks of the Jordan, compared to the garden of the Lord, was ſo denominated from the pleaſantneſs of its ſituation. 2. The word מלאך Malach, an Angel or Meſſenger, is not to be deduced from the Arabic Malaka, poſſedis, dominatus eſt, &c. for that is not ſufficiently appoſite, but from the Ethiopic Layka, miſis, legavis, &c. Nay, ſometimes the roots of Arabic words themſelves are to be ſought for in the Ethiopic: ſo in the Alcoran the apoſtles are called Hawmari, whoſe origin cannot be diſcovered in the Arabic lexicons, ſince it certainly comes from the Ethiopic Hawya, iſis, inceſſit, &c. than which nothing can be more ſuitable to the office of an apoſtle. Our readers will find this point more fully diſcuſſed by the learned Ludolphus, to whom, for their further ſatisfaction, we muſt beg leave to refer them (23).

in the Ethiopic, which would be sought for in vain either in their own or any other a language except this, it certainly merits the esteem of all who diligently apply themselves to the study of the Scriptures. Besides, 'tis impossible to come at a thorough knowledge of the Abassine affairs, this being the language in which all their histories, and other treatises, are penned, without being tolerably well acquainted with it. The purest dialect of this tongue was that used in the kingdom of Tigre, where Axuma, the residence of the old Ethiopian kings, was seated. Here it continued till the failure of the Zagean line; after which, a Sewan prince ascending the throne, the Ambaric dialect was introduced at court, and gradually diffused itself over the whole empire. However, the language spoken in Tigre at present comes the nearest to the old Ethiopic; which still retains its pristine dignity not only in their books, but also b in their divine worship, as also in their kings letters patents, commissions, and all other public acts whatsoever. Father Tellez informs us, that in his time there were as many languages as kingdoms and provinces in Abassia: nay, that there were different dialects in one and the same kingdom. As the language of Tigre is at present deeply tinged with the antient Ethiopic, so those of most of the other kingdoms partake greatly of the Ambaric; though they considerably differ one from another. The people of Bagemdra or Bagemedr use a dialect peculiar to themselves; those of Hangota, Isata, Gojam, and Shewa, one common to them all; the Gafatas have many Ambaric words, but their tongue is extremely difficult to be understood by any of the other Abassines; in the kingdom of Dambee a language is spoken c very different from both the Ambaric and Ethiopic; the dialect of Gonga agrees with that of Enarcea, though it does not bear a near resemblance to any of the others in Ethiopia. But we shall entertain our readers with a more particular account of all these, as well as those of the Gallans, Agawi, Chankalas, &c. when we come to the modern history of Abassia.

(Z) We are informed by Diodorus Siculus, that the Ethiopians had antiently hieroglyphic characters as well as the Egyptians. Thus amongst them a hawk signified any thing that made a quick dispatch, that bird in swiftness exceeding most others; the crocodile denoted malice; the eye the maintainer of justice, and the guard of the body; the right-hand, open, represented plenty; and the left, closed, a secure possession of property, &c. But whether the Egyptians or Ethiopians first in reality hit upon this way of writing, cannot certainly be known, though Diodorus attributes the invention of it to the latter. 'Tis not improbable, that the people of all nations at first recorded their conceptions by tracing out the images of things in a coarse manner, which was gradually improved into hieroglyphics, as in some measure appears from the rude picture-writing of the Mexicans, the antient character of the Chinese, and from what we find related of the Scythians by Clemens Alexandrinus, Eusebius, and Herodotus.

These hieroglyphic characters, according to the same Diodorus, were not only understood by the priests, as amongst the Egyptians, but likewise by all the people, as well as the alphabet here mentioned. However, it does not appear from that author, as M. Fourmont seems to assert, that the Ethiopic alphabet was made up of these hieroglyphic characters; nor indeed can this be allowed very probable, the letters of an alphabet being essentially different from even the characteristic marks deduced from hieroglyphics. The last represent things, ideas, or even whole conceptions, in the same manner as the antient and modern characters of the Chinese, whereas the former are expressive of sounds. In short, though we should allow it an easy transition from the rude picture-writing of the Mexicans to the Egyptian hieroglyphics, as well as from the Egyptian hieroglyphics to the characteristic marks of the Chinese, which Du Halde demonstrates to be perfectly hieroglyphic, yet we cannot see how the invention of an alphabet must as naturally succeed these marks. There is, it must be owned, a sufficient resemblance between the American and Egyptian hieroglyphics and the Chinese characters; but these all seem intirely foreign to alphabetic letters, and in reality do not bear the least relation to them. As an affinity between all these is the point necessary to be proved, in order to evince a gradual and easy descent from picture-writing to letters, some better argument ought to be offered in support of it, than a supposition extremely precarious, if not plainly false, and which, if true, would be little to the purpose. Now, that the notion of the Ethiopic alphabet's being made up of hieroglyphics is such a supposition, evidently appears from what we have just hinted, as well as from the antient alphabet of that nation exhibited by Ludolphus; and yet the very learned and ingenious Mr. Warburton has in fact offered only this hypothesis, on M. Fourmont's authority, to prove the connection between an alphabet and hieroglyphics. How far, therefore, all novel opinions, founded upon the truth of such a connection, are to be depended upon, we leave our readers to judge. Diodorus indeed, in the same place, intimates, that the forms of the Ethiopic letters (τύπος) resembled various animals, parts of human bodies, artificers tools, &c. But that this is not to be understood of alphabetic letters, but hieroglyphics, follows from what he immediately subjoins: "For their writing (ἡ γραμμάτις) is expressive of the subject, not by a composition of

c From comparing these letters with the old oriental alphabets taken from antique coins, inscriptions, &c. by Laescher, and consulting what we have already observed in our account of the Carthaginian, it may perhaps not seem absolutely improbable, that some of them were derived from the old Assyrian, Phœnician, Samaritan, Syriac, &c. characters. The number of the letters likewise in this alphabet, and the names of several of them, tend to evince the same thing, though Ludolphus believes them to have been invented by the Axumites or Ethiopians themselves, and to be much older than even the Cupbic character of the Arabs. 'Tis remarkable, that the Abassines have no grammar; and, that when Gregory was shewn the use of one, he could not forbear breaking out into a sort of exclamation, crying out, Thanks to God! as though some secret of great importance had been discovered to him. We must not forget observing, that the Ethiopians both wrote and read from the left-hand to the right, contrary to the custom of the Orientalis; which looks like an indication, that their alphabet was not of the same extraction with that of the Arabs. But for a farther account of the ancient Ethiopic letters, as well as language, we must beg leave to refer the curious and inquisitive part of our readers to Ludolphus's Ethiopic history, commentaries, and grammar, which are generally allowed to be the best pieces of their kind extant.

d THE Ethiopians, as has been already observed, agreed in several points with the Egyptians, though they had many customs peculiar to themselves, some of which were very singular and uncommon. As we have not time at present to expatiate upon all such customs to be met with in history, we must content ourselves with touching upon some of the principal of them. 1. The Ethiopian Ichthyophagi differed from other nations in several particulars. By stopping up the passages of certain caverns on the coast of the Red Sea with stones, they inclosed vast numbers of large and small fishes, which, upon the reflux of the tide, were left there as in a net, and served them for food. The women and children employed themselves in throwing on shore those of a lesser size, whilst the men secured the sharks, sea-calves, con-

" of syllables, but by the signification of certain
" images delineated, and a metaphorical application " of it impressed on the memory by exercise. For,
" they write (γερσπον) a hawk, a crocodile, a ser-

" dispatch, because this bird in celerity exceeds al" most all others, &c." Nay, he here expressly as"serts, that the Ethiopic letters were the Egyptian hiero"glyphics, and consequently allows, that they could not " be alphabetic characters: this passage, therefore, which " seems to have misled M. Fourmont, is so far from proving the Ethiopian alphabet to have consisted of hiero"glyphic characters, that it strongly intimates the con"trary.

Heliodorus says, that the Ethiopians had two sorts of letters, the one called regal, the other vulgar; and that the regal resembled the sacerdotal characters of the Egyptians. Diogenes Laertius, from Thrasyllus, also informs us, that Democritus wrote two books, the one of the sacred letters of the Babylonians, the other of the sacred letters of the city of Meroe. M. Fourmont believes, that most of the eastern nations likewise had a sacerdotal alphabet (24).

gers,

gers, monstrous lobsters, &c. with which the aforesaid sea abounded, killing them ^a with sharp goats-horns, and rough stones broken off the rocks. These they exposed to the solar rays in stone pots turned towards the south, where the flesh was soon separated from the bones by the intense heat. The latter they applied to the use already mentioned, and boiled up the former with the seed of palurus. The mass formed by these two ingredients was at first liquid, and of a reddish colour; but, being spread upon tiles, and dried, or rather baked, by the sun, it became hard and savoury. This they commonly fed upon; but when any inundations happened, that they could not for several days together approach the shore, they were constrained to eat shell-fish, some of which were so large, that they weighed four minas. If these at any time failed, they found themselves obliged to have recourse to the ^b bones, though destined for another use, which preserved them till the sea sent them their usual supplies. They drank water only every fifth day, but that in such immoderate quantities, that they were scarce able to breathe. They seemed not to utter any articulate sounds, and consequently to be void of a language. Some of them, according to Agatharchides, never drank at all, living only upon raw fish. These, continues the same author, might have been deemed perfect stoics, as being never ruffled or discomposed by the violence of any prevailing passion. However barbarous their neighbours might take them to be, they had the art of teaching the phocæ or sea-calves, produced by the neighbouring gulph, to assist them in catching other ^c fish. Several clans of them lived in such caves as we have described in the former section; others erected huts of fir-trees, which grew there in great abundance, bearing fruit like a chesnut, of the boughs and leaves of which they formed a sort of canopy, whereby, together with the pleasant breezes coming from off the sea, they were sheltered from the scorching rays of the sun; and lastly, others fixed their habitations in certain inaccessible hollows surrounded with high precipices and the sea. The Ichthyophagi for the most part enjoyed an uninterrupted state of health, but few of them attained to old age, as above observed. They carried their dead to the sea-shore, where they lay exposed till the return of the tide, which carried them off; so that, as they fed upon fish in their life-time, they after their death in return afforded those animals a repast. 2. The Chelonophagi above-mentioned did not only ^d use the flesh of tortoises for food, but likewise covered their huts or cottages with the shells of those animals. As both in size and figure these shells resembled a small fishing-vessel, the Chelonophagi also used them as boats on some occasions. They had a particular manner of surprising this fish, which we find described from Agatharchides by Diodorus Siculus. 3. Another Ethiopic canton lived upon fish of the cetaceous kind, which they found thrown upon the shore by chance. When they were pressed by famine, they devoured the bones of those creatures, whose flesh at other times sustained them. 4. The Ethiopian Rhizophagi, after they had washed the roots of the canes growing in marshy ground, bruised them, and prepared them by the heat of the sun, sared deliciously upon them. This canton was greatly infested ^e by lions, which came out of the deserts in vast numbers, and had quite depopulated the country they inhabited, had not a prodigious multitude of gnats of an enormous size annually expelled them from thence. At the same time the Rhizophagi, in order to avoid these gnats, retired towards the morasses, which greatly contributed to their preservation. 5. The Ilylophagi were people of such surprising activity, that they skipped from one tree to another like birds. They always went naked, lived upon the young shoots of trees, had their wives in common, and frequently quarrelled about their respective habitations. On these occasions they fought with clubs, after the manner of the Libyans, which sometimes did great execution. 6. One tribe of Ethiopians, watching an opportunity, killed leopards, buffaloes, &c. after they ^f had drunk so copiously, that they were ready to burst, with clubs burnt at one end, stones, darts, &c. in the manner described by Agatharchides and Diodorus Siculus. They trained up their children in throwing the dart, and would not suffer them to eat till they had hit the mark. 7. Another Ethiopic nation had two very particular ways of taking elephants, hinted at by us above, for a full description of which our readers must have recourse to the authors last mentioned. 8. The Struthophagi had several arts and devices to take ostriches, on which they fed. That animal defended itself against them with stones, which it threw out of its feet, in this respect resembling a sling, with great violence. The Struthophagi of the skins of these ostriches made both garments and coverlets for their beds. 9. The Acridophagi ^g

- a pbagi had a deep valley in their country, of many furlongs extent, which they took care to fill with wood, and other combustible materials; and, when the south wind drove vast numbers of locusts thither, set them on fire, the smoke suffocating all those animals. Such infinite numbers of locusts were destroyed on these occasions, that the ground for some leagues was covered with their bodies, which the people under consideration seasoned with salt, produced most copiously in their territories, and lived upon for the following year. But they were probably very unwholesome food; for the Acridophagi (Z) did not exceed the age of forty years, and at last died in a miserable manner. They were devoured by winged insects of different species, of a strange and ugly form, expiring for the most part in exquisite torture. Possibly the air itself, as well as the locusts, might have greatly contributed to so uncommon and fatal a malady. 10. The Cynamelgi, seated in the southern parts of Ethiopia, wore long beards, and kept dogs extremely fierce, in order to hunt (A) Indian oxen, prodigious herds of which came every year amongst them. 11. The nations placed still more to the south, according to Agatharchides and Diodorus, lived the life of savages, if not that of the worst of brutes. From hence we are inclined to believe, that the Cafres were not unknown to the ancients, and consequently that they had seen more of the southern parts of Africa than the moderns imagine. 12. The above-mentioned authors inform us, that the greatest part of the Troglodytes (B) in their manner of life nearly resembled the Libyan Nomades, that they were divided into tribes, and that all of these were under one supreme head. This confirms what we have elsewhere observed of the form of government anciently prevailing in Numidia and Mauritania. 13. The Troglodytes, during the time of the Etesian winds, drank a liquor composed of blood and milk boiled up together. In the summer months they lived about the morasses with their flocks, where they frequently sought for convenient pastures. The old and infirm cattle always supplied them with food, for which reason they called the males their fathers, and the females their mothers, never giving those denominations to their natural parents. They had no other garments than a few beasts skins, with which they covered only their loins. 14. They held all their old women in the highest veneration, inasmuch that, in their most bloody contests, if any of them appeared, they threw down their arms. When the men were worn out with age, they tied themselves by the neck to an ox's tail, and were dragged about till they expired; and, if upon an admonition from a friend they refused to do this, they might be strangled without any crime. As it was deemed an unpardonable offence to desire life when a person was incapable of contributing to the welfare of the public, if any one amongst them was seized with an incurable distemper, or maimed by accident, it was not only lawful, but meritorious, to dispatch him. Their dead they carried to the top of some hill, where they first covered them with stones, and then fixed a goat's horn upon them. So void were they of a sense of compassion, that the ceremony of burying the deceased in this manner was one of their most celebrated diversions. 15. The Ethiopians made use of bows and arrows, darts, lances, and several other weapons (C), in their wars, which they managed with great strength and dexterity. 16. Circumcision (D) was a rite observed amongst them, as well as the Egyptians, from very early antiquity, though which of these nations first received it, cannot certainly be known. 17. The

(Z) Plutarch mentions a tribe of Ethiopians that were very short-lived, the oldest among them scarce ever exceeding the age of thirty years. These were probably the Acridophagi of Agatharchides Cnidius, Diodorus Siculus, and Pliny (25).

(A) The ancients sometimes included the western and proper Ethiopia, as well as Arabia, under the name of India.

(B) We are informed by Strabo, that all the different species of cattle these Ethiopians took with them from place to place were extremely small. Their dogs were likewise very little, but vastly fierce. Some of these Ethiopians, or at least the neighbouring cantons, lived chiefly upon barley and millet, which served them both for meat and drink. They also used butter and fat instead of oil. Their kings had divine honours paid them, and never appeared in public, in order the more greatly to attract the veneration of their subjects (26).

(C) The Megabari, a canton, as should seem, of the Troglodytes, fought with clubs, and carried before them round shields made of raw ox-hides; many of their neighbours, however, were armed with bows and arrows (27).

(D) We have observed in a former note, that Herodotus is not intirely consistent with himself in what he says of circumcision, as a rite practised in Egypt and Ethiopia; which must undoubtedly not a little contribute towards invalidating his authority in this particular. But, waving this consideration,

Ethiopian soldiers tied their arrows round their (E) heads, the feathered part of a which touched their foreheads, temples, &c. and the other projected out like so many rays, which formed a kind of crown. These arrows were extremely short, pointed with sharp stones instead of iron, and dipped in the virus of dragons, or some other lethiferous poison, insomuch that all the wounds given by them were attended with immediate death. The bows from which they shot these arrows were four cubits long, and required so much strength to manage them, that no nation could make use of them but the Ethiopians. According to several authors, when they came to a general action with an enemy, they darkened the air with clouds or showers of these arrows. Many tribes of the people now under consideration, particularly the Blemmyes, had wonderful skill in using the weapons here mentioned, b taking aim so well, and hitting the mark so exactly, that some of the ancients imagined every individual of them to have had four eyes. The Ethiopians retreated fighting in the same manner as the Parthians, discharging volleys of arrows with such dexterity and address whilst they were retiring full speed, that they terribly galled the enemy. It appears from Scylax, Horace, and Ælian, that the Mauritanians and Blacks, or western Ethiopians, were likewise very expert archers, and shot poisoned arrows; and the same thing has been observed of their posterity by the epitomizer of Edrissi, or, as he is more usually called, the Nubian geographer. 18. Their lances or darts were of an immense size, which may be deemed a farther proof of their vast bodily strength. 19. The Macrobians or long-lived Ethiopians fed for the most c part upon roasted flesh, drank milk, and frequently attained to the age of an hundred and twenty years. 'Tis said, that this longevity was principally owing to a rich and fragrant fountain, rendering their bodies smooth, as if anointed with oil, and perfuming them with the odour of violets, wherein they frequently bathed themselves. 20. These Ethiopians looked upon brass as the most valuable of metals, and had gold in such little esteem, that they fettered their prisoners with golden chains. 21. They dried the bodies (F) of their ancestors, and laid thereon a covering of white plaster, on which they drew a picture as nearly resembling the deceased as possible, and inclosed the whole in a case of crystal, according to Herodotus. Diodorus also affirms, that they kept the bodies of their friends and relations in their d

when he asserts circumcision to have prevailed ἀπ' ἀρχῆς, from the beginning, amongst the Egyptians, Colchi, and Ethiopians, he cannot be supposed to mean, that they received it from their first ancestor. For in such a case it must have passed from him to the Philistines, who were likewise his descendants; which all, who pay the least regard to Scripture, will allow to be false. That expression, therefore, must either import indefinitely, that it had been observed in Egypt from time immemorial, or from some period near the beginning of the great Egyptian empire formed by Ammenemes and Sesac, about the reign of Solomon, one of the greatest and most powerful princes of his age, and in alliance with Egypt, between five and six hundred years before Herodotus wrote his history. And here in fact several learned men have placed the introduction of this institution into Egypt. Besides, what has been advanced by Herodotus, in the point before us, seems to be founded on a mistake, as may be inferred from Diodorus and Strabo. Those authors, who probably followed him, believed, or at least pretended to believe, the Hebrews to have derived the rite of circumcision from Egypt, because they were originally a colony of the Egyptians, and consequently agreed with them in all their customs and manners, in both their sacred and civil institutions. But, as nothing can be more false than such a notion, not the least regard is due to what they have advanced upon a supposition of its truth. That the Samaritans or Cuthaans, whom Herodotus calls Syrians of Palestine, should declare to him, that they received circumcision from the Egyptians, must be attributed to their hatred of the Jews. As for Herodotus, he was frequently imposed upon most egregiously by the Egyptians, especially in points relating either to the antiquity of their monarchy, or those customs they had in common with other nations. Their excessive vanity would not permit them to speak the truth, when they imagined it would reflect the least honour or glory upon any of the neighbouring states. For which reason, as well as others that might be offered, and particularly because it seems to us diametrically opposite to Scripture, we cannot pay any regard to the sentiment of those authors, who either deduce circumcision originally out of Egypt, or make the Hebrews to have borrowed it of the Egyptians (28).

(E) Before they took any arrows from their heads, in order to begin a general action, they had a particular kind of dance, as we learn from Lucian. But how such a custom came first to be introduced amongst them, or what they intended by it, has not been intimated by any ancient author (29).

(F) In another place the same Diodorus observes, that when the corps came from the embalmer's, the very eye-lashes, brows, and features, were so well preserved, that the whole form of the body was invariably retained, and the original effigies or likenesses known. Wherefore, continues he, many of the Egyptians kept the bodies of their ancestors within magnificent depositories, in order to behold the complete images of those who had been dead perhaps many ages before they themselves had been born. There they not only saw the lineaments of their faces, but also the make of their bodies; all which they contemplated with great delight (30).

a houses, within cases of glass, not thinking it right, that the knowledge of the features, and the likeness of their dead relations, should be concealed from their surviving kindred, or that they should be forgotten by their posterity. Herodotus adds, that the dead were clearly seen through the crystal above-mentioned, emitting no ill scent, nor being at all disagreeable to the eye, since they perfectly resembled the persons when alive. They were kept, continues the same author, a whole year in the houses of their nearest relations, who, during that term, honoured their manes with sacrifices, and first-fruits of all kinds: after which they carried them out, and placed them upright round the parts adjoining to their cities. 22. Other Ethiopic cantons buried their dead in earthen coffins about their temples, and swore by their
b manes, as has been before related of the Nasamones; and lastly, others threw them into the river, looking upon this as the best sort of burial that could possibly be allotted them. 23. Some of the Ethiopians had no regular meals; or stated times of eating, but always refreshed themselves when hunger and thirst prompted them thereto. 24. The Ethiopian Anthropophagi lived upon human flesh, as we learn from Philostratus, Pliny, Solinus, and Ptolemy. This seems fully to evince, that the Cafres, and consequently the territories they inhabited, were known to the ancients, though we find scarce any thing in the old geographers concerning them*.

As the Ethiopians agreed with the Egyptians in most of their laws, their splendid funerals, the (H) deification of their princes, the several colleges of priests, circum-
c cision, and in fine most of their sacred and civil institutions, 'tis highly probable, that the same arts, sciences, and learning, as well as religion, prevailed amongst both nations. Nay, this seems to be expressly asserted by Diodorus Siculus, when he informs us, that not only the same kind of statues, but likewise the same hieroglyphic figures and characters, were used in Egypt and Ethiopia; since it is generally allowed, that those were the repositories of the Egyptian wisdom and literature. It must be owned, that an ingenious modern writer roundly affirms, that no nation besides the Egyptians continued to write with marks after the invention of letters; all others immediately dropping their hieroglyphics on the discovery of that more commodious method, because the Egyptian hieroglyphics only contained any wisdom
d or learning. But these seem to be assertions not only arbitrary and precarious, but plainly false, as appearing both incapable of proof, and diametrically opposite to what Diodorus Siculus has advanced from the best authors who had written before his time of the nation we are now upon. Nay, that they had persons amongst them eminent for their wisdom, may be inferred from a writer cited by Photius; and that there was a great affinity betwixt them and the Egyptians, in most points of importance, seems to have been the general sentiment of the Romans as well as the Greeks, as is implied by Festus, when he calls them Ægyptini. Homer also celebrates both their wisdom and religion, when he makes Jupiter, and the rest of the gods, to attend their entertainments. That they even were instructed in several branches of literature by c Moses himself, who was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians, may be collected from Artapanus in Eusebius, Josephus, and others. But, waving all other proofs and authorities that might be offered in favour of the point here insisted upon, it will be sufficient to observe, that a nation so near Egypt, the centre of learning and po-

(H) Diodorus relates, that the Egyptians learned the custom of deifying their kings from the Ethiopians. Nay, according to him, the Egyptians derived statuary, and even their letters themselves, from the same source. This author also observes, that the Egyptian and Ethiopian priests, as well as kings, wore caps wreathed round with serpents called asps; by which was intimated, that every person guilty of treason would as certainly suffer death, as if he had been bit by that poisonous animal (32).

liteness in very early ages, with which the Ethiopians always kept open a communication, and so potent as this appears from history in most remote times to have been, could not avoid arriving at a very laudable degree of (I) knowledge both in the liberal arts and sciences, and those termed mechanical.

THE Ethiopians were naturally bold and intrepid, but violent in their temper. They likewise surpassed most other nations in beauty, and largeness of size, to which a proportionable degree of strength was generally annexed. For which reason Herodotus intimates, that the Macrobii conferred the royal dignity upon the most beautiful, large, and strongest person they could find amongst them. Both they and the Arabians had an invincible aversion to mice, as we learn from Plutarch. If the modern Abassines resemble their ancestors, they were well-shaped, of a generous disposition, and exceeding quick parts. Upon the same supposition, some of them must have been free, cheerful, humane, forgivers of injuries, and great lovers of (K) justice. According to various authors, the proper antient Ethiopians were, for the most part, perfectly black, as we find their posterity at this day, tho' some particular cantons were white, called, by Pliny, white Ethiopians. 'Tis probable they were pleased with their natural colour, and preferred it to those of other nations. Some writers affirm, that the children of the present Abassines are terrified at the sight of an European, as much as ours are at that of a Negro; and that they paint the devil white, in order to ridicule all complexions of, or bordering upon, that colour. Others relate, that in some provinces of Abassia the people are of an olive-colour; that in general they are born white, with a black spot upon their navel, which in a short time after their birth spreads over their whole body; and that, being transported into Europe, they become white at the second or third generation. Gregory the Abassine informed Ludolphus, that his countrymen came into the world of a reddish hue, but in a short time turned black. Their women are strong and lusty, and bring forth with little pain, as usually happens in the warmer climates. When they are in labour, they kneel down upon their knees, as the Hebrew women did, and are delivered without the help of a midwife. Many, if not all, of these particulars undoubtedly held equally true of the antient Ethiopians, who, from what is observable in their posterity, seem to have been likewise very patient of labour, capable of bearing the greatest fatigues, and endued with uncommon vivacity. Lastly, from Herodotus compared with the relations of some modern authors, 'tis not unlikely, that they died purely of old-age, a few only excepted, who either fell by the sword, or were devoured by wild beasts, as Sallust has observed of the antient *Africans*².

(I) Lucian makes the Ethiopians to have excelled all other nations in wisdom and literature. According to him, they invented astronomy and astrology, and communicated those sciences, as well as many other branches of learning, to the Egyptians. As their country was very fit for making celestial observations, such a notion seems not intirely groundless; though scarce any particulars of their knowledge have reached us (33).

(K) Pausanias, when he distinguishes the proper Ethiopians from those bordering upon the Mauri and Nasamones, remarks, that the people of Meroe, as well as the other neighbouring Ethiopians, were eminent for their love of justice. This observation was probably truer than what he subjoins to it, viz. that the Ethiopians had no other river but the Nile; though, as all other rivers join the Nile, this is no unpardonable mistake. However, the accounts he had received of the country inhabited by that people were not over-accurate; as we may collect from his confounding the Ethiopian ox or bull with the rhinoceros, and other instances that might be produced (34).

C H A P. VII.

The history of the Ethiopians, to the usurpation of the Zagæan family, which commenced about the year of Christ 960.

- ^a WE have already observed, that not only the vast tract stretching from the southern limits of Egypt to Libya Incognita, and the peninsula of Arabia, as well as one part of it on the coast of the Red Sea, contiguous to Egypt, but likewise Susiana, called by the Orientalists Kbuzestân, and the country watered by the Araxes, the seat of the ancient Scythians, went under the denomination of Cush amongst the Asiatic nations, and Ethiopia amongst the Greeks. Where Cush himself settled immediately after the dispersion, authors are far from being agreed; some placing him in Susiana or Kbuzestân, others in Arabia Felix, and others in that district near the confines of Egypt, called in Scripture the land of Midian or Madian. Possibly some of his descendants might contribute towards peopling all the different regions here mentioned; but 'tis probable, that the greatest body of them advanced towards Arabia and Egypt, since the posterity of Elam the son of Shem replenished, in all likelihood, most of the provinces of Persia, and particularly Elymais contiguous to Susiana or Kbuzestân. Be that as it will, 'tis certain, the land of Midian went by the name of Cush before the age of Moses, when, 'tis natural to suppose, the country washed by the Araxes was but thinly peopled, and even scarce known. That the children of Cush should have migrated in the most numerous parties into Arabia, and particularly that part of Yaman bordering upon the streights of Bab al Mandab, as well as the country afterwards called the land of Midian, has the greatest appearance of truth, since these seem to be the most commodious situations for throwing large colonies of Cushites into the proper Ethiopia, as well as the inland parts of Africa. To support farther the conjecture offered to the consideration of our readers here, it may be observed from various authors, that a good part of the upper Egypt was possessed by the Cushites in the most early ages, and that the city of Cos, Kûs, or Kîsh, situated upon the Nile in that country, confounded by some with the famous Thebes, took its name from Cush the father of the Ethiopians. The Arabs call Ethiopia not only Habash, from Habash the supposed son of Cush, but likewise Cush or Coush, in like manner as the Hebrews. The first kings of this country we have no account of, that deserves the least regard. 'Tis probable, that several princes reigned here at the same time, before any of the great empires were formed, as in Egypt. Some of the modern Abassines pretend, that one Arwe was the first king of Ethiopia, but relate nothing memorable of him, only that he was assassinated by one Angab, who afterwards ascended the throne, and was succeeded by Sabanut, Gedur, &c. As for the catalogue annexed to the fabulous history of Tzagaxus, and what we find on this head in Jerome Vecchietti, not the least degree of credit is due to them. The present king of Ethiopia, or emperor of Abassia, is styled by his subjects Negus, i. e. king; but, as the governors of provinces are sometimes honoured with that appellation, his proper title is Negusa Nagast Zai-tiopia, i. e. king of the kings of Ethiopia.
- ^e IT may be inferred from some authors, that the Ethiopians possessed Thebais before Moses's time, and consequently that they were a powerful nation from the remotest antiquity. According to these authors, they made an irruption into the Lower Egypt whilst Moses was there, and penetrated as far as Memphis. Having defeated the Egyptians in a pitched battle, they threatened them with immediate destruction. Whereupon the Egyptian gods, being consulted, ordered their votaries to put a Hebrew at the head of their forces, and then march against the enemy. The king, in a pursuance of this order, prevailed upon Moses to accept the command of his army, and to take an oath of fidelity to him. Moses, being vested with an unlimited power to act as he should think proper for the good of his master's service, immediately advanced at the head of his troops into the heart of the enemy's country. As he did not judge it expedient to march along the banks of the Nile, in conformity to their expectations, but to push through some mediterranean provinces, greatly infested with serpents of an enormous size, towards Meroe the capital of Ethiopia, he was obliged to have recourse to the following stratagem, in order to save his men: He filled many chests or paniers, made of the Egyptian plant papyrus, with vast numbers of the ibis, an Egyptian bird, that had a natural antipathy to serpents of all kinds, and made great havock of them. When he approached the tract abounding with those animals, he let out his birds, which destroyed all of them they met with, and opened a passage for the Egyptian forces. Moses, therefore, without any difficulty, surpris'd the Ethiopians, gave them a total defeat, and at last shut them up in Meroe. But this place was rendered in a manner impregnable by the Nile, the Asapus, and the Asaboras, which so surrounded it, that it was almost impossible for an army to approach it. However, Moses's good fortune interposing, he found means to make himself master of it. The king of Ethiopia's daughter, observing from the walls Moses's bravery in repulsing several sallies of the besieged, and being charmed with his success, fell desperately in love with him, and, by the assistance of some friends she could confide in, offered to deliver up the place to him, provided he would swear to marry her. This overture, continue the same authors, Moses complied with, was thereupon admitted into the town, and married her. However, he treated the citizens with great rigour and severity, first plundering them, and then putting most of them to the sword. In fine, having ravaged the whole country, razed or dismantled all the places of strength, and consequently rendered the Ethiopians for a long time incapable of making head against the Egyptians, he returned home with great glory. Cedrenus intimates, that this war lasted ten years^b.

The Abassines believe their kings to be descended from Solomon and the queen of Sheba.

THE Abassines are firmly persuaded, that the celebrated queen (A) of Sheba, who had an interview with Solomon, reigned over the proper Ethiopia. They have a history of her written at large, but interspersed with various fables. The substance of it is as follows: Makeda, for according to them that was her name, receiving an account, from Tamerin an Ethiopian merchant, of the surprising power and wisdom of Solomon, took a journey to Jerusalem to know the truth of this report. She was attended by a great train of her prime nobility, and carried with her a variety of most magnificent presents. After she had been instructed at Jerusalem in the worship of the true God, she returned home, and within the space of a year brought forth a son begotten by Solomon, who named him David; but he was called by his mother and her subjects Menelech, or Menilebech, that is, another self. He received his education at Solomon's court, and was accompanied home by many doctors of the law, and Israelites of distinction, and particularly Azariab the son of Zadoc the high priest. By the assistance of these Hebrew attendants he established the religion, professed by his father, in Ethiopia, where it continued till that kingdom embraced christianity. The Arabs and Abassines have given the princess above-mentioned several names, as Makeda, Belkis, Balkis, or Bulkis, Negbesta Azeb, i. e. queen of the south, as we find her styled by our Saviour, and the Ethiopic version, &c. The Abassines pretend, that their kings are descended in a right line from Menelech, and even most of the noble families in Abassia at this day trace their respective pedigrees up to Solomon^c.

This tradition clogged with some absurdities, though not to be deemed intirely false.

THAT this tradition is clogged with some absurdities, will appear to any one who considers it with the least attention, though at the same time it must be allowed, as hinted above, that part of it is not void of an appearance of truth. Ethiopia is f

(A) Josephus says, that the queen of Sheba governed Egypt as well as Ethiopia; but as this notion runs counter to the whole stream both of sacred and profane antiquity, we shall not scruple to reject it (1).

- a^r more to the south of Judaea than the territory or kingdom of Saba in Arabia Felix, and consequently seems to bid fairer than that country for the dominions of that princess whom our Saviour calls the queen of the south. Ethiopia is styled the remotest part of the habitable world by Herodotus and Strabo, and therefore better agrees with what our Saviour has said of the queen of Sheba, viz. that she came from the uttermost parts of the earth, than Arabia possibly can do. Nor can it be deemed a sufficient reply to this argument, that Arabia Felix was the uttermost part of the earth in respect of Judaea, since it was bounded by the Red Sea; for that not only Egypt, but even Ethiopia, regions beyond that sea, were known to, and even had a communication with, the Jews, both before and in our Saviour's time, is indisputably clear. Lastly,
- b from what has been suggested above, it appears no improbable conjecture, that Judaism was not only known in a part at least of Ethiopia, but likewise nearly related to the established religion there, at the beginning of the apostolical age, if not much earlier. However, we would not be understood as pretending to determine the residence of the queen of the south; especially since so much may be said for Arabia, as well as the country we are now upon. After all, these two opinions, so contrary in appearance, may be made consistent without great difficulty; since 'tis agreed, that Arabia and Ethiopia have antiently born the same name, been included, during certain intervals, in one empire, and governed by one prince. Part of the Arabs and Ethiopians had the same origin, and very considerable numbers of the Abasseni
- c transplanted themselves from Arabia Felix into Ethiopia, as already observed; which seems sufficient to make appear the intercourse that has formerly subsisted between the Cushites or Ethiopians of Asia and Africa ^d.

- BUT whether our readers will think proper to fix the queen of Sheba in Arabia or Ethiopia, whether they will admit or reject the history of that princess and her son given us by the Abassines, it seems clear from Scripture, that the Ethiopians were subject to Sesac, either in Solomon's time, or soon after his death. For, that the Cushites mentioned in the passage here referred to, were the proper Ethiopians, appears from their being joined with the Lubim or Libyans, who likewise served in the army of that prince. This, it must be owned, is a strong proof, that Sesostris and Sesac were
- d the same person, in conformity to what Josephus asserts, since we read not in Scripture of any Egyptian but Sesac that was master of Ethiopia, and since Herodotus positively asserts, that Sesostris alone, of all the Egyptian monarchs, enjoyed the empire of that country. But further, as the Scripture takes no notice of any great conqueror that was king of Egypt before Sesac, it is in the highest degree probable, that he was the first who extended his conquests in so wonderful a manner as we find the antients have related of Sesostris; since, had such great achievements been performed sooner, the sacred history would undoubtedly have given us some hint of them, especially as the Hebrews had such an intercourse with the Egyptians almost from the remotest antiquity. The silence therefore of Scripture in this particular is an argu-
- e ment of no small force in favour of what Josephus has advanced relating to the identity of Sesostris and Sesac. Nay, we will venture to affirm, that it tends strongly to evince the Egyptian empire, founded by Ammenemes and Sesac, to have been the first great empire that ever was formed. For the high, and even incredible, antiquity of the Assyrian empire depends only upon the authority of Ctesias, not the least hint, in support of such antiquity, being visible in Scripture; on the contrary, it plainly appearing from thence, that it was founded by Pul, about two hundred years after the taking of Jerusalem by Sesac. Notwithstanding, therefore, the ineffectual labours of so many learned men to vindicate the notorious falsehoods of Ctesias, or, which is the same thing, of the antient Greek and Latin authors who copied from
- f him, no one, who has the least regard for Scripture, can possibly imagine any Egyptian monarch of great note to have flourished before Sesac, or Assyrian before Pul. This notion has been set in the strongest light by Sir Isaac Newton, but opposed by many ingenious and learned men. However, as these learned men seem not to have duly attended to what Sir Isaac has advanced, and as it has been that illustrious author's misfortune to have his works at first misunderstood, though they have afterwards shone out with a double lustre, we shall beg leave to make a general remark upon the most considerable writers, who have endeavoured to overthrow his system of chronology, which to us seems nearer the truth than any other. We do ^a not pretend to adopt every particular sentiment advanced in this noble piece, and therefore shall not offer an answer to all the objections urged against it; nor indeed, were we so disposed, would the nature of the work we are at present engaged in render this practicable*.

Sir Isaac Newton misrepresented.

SIR Isaac allows, that before the time of Ammon or Ammenemes the father of Sesac, there were several kings in Egypt, and even adopts what Manetho has written of the kings of the Lower Egypt; only he contends, that the Upper and Lower Egypt were not united under one prince before the reign of Ammon. And how does this contradict Scripture, which takes notice only of the kings of Misraim, or that part of the Lower Egypt bordering upon Arabia and Palestine? Nay, does he not suppose the truth ^b of the most early Scripture-accounts of Egypt, by referring to the book of Genesis on several occasions, by deducing from thence several facts corroboratory of his system? Does he not intimate, that the lower part of Egypt was governed by a series of kings from the remotest antiquity, even from the first invention of corn there, to Josbua's invasion of Canaan; that the people of this country worshipped the prince at the head of this series, who taught them to make bread, after his death, in the ox or calf, for this benefaction? And can any thing better tally with Scripture, or rather be more firmly founded upon it, as well as consonant to all profane antiquity, than this observation? Nay, does he not offer it as his opinion, that this prince reigned in the Lower Egypt as early as the first plantation of it, and therefore might, for ^c ought that appears to the contrary from him, or rather as he strongly insinuates, be Misraim? To what purpose then have we been troubled with so much empty jangling, and outcries against him, as though he had attacked the authority of Scripture, by denying the being of that antient kingdom in the Lower Egypt so frequently mentioned by the sacred historian? In short, most of those persons, who have so grossly misrepresented Sir Isaac in this particular, have been either professed infidels, or such as secretly favoured infidelity; or lastly, such as have implicitly swallowed the absurdities of Ctesias. But from these our great author is neither to expect candour nor impartiality. He has so effectually overthrown that romantic antiquity of the Egyptian empire, which the Egyptian priests endeavoured to palm upon the world, ^d and which so long has been one of the last resources of infidelity, that all our modern deists, as well as their secret abettors, must of course declare against him: and those persons, who are so hardy as to attempt in earnest the reconciliation of Ctesias with Scripture, are, in our opinion, not only capable of opposing what Sir Isaac has offered in defence of his system, but all the mathematical demonstration that ever appeared in the world ^e.

Some of the principal objections against him considered.

BUT it is said, that Sir Isaac makes Sesostris or Sesac to have introduced instruments of war, the exact distribution of property, &c. amongst the Egyptians; which is not only contrary to Scripture, but likewise to what we have just advanced. And was there then no other country called Egypt but the land of Misraim mentioned by Moses in the first book of the pentateuch, or rather did that kingdom include all ^e the tract the Greeks called Egypt? No, this cannot be maintained; since that country is known not to have contained all the Lower Egypt, much less the Lower and Upper Egypt united; and it may be as well known, by perusing Sir Isaac with a proper attention, that both these united were the Egypt governed by Sesac. That prince, therefore, might have introduced the things enumerated by our great chronologer, for so we shall not scruple to call him, notwithstanding the cavils of his adversaries, into some parts of the Upper Egypt, or several savage districts not far from the western coast of the Red Sea, and civilized the inhabitants, though a kingdom had subsisted in the Lower Egypt, whose members had been tolerably polished ^f before the reign of Sesac, from the age of Misraim. These points are by no means incompatible, and therefore nothing to the prejudice of Sir Isaac's system of chronology can be inferred from the supposed disagreement of them. On the contrary, as the Troglodytes, appertaining partly to Egypt, and partly to Ethiopia, remained in a state of barbarity many ages after Sesac, 'tis no such improbable notion, that before his time several other tribes inhabiting the Upper Egypt might be as rude and barba-

- a rous some of the antients represented them. But it is farther urged, that Sir Isaac makes Ammon and Sefac to have been the great gods of the Egyptians and Ethiopians, known amongst the Greeks and Romans by the names Zeus, Jupiter, Dionysus, Bacchus, &c. which runs counter to the whole stream of antiquity, and withal contradicts Scripture; since Apis, Serapis, i. e. Jupiter, was worshipped by the Egyptians before the exodus of the Israelites, the golden calf being set up by that nation in the wilderness in imitation of the Egyptian Apis. Now, that the first king of that very ancient monarchy in the Lower Egypt, so frequently mentioned by Moses, was deified for the reason already assigned, and worshipped in the ox or calf, is expressly asserted by Sir Isaac; and therefore we may most rationally account for the Israelites paying
- b divine honours to the golden calf from him, without having recourse to the worship of Apis. For although this worship, in several particulars, resembled that of a more ancient deity, even the first king of the land of Misraim, it does not from thence follow, that this deified prince was the Egyptian Apis. One strong presumption, that these two pagan divinities were really different, is, that the god Mnevis seems more properly to correspond with the founder of the kingdom of Misraim than Apis. For Mnevis (B) was kept at Heliopolis, and consequently held in the highest veneration there, whereas Apis resided at Memphis. Now Heliopolis was much more ancient than Memphis, being the city On, whose priest's daughter Joseph married, as appears clearly from the Septuagint. It was likewise nearer the confines of Palestine and
- c Arabia than Memphis, nay, it seems to have been in the very land of Goshen or Gessen, where the Israelites dwelt immediately before the exodus; on which accounts the principal deity there must bid fairer for the most ancient deified prince above-mentioned, and that represented by the Israelitish golden calf, than any other. Which single observation, exclusive of many others that might be offered, ought to be deemed a full refutation of the point so confidently advanced in this objection. Again, we are told, that Sir Isaac Newton invalidates the authority of Scripture, when he intimates alphabetic letters not to have been received in Egypt before the time of Ammon the father of Sefac, that is, in some part of David's reign. But how does this appear? Does the Scripture say any thing of the alphabetic characters of Egypt before
- d that period, either directly or by implication? And if not, how can such a notion in any manner affect Scripture? We cannot, therefore, but own ourselves greatly surpris'd at the conduct of a very learned and ingenious author, who charges this opinion with being contrary to Scripture, and, in support of that charge, quotes the following passage — “As to the precise time of the invention of Egyptian letters, IT CAN NEVER BE SO MUCH AS GUESSED AT.” — “However, that letters (in
- e “Egypt) were very early, we have clearly shewn above, as well from other circumstances as from this, that the invention of them was given to their gods.” Now 'tis remarkable, that these circumstances no-where appear; and that the other passage referred to, in order to support what is here advanced, only takes notice of writing, which, it is well known, in the earliest times always consisted of hieroglyphic characters. As for the origin of arts and sciences in the land of Misraim, or the Scripture Egypt, all that we can say of it is, that it preceded the age of Moses, who, as St. Stephen himself, under the actual influence of the Holy Ghost, informs us, was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. But what a progress literature had then made there, we cannot pretend to say. 'Tis not improbable, that the art of onirocritic, or interpretation of dreams, astrology, including so much of the simple elements of astronomy as contained the knowledge of the true system of the world, some maxims of

(B) That Mnevis and Apis were different deities, or rather representatives of different deities, appears from hence, that the Egyptians held the latter in much higher veneration than the former. The worship of Apis seems to have been not only universal in Egypt, but likewise common to most of the nations of Arabia, India, and Ethiopia; whereas the chief divine honours paid Mnevis did not extend much farther than the district of Heliopolis, if they were not absolutely confined to that place. Now this is easy to be conceived, nay, perfectly rational, upon Sir Isaac Newton's principles; for he supposes, that Sesostris or Sefac was the first prince in possession both of the Upper and Lower Egypt, Ethiopia, &c. and that he civilized several nations; whereas he believes the ancient kingdom of Misraim, or the Scripture Egypt, to have been of no larger an extent than we have already hinted. Ammianus Marcellinus seems plainly to give Mnevis the preference to Apis in point of antiquity; and the notion he appears to espouse will be rendered probable, not only by what we here advance, but likewise by a careful and diligent comparison of the authors here referred to with one another (1).

civil policy, with certain theological notions, made up the greatest part of it. But a we cannot collect from hence, that they knew even so much of the principles of astronomy and geometry, as to understand the art of navigation before the time Sir Isaac mentions; nor that any of the arts or sciences, which he intimates began to flourish amongst the Egyptians about the reigns of Ammon and Sesac, were cultivated there to any great purpose before that period. But admitting, that the Egyptians of the land of Misraim, before the reigns of the princes above-mentioned, were as learned and polite as Sir Isaac's adversaries would insinuate, which yet is utterly improbable, it will not follow, that the Upper Egypt, Libya, &c. had then any great pretensions to learning and politeness; and therefore every thing advanced upon that supposition, which is almost the sum of what has been offered against Sir Isaac's b system of chronology, deserves not the least attention. In fine, most of those gentlemen, who have opposed this excellent piece, seem to have confounded the kingdom of Misraim with that Egyptian empire which arrived at its last perfection in the days of Sesac, if not with Libya, Troglodytica, and other barbarous countries over-run and civilized by that prince. And not only so, but they have considered some of his notions as detached from others, with which, in reality, they have a close connection; have attacked several points without informing their readers what he has urged in defence of them; have attempted an answer to some of his weaker arguments without touching upon those of greater strength; lastly, have never taken a full survey of the system, but only fallen upon some of those parts they thought c the most liable to exception, and, from a supposed refutation of them, collected the falsity of the whole. However, 'tis not our business here to enter into a nice discussion of all the particulars relating to this controversy, nor to examine every cavil levelled at a work, the main part of which, we believe, will, sooner or later, meet with a general good reception from the learned world. For, with regard to some particular sentiments in it, learned men will always think differently of them, as has been the fate of several parts of the most excellent productions in all ages. As such a digression merited a place in some part of this work, and comes in naturally enough here, we hope it will be pardoned, if not favourably received by our readers. — But to resume the thread of our history f;

History of Ethiopia, to the second expulsion of the shepherds.

W^e have already observed, that Sesac subdued and reigned over Ethiopia. After his death a civil war seems to have broke out in Egypt, which Sir Isaac Newton believes to have been invaded at this juncture by the Libyans, and defended by the Ethiopians. But about ten years afterwards, continues the same illustrious author, the Ethiopians drowned Sesac's successor in the Nile, and seized upon Egypt. With that kingdom, Libya also fell into their hands, which will enable us to account for the numerous host with which Zerab the Ethiopian advanced against Afa king of Judab. However, Afa overthrew that army, consisting of a million of men, in the fifteenth year of his reign, and dispersed it in such a manner, that Zerab could never afterwards rally his scattered forces. Upon which, the people of the Lower e Egypt revolted from the Ethiopians, and, being sustained by a body of two hundred thousand Jewish or Canaanitish auxiliaries, forced Memnon or Amenophis, king of that nation, to retire to Memphis. 'Tis probable, that the Egyptians, under the conduct of their chief priest Ufortbon, Oforchon, Osarchor, or Osarsiphus, followed their blow; since, after Memnon had turned the course of the (C) Nile, built a bridge over that river, and fortified the pass there, he retreated with great precipitation into Ethiopia. However, about thirteen years after this disgrace, he and his young son *Ramesse*s returned at the head of a powerful army, and drove the above-mentioned Jews or Phenicians out of the Lower Egypt; which action the Egyptian writers called the

(C) This famous river, we suppose, by way of eminence, was called the Nile, i. e. the river, the torrents, &c. for that the word נַחַל Naal or Niil imports. Amongst the *Oriental*s the vowels were nearly related to one another, and consequently a permutation of them frequent; and that the letter Π, in some words, had not formerly so much as the force even of a note of aspiration, is evinced by Bochart. Νεῖλος and Nilus, therefore, are only נַחַל with a Greek and Latin termination {3}.

- a second expulsion of the shepherds, as we learn from the aforesaid illustrious author, in conjunction with Manetho s.

We are told by Cedrenus, a writer of good authority, that, about fifty years after A deluge in Cecrops the first king of Athens began to reign, there happened a deluge in Ethiopia, Ethiopia. but what damage the inhabitants of that country sustained on this occasion, he informs us not. However, it is probable, that the effects of it were sufficiently felt, since otherwise it would not have merited the notice of any historian. As Cedrenus follows the technical chronology of Eratoſthenes, he places this event too high; but this in no manner affects us, who are not disposed to pay any great regard to that chronology. From what writer he extracted this article, we cannot take upon us so much

- b as to conjecture ^h.

FROM several historical facts, Sir Isaac renders it extremely probable, that Menes, Continued to Memnon, and Amenophis, were the same person; that the Ethiopian prince, who the time of Sa- went by these names, was the son of Zerob; and that he died in a very advanced age (D), about ninety years after the death of Solomon. According to the same incomparable writer, the city of Memphis, called in Scripture Moph and Noph, as likewise Menoph or Menuf by the Arabian historians, derived its name from that of this prince, who either built it, or first fortified it, to prevent Osarsiphus from entering Ethiopia. The Argonautic expedition happened in the reign of Amenophis, according to the principles of the system we have at present in view. Some Greek authors relate, that he assisted king Priamus with a body of Ethiopian troops. After his decease, his son Rameses ascended the throne of Ethiopia, who built the northern portico of the temple of Vulcan at Memphis. Mari, his successor, adorned Memphis, and fixed his residence there, near two generations after the Trojan war, upon the same principles. Cheops, Cephren, and Myserinus, were the three next kings, the last of which was succeeded by his sister Nitocris. Then came Alychis, in whose reign both Affyria and Ethiopia revolted from Egypt; which thereupon was again divided into several small kingdoms. Gnephalius governed one of these, and resided at Memphis; but his son Bocchoris was slain by So or Sabacon the Ethiopian, who made himself master of Egypt. As all the principal achievements of these monarchs, transmitted c down to us by sacred and profane antiquity, have already been taken notice of in the history of Egypt, we have almost intirely passed them over here. However, we must not omit informing our readers, that, in the twenty-second year of Bocchoris's reign, Africanus has fixed the commencement of the æra of Nabonassar ⁱ.

Sabacon, or So, as he is called in Scripture, soon after the reduction of Egypt, To the death of entered into an alliance with Hoshea king of Israel; which induced that prince to attempt shaking off the yoke of the Affyrians; but his efforts proving unsuccessful, a period was put to the kingdom of Israel by Sbalmaneser, in the twenty-fourth year of the æra of Nabonassar. According to Herodotus, Sabacon, after a reign of fifty years, voluntarily relinquished Egypt, and retired into Ethiopia. But, according to Afri- c canus, he reigned only eight years in Egypt, and died in the ninth year of Hezekiah, or twenty-ninth of Nabonassar. The former author likewise informs us, that Setbon, whom some take to be the Sevechus of Manetho, his successor, advanced to Pelusium, with a powerful army, against Sennacherib king of Affyria, whom he was enabled to defeat by a vast number of mice, which devoured the shield-straps and bow-strings of the Affyrians; and that, to perpetuate the memory of so surprising an event, the statue of Setbon, which he saw, had a mouse in its hand. As a mouse was the Egyptian and Ethiopian symbol of destruction, this seems to intimate, that he overthrew the Affyrians with a great destruction. Sir Isaac Newton therefore believes, that Setbon, in conjunction with Tirbakab, either king of the Arabian Cusbites, or a relation of f Setbon, and his viceroy in the Proper Ethiopia, surprised and defeated Sennacherib

(D) That this prince attained to an extreme old age is intimated by Philostatus, when he affirms Memnon to have reigned five ages or generations in Ethiopia. He also gives us to understand, that the Ethiopians, some of them he means, were longerlived than any other nation; which seems to agree with Herodotus. But when he relates, that the proper Ethiopians were originally of India, and expelled that country for an assassination of one king Ganges, he deserves not the least credit (4).

betwixt Libnab and Pelufum, making as great a slaughter amongst his troops, as if a their bow-strings had been eaten by mice. This may be rendered consistent enough with the Scripture-account of the blow received by Sennacherib, as we have elsewhere observed. The Egyptian priests computed three hundred and forty-one generations, or eleven thousand three hundred and forty years, from the beginning of their monarchy and priesthood, to the time when Setbon ascended the throne of Egypt. The priests, during that period, as they pretended, had succeeded one another, without interruption, under the name of Piromis, an Egyptian word, signifying a good and virtuous man. Herodotus intimates, that Sennacherib was king of Arabia, as well as Assyria; which, if admitted, will prove, that Tirbakab presided over the Proper Ethiopia, and not Arabia, as some learned men have supposed. If this be allowed, b it will strengthen, in some sort, the conjecture we have already proposed to the consideration of the learned, viz. that Tirbakab was no other than Sabakon, who had before confined himself to Ethiopia, and left the Egyptian crown to Setbon. However, as this notion must be owned to be clogged with some difficulties, and even absurd, upon the principles of those, who make Tirbakab successor to Setbon, we shall leave our readers to believe as much or as little of it as they please¹.

thence to the reign of Xerxes.

From this time, to the seventy-eighth year of Nabonassar, we hear little of the kingdom of Ethiopia, which was then subjugated by Ezar-baddon king of Assyria. Many enormous cruelties he committed both there and in Egypt, as had been predicted by the prophet Isaiab; and governed both those countries three years, that is, till the c time of his death, which happened in the year of Nabonassar 81. But then the Ethiopi- ans, revolting from the Assyrians, asserted their independency, which they maintained, though a monarchy distinct from Egypt, till the days of Cyrus, who, from Xenophon, seems to have been master of Ethiopia, or at least a considerable part of it. However, soon after the decease of that prince, they withdrew themselves from their subjection to the Persians, since we find his son Cambyfes engaged in a fruitless expedition against them. Herodotus says, that, before he undertook this expedition, he sent an embassy made up of the Ichthyophagi, as understanding the language of that nation, to the king of the Macrobi, or long-lived Ethiopians. The true end of this embassy was not so much to cultivate a good understanding with that prince, as to learn the d strength and condition of his kingdom; though, in order to conceal his design, he sent him a purple robe, bracelets of gold, an alabaster box of rich ointment, a vessel of palm-wine, and other magnificent presents. But the Ethiopian was too acute not to penetrate the Persian monarch's views on this occasion, and therefore frankly told the Ichthyophagi, that he was no stranger to their errand, and that, if Cambyfes entertained any sentiments of equity, he would never desire another prince's territories, nor to reduce to a state of servitude a people, who had never injured him. "How- ever, added he, give him this bow from me, and tell him, that he may think of e "invading the country of the Macrobian Ethiopians, when his subjects can thus easily "draw it; and that, in the mean time, he ought to thank the gods, that they "never inspired the Ethiopians with a desire of extending their dominions beyond the "limits of their own country." Then, unbending the bow, he gave it to the embassad- ors: after which, taking up the royal garment, he demanded of them, What it was, and how made? And being satisfied in both these particulars, he could not forbear observing, "That the robe was a proper emblem and representation of the "deceitful prince who wore it." All the other presents likewise, except the wine, he despised, preferring the iron chains of the Ethiopians, which, he said, were far stronger, to the golden bracelets, &c. of the Persians. However, he owned, that the wine excelled any liquor produced in Ethiopia, and intimated, that the Persians, short-lived as they were, owed most of their days to so noble a cordial. When he f heard, that a good part of their food was bread, he said, He was not at all surpris- ed, that a people, who fed upon dung, did not attain to the longevity of the Macrobian Ethiopians. As for what Herodotus relates of the table of the sun in this country, it favours so much of fable, that we cannot help thinking it beneath the dignity of history to take notice of it. Cambyfes, being extremely incensed at the answer brought by the Ichthyophagi from the Ethiopian, in a mad irrational humour, immediately began his march towards his frontiers, though he wanted all manner of pro-

- a visions for the subsistence of his troops. This at last introduced such a famine amongst them, that the soldiers were obliged to eat one another; so that, not being able to traverse the vast sandy deserts of Ethiopia, he found himself constrained to return, first to Thebes, and afterwards to Memphis, with the loss of a great part of his army. But, could he have penetrated to the centre of this region, it is probable he would have met there with a warm reception, since, by the accession of a large body of Egyptians in the reign of Psammitichus, the Ethiopians must have been very formidable; for we learn from Herodotus, that two hundred and forty thousand Egyptians, posted in different places by that prince, to guard the (E) frontiers on the sides of Arabia, Assyria, Libya, and Ethiopia, having not been relieved within the space of three years, b deserted to the king of Ethiopia, who placed them in a country disaffected to him, with orders to expel the inhabitants, and take possession of their lands. He also informs us, that, in the Egyptian language, they were called Asmak, i. e. those who stand on the left-hand of the king; as likewise, that they civilized the Ethiopians. But the last article we can scarce give any credit to, since, from this very historian himself, and Africanus, it appears, that the Ethiopians were masters of Egypt at least eighty years before the time of Psammitichus; and therefore might have learnt every thing the Egyptians could teach them before, if they were not, from the earliest ages, in all particulars as wise as that people. Sir Isaac Newton insinuates, that Cambyfes conquered Ethiopia, as well as Egypt, about the year of Nabonassar 223. or 224. c But this, as far as we can recollect, can neither be inferred from Herodotus, nor any other good author. Possibly Ethiopia, like Egypt, might have had several collateral princes, whom the antients, through mistake, placed in continual succession; which could not but occasion many blunders and errors in the history of that kingdom. However, Herodotus asserts, that Cambyfes reduced some of the provinces of Ethiopia contiguous to Egypt in the unfortunate expedition above-mentioned; and that they, together with the Troglodytes, sent an annual present to the Persian monarch, consisting of two chænixes of unrefined gold, two hundred bundles of ebony, five Ethiopian boys, and twenty elephants teeth of the largest size, even to his time. But though the Persians subdued not only these provinces, but likewise that part of Libya d bordering upon the western confines of Egypt, and carried their arms as far as the city of Cyrene, yet, that they brought under their dominion all that vast tract, comprehending the kingdoms of Sennar, Abassia, and other countries, answering to the proper Ethiopia of the antients, we cannot help thinking at least very improbable.

AMONGST the various nations that composed the numerous army, with which (F) Xerxes invaded Greece, Herodotus ranks the Ethiopians. He mentions on this occasion

Xerxes has a body of eastern and western Ethiopians, Libyans, &c. in his army.

(E) Herodotus, in the passage here referred to, makes Elephantis or Elephantine, and Daphna Pelusia, opposite boundaries or frontiers of Egypt, and places both of them on the borders of Ethiopia. This seems to point out the true translation of a text in Ezekiel, rendered in our version — I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the tower of Syene, even unto the border of Ethiopia; which ought to be translated, either as we have formerly done it, or in the following terms; I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from Migdol to Syene, even to the border of Ethiopia: for it we suppose Migdol and Syene, or, as Herodotus asserts, Elephantine and Daphna Pelusia, to be opposite frontiers of Egypt, and both on the confines of Ethiopia, then we may look upon the words from Migdol to Syene as a parenthesis, and equivalent to the following words, to the border of Ethiopia. Such a translation will render the passage exceeding obvious and clear, and is supported by a vast number of such parentheses to be met with in the old testament (5).

(F) Herodotus informs us, that Xerxes had not only eastern and western, or Asiatic and African, Ethiopians in his army, but likewise Libyans. The eastern or Asiatic Ethiopians, he tells us, shodded one part of their bodies with a species of gypsum or plaster, and another with minium or red-lead, immediately before they came to a general action. The Libyans, from his account of them, seem to have been negroes, who by Diodorus Siculus are called Ethiopians. That author gives us the following description of them: "They are, says he, flat-faced, exceeding fierce and cruel, in their manners resembling beasts, extremely wicked, and have frizzled hair. Their bodies are nasty and loathsome, their voice shrill, and their disposition such as renders them incapable of being civilized. Some of them carry shields made of the raw hide of an ox, and short lances, in their wars; others use darts forked at the ends, together with bows four cubits long, out of which they discharge their arrows by the help of their feet. When their shafts are spent, they fall on with clubs. Their women likewise, till they arrive at a certain age, take on in the service; and many of them hang a brass ring at their lips. Some go always naked, sheltering themselves from the scorching rays of the sun with whatever falls in their way. Several cover their pubenda with sheep-tails; and others apply beasts sion two sorts of that people; the eastern, who had their abode in Asia, and were a looked upon as Indians, from whom they differed only in their hair and language, and the western or African Ethiopians. The former carried the same arms as the Indians, wore for helmets the skins of horses heads, the ears and manes whereof served them for tufts and plumes of feathers, bore before them the skins of cranes for shields, and had long hair. The Africans were armed with darts lighted at one end, covered with leather, and had black frizzled hair. Their commander was Mafanges, the son of Aorizus, a person doubtless of great distinction amongst them. Nothing remarkable of the nation we are now upon occurs from this period to the dissolution of the Persian empire, though it is probable matters, with respect to them, all along remained in the same situation; that is to say, the Ethiopian provinces contiguous to Egypt were subject to the Persians, and the others in a state of independency, either so little known, or made so inconsiderable a figure, as not to deserve the attention of any celebrated historian¹.

It does not appear, that Alexander the Great ever undertook an expedition against the Ethiopians, though, when he consulted the oracle of Jupiter Ammon, one of the first inquiries he made was after the sources of the Nile, and, having afterwards encamped at the head of the river Indus, which he imagined to be that of the Nile, was overjoyed at his success. But Ptolemy Euergetes, one of his successors in Egypt, having a passionate desire, in common with some of the greatest men of antiquity, to discover the fountains of the Nile, with this view carried his arms into Ethiopia. The particulars of this enterprize we find no-where related in history, though that he penetrated to the farthest parts of this region, and subdued most, if not all, the powerful nations seated in it, appears from an inscription (G) preserved down to us by

"skins to that use. Lastly, it is not uncommon amongst this people to wear a garment about their loins made of human hair, the sheep in this country carrying no fleeces at all. They feed, for the most part, upon the tender shoots of trees, the roots of canes, the lotus and sesamum, together with another species of fruit produced in marshy places. Many also live upon fowl, which, being excellent archers, they kill in vast numbers; but most of them use flesh, milk, and cheese, for their sustenance." As Diodorus intimates many of these to have been seated in the heart of Africa, as well as on both sides the Nile, and expressly calls them Blacks, we doubt not but he had the negroes here in view, as well as some of the proper Ethiopians; nay, as he seems to join together the heart of Africa and both sides of the Nile, and the description he gives of the Blacks on both sides the Nile agrees, in most particulars, with the present Blacks, possibly several of our readers may be induced to infer from hence, that, in the age of Diodorus, the Niger and the Nile were believed to have been branches of the same river. Be that as it will, the passage here referred to by no means discountenances such a notion; which adds some weight to what has been already advanced in the history of the Melanogastuli and Nigrisæ, as our readers will find, by consulting it (6).

(G) Elesbaan, king of the Axumites or Ethiopian, ordered Asbas, governor of Adule, to send him a copy of this inscription. This happened about the beginning of Justin's reign, just before Elesbaan undertook the expedition against the Homerisæ, which will be hereafter mentioned, and twenty-five years before our author wrote the piece here referred to. Asbas employed Cosmas, and one Menas, a merchant, who afterwards became a religious at Raithus, or, as Ptolemy calls it, Rhaptus, possibly the Rauso of Cosmas, to take him an exact copy of it, and therefore we may depend upon the relation the former has given us: "At the entrance, says he, into the

"western part of the city, facing the road to Axuma, stood a chair of white marble, consisting of a square base, a small thin column at each angle of this base, with a larger wreathed one in the middle, a seat or throne upon these, a back, and two sides. Behind this chair there was a large stone three cubits high, which had suffered considerable injury from time." This stone, and the chair, contained a Greek inscription, part of which imported, "that Ptolemy Euergetes had penetrated to the farthest parts of Ethiopia; that he subdued Gaza, Agame, Sigue, Ava, Tiamo or Tziamo, Gambela, Zingabene, Angabe, Tiama, Athagaos, Calaa, Semene, Lafine, Zaa, Gabala, Atalmo, Bega, the Tangaita, Anine, Metine, Sesæa, Rauso, Solæa, the territory of Rauso, and several other kingdoms; that amongst the nations he reduced were some inhabiting mountains always covered with a deep snow; and others seated upon ridges of hills, from whence issued boiling streams, and craggy precipices, who all therefore seemed inaccessible; that having finally, after all these conquests, assembled his whole army at Adule, and sacrificed to Mars, Neptune, and Jupiter, for his great success, he had dedicated this chair or throne to Mars." It may not be improper to remark here, that Gaza seems to correspond with Gheezæ, a name of the kingdom of Abassia, in use amongst the natives at this day; that Agame and Ava seem to be the same with Agamin and Afa, two prefectures of the present kingdom of Tigre; that Tiamo or Tzamo, and Tiama, answer to Tzama in the kingdom of Tigre, and Tzama in that of Bagemed; that Athagaos must agree with one of the two regions called Agao; and that Semene is undoubtedly the country now denominated Samen or Semen. This, to omit other proofs, that might be offered, is no contemptible argument in favour of the authority of Cosmas Indicopleustes. For a full account of every thing relating to this inscription, published first a by Cosmas Ægyptius (H), or, as some call him, Cosmas Indiopleustes, which he copied upon the spot in the time of the emperor Justin I. It is probable however, that he abandoned these conquests, since henceforth we find nothing of moment concerning any branch of the proper Ethiopians in the writings of the antients, till the days of Augustus ^m.

ABOUT the year of Rome 732. when Ælius Gallus had drawn most of the Roman forces out of Egypt, in order to invade Arabia, Candace queen of Ethiopia, or rather of the kingdom of Meroe, made an irruption into the province of Thebais with a numerous army. According to Dio, Candace herself headed her troops in this expedition; which seems to be confirmed by Strabo, when he intimates, that she was a lady of uncommon bravery and resolution. At first she met with great success, b ravaged all the country as she advanced, took Syene, Elephantine, and Philæ, the Egyptian frontiers on the side of Ethiopia, without opposition, and made three Roman cohorts, garrisoned therein, prisoners of war. But receiving intelligence, that Petronius, the governor of Egypt, was in full march to attack her, she retired into her own dominions. The Roman general pursued the Ethiopians as far as Pselcha, from whence he sent a deputation to the queen, to know the reason of the late hostilities, and to demand all the prisoners, as well as a restitution of all the effects, particularly the statues of Augustus, carried off from the cities above-mentioned. But Candace not sending a satisfactory answer, and seeking only to gain time, Petronius immediately attacked the Ethiopian army, consisting of thirty thousand men, tho' his scarce c amounted to ten thousand, in the neighbourhood of Pselcha. As the Ethiopians were, for the most part, only armed with poles, hatchets, &c. and intirely undisciplined, he gained an easy victory over them. Some fled into the town, others dispersed in the adjacent deserts, and others swam to a neighbouring island of the Nile, few crocodiles infesting that part of the river, by reason of the rapidity of the torrent. Soon after this victory, Pselcha surrendered to him; and one of his detachments brought off the corps, that had escaped to the aforesaid island, by Leo Allatius, and afterwards by Berkelius, Spon, and Montfaucon, we must refer our readers to the learned Dr. Chishul (7).

(H) Cosmas informs us, that from Alexandria to the Cataracts were thirty stations; from the Cataracts to Axuma thirty more; and from thence to the farthest part of Ethiopia producing frankincense, and contiguous to the ocean, called Barbaria, fifty stations. Near Barbaria lay the country known by the name of Safus, according to the same author, which was likewise reputed one of the remotest regions in Ethiopia.

The Barbarians, says Cosmas, imported various sorts of sauces, frankincense, cassia, and other commodities, the produce of their territory, into the country of the Homerites, separated from them by the straits of Babai Mandab. They supplied likewise the Perjians and Indians with the same commodities. The sea beyond Barbaria our author calls the Zingian ocean, and intimates, that Safus abounded with gold-mines. Every other year the king of Axuma sent several persons of distinction to Agau, to traffick with the natives for gold; and other merchants, to the number of five hundred, attended them. They brought with them cattle, salt, and iron, to barter for the gold. Upon their arrival there, they fixed themselves on a certain spot of ground, killed and cut in pieces several oxen, which they exposed, together with the salt and iron, to the view of the natives. Some of these then approaching with small ingots of gold, which they called Tancharas, laid down one or more of them, as they pleased, upon the piece of the ox, salt, or iron, they had a mind to purchase, and then retired to a place at some distance. The proprietor, seeing this, took the gold, if he thought it sufficient, and went away; and the person who had left it, came and carried off the commodity he had pitched upon. If the gold was not deemed enough, the Axumites or Ethiopian, who owned the commodity to which it was affixed, let it remain; which the other observing, either made an addition to what he had before deposited, or departed with it. This manner of trading they found necessary, as being strangers to each others language; and it was generally finished in five days. This journey the Axumites commonly performed in six months time, and were longer in going than returning, by reason of their cattle. They were obliged to travel armed, since several gangs of robbers sometimes attacked them upon the road, especially in their return, when they were loaded with gold. As the fountains of the Nile were in this district, and as the rivers they found themselves obliged to pass were greatly swelled by the violent rains that fell in the winter, they took care to be at home before that season could intercept them. By the violence of those rains, continuing three months, many small torrents became rivers, that emptied themselves into the Nile. This method of trading is still used in various parts of Africa, as appears from several modern relations, which it is needless here to produce. We must not omit observing, that the district of Agau, mentioned by Cosmas, is undoubtedly the country of the Agans taken notice of by father Pays, the name of both these provinces being the same, and the source of the Nile being placed in both of them by these authors (8).

in which were several of queen Candace's general officers. At Pfelcha he reviewed ^a his forces, and, finding them in good condition, advanced to Premnis, a fortress of great strength, which he made himself master of. Flushed with this success, the Roman general marched to Napata, where Candace held her residence, which he took, and destroyed. Her son however found means to make his escape. The queen herself had retired to one of her castles at some distance from Napata, where, receiving advice of what had happened, and finding herself not in a condition to make head against the Romans, she thought proper to make overtures for an accommodation. But Petronius, by reason of the excessive heats, and a want of provisions, soon finding himself obliged to return to Alexandria, the conferences were broke off. After the departure of Petronius, Candace besieged Premnis, where the Romans had left a ^b garrison of four hundred men; but, being soon forced to raise the siege, she dispatched ambassadors a second time to treat of a peace with the Roman general, who sent them with an escort to Augustus. That prince, whom they found at Samos, gave them a most gracious reception, and granted their mistress a peace upon her own terms. This unexpected condescension may be attributed to the rich presents those ministers carried with them. Pliny intimates, that the kingdom of Meroe had been governed by queens for several preceding generations, who all went under the name of Candace ^a.

THOUGH Augustus restored all the towns taken by Petronius, and remitted the tribute, which that general either did, or would have exacted from Candace, yet the ^c Romans now looked upon themselves as masters of Ethiopia. They complimented Augustus on the great glory he had acquired, in subduing a country unknown even to his great predecessor, which finished the reduction of Africa. Hence we find, on the reverse of one of that prince's medals struck this very year 732. three globes, denoting undoubtedly the complete conquest of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the three large continents or parts of the antient world. However, this ought to be considered as nothing more than an instance of the Roman vanity, since not only the Ethiopians, but several other nations, had hitherto preserved their liberties. No material alteration in the civil affairs of the kingdom of Meroe, which seems to have been the Ethiopia known to the Romans, happened either during the remainder of Augustus's ^d reign, or that of his successor Tiberius, queens still continuing to govern there, as we learn from Scripture. But that the christian religion was introduced into Meroe about the nineteenth or twentieth year of Tiberius's reign, has been believed by some writers of good authority. These writers make the eunuch baptized by Philip the deacon to have converted his royal mistress, after his return home, to the christian faith. St. Luke calls that princess Candace; from whence some have inferred, that she was the same queen of Ethiopia mentioned by Pliny and Strabo. But as the interval betwixt the invasion of Ethiopia by Petronius, and the conversion of the aforesaid eunuch, was a term much longer than kings usually reign, and as the former author ^e remarks Candace to have been an appellation common to the sovereigns of Meroe, we are, by no means, inclinable to come into such an opinion. Several of the fathers thought, that the eunuch's name was Candace; which must certainly be deemed a mistake: for that this word either signified sovereign authority, or at least was a title peculiar to the royal family of Meroe, the testimony already produced seems to put beyond all doubt ^o.

And from thence to the reign of Diocletian.

LITTLE after this period, for above two hundred years, occurs concerning the Ethiopians. Ælius Spartianus relates, that the emperor Heliogabalus frequently confined his most intimate friends for whole nights together with little old Ethiopian women, by way of diversion, saying, that these women were the most beautiful of ^f all others. From hence we may infer, that, in his reign, about the year of Christ 220. there was an intercourse betwixt the Roman empire and the Ethiopians. Probus, above fifty years afterwards, undertook an expedition against the Blemmyes, a nation, or rather gang of banditti, bordering upon the frontiers of Thebais, vanquished them, and sent many of them prisoners to Rome. What occasioned this expedition, is not told us by any author; but that the Blemmyan captives graced Probus's triumph, and exhibited such an odd appearance, as greatly astonished the Romans, we learn from

- a Vopiscus. Towards the close of the third century, that nation and the Nobatae, a people inhabiting the banks of the Nile near the Upper Egypt, committing great depredations upon the Roman territories, and the adjacent part of Thebais being, probably on this account, but thinly peopled, the emperor Dioclesian found his revenue in those parts scarce sufficient to maintain the garrisons placed there to repress the courses of the Ethiopians. He therefore assigned the Nobatae lands in the Roman dominions, and gave both them and the Blemmyes a considerable annual sum, to desist from their former practices; but, notwithstanding their solemn assurances to the contrary, they continued pillaging the Roman subjects to the time of Justinian, according to Procopius. That prince did not treat them with such lenity as they had met with from
- b Dioclesian. For this last emperor did not only grant them the favour above-mentioned, but likewise transplanted some of them to an island in the Nile near Elephantine, gave them the use of the (I) temples there in common with the Romans, and ordered priests to be selected from them all to officiate therein, thinking this would produce a perfect and perpetual harmony betwixt them. But Justinian ordered Narjes, the commandant of the garrison in Philæ, to demolish the temples of the barbarians, imprison their priests, and send all the images of their gods to Byzantium; which he did accordingly. That Dioclesian built the fortress of Philæ, and gave it that name, from the friendship and union, which, he imagined, the measures he had taken would occasion betwixt the Romans, Egyptians, and Ethiopians settled there, as we find
- c advanced by Procopius, can by no means be allowed, since this very fortress was in being, and called by the same name, in the days of Strabo. Procopius, in agreement with Cosmas Indicopleustes, asserts Elephantine to have been thirty days journey from Axuma, or, as he calls it, Auxomis. The same author also affirms, that, before the reign of Dioclesian, the frontiers of the Roman empire on that side extended so far into Ethiopia, that they were not above twenty-three days journey distant from this capital.

- We find nothing worthy of observation recorded of the Ethiopians, from the reign of Dioclesian, to the time of their conversion to christianity, which was but a short interval, by the Greek and Latin historians. The modern Abassines inform us, that our Saviour was born in the eighteenth year of Bazen, a prince of the Solomonean line, and
- d the twenty-fourth from Menilebec, surnamed El Hakim, i. e. the wise, or son of the wise, above-mentioned. They likewise enumerate thirteen kings, who reigned three hundred and twenty-seven years, betwixt him and Abreba and Atzbeba, or Abra and Asba, who sat upon the throne when Frumentius carried the light of the gospel into Abassia. Frumentius, according to some, found his work facilitated by the labours of St. Matthew, who had applied himself to the conversion of the Nubians, a nation before disposed for the reception of christianity by the eunuch of Candace, who had already sown in their minds the first seeds of that religion. These St. Matthew, continue the same authors, took care to cultivate, and raise to fruit, tho' he could not reach Abassia. The planting of the christian faith in that country was reserved for the age
- e of St. Athanasius patriarch of Alexandria; of which great event Rufinus and others have given us the following relation:

- Meropius* the philosopher, a native of Tyre, took a resolution to travel, either that he might enjoy the conversation of other philosophers, or for the sake of traffick, which was not thought inconsistent with the profession of philosophy. This man, after having wandered over all India, determined at length to return home, with two young men nearly related to him, the companions of his travels, and, touching at an island in the Red sea, was either cut to pieces by the natives, or died a natural death. Frumentius and Aedesius, or, as the Abassines will have it, Fremonatus and Sidracus, (for so were his kinsmen called) falling into the hands of the barbarians,
- f were brought before the king, who gave them a kind reception, placed them near his person, and advanced them. Their talents and industry procured them such distinguishing marks of this prince's favour. Finding in Frumentius a greater capa-

(1) Procopius says, that the barbarians worshipped the Sun, Iris, Osiris, Priapus, and other pagan deities. It likewise appears from him, that they offered human sacrifices to their idols. Their religion was probably the same, or nearly so, with that of the Romans; which, had the Nobatae and Blemmyes been people of any principles, might have greatly contributed to the keeping up a good correspondence between them (9).

city, he made him his treasurer, and Ædesus his butler; in which posts they behaved a themselves with so much applause, that, upon the king's death, which followed some time after, the queen, who had been appointed guardian to her son, would not grant either of them permission to leave the kingdom, as they desired. On the contrary, she left the management of public affairs intirely to Fruementius, who made use of this new authority to bring the people under his inspection to the knowledge of JESUS CHRIST. Contracting an acquaintance with some christian merchants, either trading to or settled in Abassia, who sometimes came to that island, he granted them great privileges, and places to assemble in for public worship. This first excited in the Abassines a desire to be instructed in the principles of christianity; which induced Fruementius, after having got the queen's leave, to take a journey to Alexandria, in order to inform St. Athanasius of the disposition of that people. The patriarch hereupon consecrated him bishop of Axuma, and about the year of our Lord 335. sent him to propagate the christian religion in Ethiopia. Soon after his arrival there, he baptized vast numbers of the Abassines, ordained deacons and presbyters, built churches, and in short gained an assent to the divine truths of the gospel in almost every part of that vast region. The Ethiopic book at Axuma, held in the highest veneration by the Abassines, agreeing in the main with this relation, as well as several Greek and Latin authors of good repute, it must deserve the greatest regard. That Adad or Aidog, therefore, king of the Axumites, first introduced christianity into Ethiopia about the fifteenth year of the emperor Justinian, after an unparalleled defeat given the king of the Homerites, in consequence of a vow made before the engagement, as some have not scrupled to assert, cannot be allowed. However, either the nation in general, or at least the court and noblesse, afterwards relapsed into paganism, according to an oriental author of some note; and embraced again the christian religion, at the command of Aidog, about the fourth year of the emperor Justin, an. Cb. 521. for the reason just assigned. A full and minute account of this memorable transaction may be drawn from the extracts of several Syriac writers, to be met with in the learned M. Assemanus's bibliotheca Orientalis Clementino-Vaticana.

Abra and Asba refuse to admit Arianism.

Abra and Asba, who jointly swayed the sceptre, are greatly celebrated by the Ethiopian historians. The harmony that reigned betwixt them was so singular and uncommon, d that it almost became a proverb in Ethiopia. Constantius the emperor made use of many expedients to introduce Arianism into the country we are now upon, but without effect. He sent ambassadors to those kings, in order to prevail upon them to put Fruementius the bishop of Axuma into the hands of George the Arian bishop of Alexandria, substituted in the place of Athanasius, who was forced to quit that see, and retire to a place of obscurity. But they refused to deliver up that prelate, and adhered to his doctrines as well as person with an unshaken resolution, notwithstanding Philostorgius falsely affirms an Arian bishop to have been settled at Axuma. So mild and amiable was his conduct amongst them, that they called him Abba Salamab, the pacific father. The Copts and Abassines have a notion, that one Tacalbaïmanout, e a saint or Abassine monk, descended from Sadok the high priest in the days of David and Solomon, attended Abba Salamab into Ethiopia, to demonstrate to the people there the necessity of baptism, they having till that time practised (K) circumcision.

(K) Authors are divided in their sentiments in relation to the origin of circumcision amongst the Abassines. Some maintain, that this institution was introduced amongst them by Moses; others, that they received it from Mennebeck the son of Solomon. Which of these opinions is true, or whether either of them be so, we shall not pretend to determine. That it was not in use amongst the Arabian Cushites before the time of Moses, appears from Scripture. One strong presumption against Herodorus's notion, that the Egyptians first practised circumcision, is, that this author has not told us how, or when, that nation came first to admit so painful a rite; whereas the Scripture is express in both those particulars, with regard to the origin of it amongst the Hebrews. Grotius has evinced, from a multitude of different authors, that God, in commanding Abraham to use the rite of circumcision, meant it a mark of covenant between his posterity and the Creator; and that every other nation, practising it, learned it either from him or his descendants. The firm persuasion of the Abassines is, that they derived it from the Hebrews. We may perhaps say something of the circumcision of women, when we come to the modern history of Abassia (10).

- a The twenty-fourth day of the month Mesri, corresponding with that of August in the Julian calendar, is celebrated as the festival of this saint by the Copts. The word Tacalbaïmanout is Ethiopic, and, according to M. D'Herbelot, signifies the paradise of the Trinity. But Ludolphus gives us to understand, that this Tacalbaïmanout, or, as he calls him, Tesla Haimanout, that is, according to his interpretation of those words, the plant of faith, restored the monastic way of life in Ethiopia about the year of Christ 600. and lived till A. D. 630. The Abassines believe, that he spoke in his cradle, and wrought several miracles in his infancy; as also, that he was ordained deacon in the fifteenth year of his age by Cyril metropolitan of Ethiopia, contemporary with Benjamin patriarch of Alexandria, of the Jacobite sect. Gonzales relates, that
- b he first converted the Ethiopians to christianity, by destroying a serpent before worshipped amongst them; which, if admitted, will bring him to the age M. D'Herbelot assigns him. Be that as it will, next to Gabra-Menses-Keddus (L), i. e. the servant of the Holy Ghost, in honour of whom they kept holy-day one every month, he was the most celebrated saint in Ethiopia. D'Herbelot farther informs us, that Claudius king of the Abassines sent the life of this saint written in Ethiopic to Gabriel the ninety-fifth patriarch of Alexandria, which is at this day to be seen in the royal library at Paris, num. 796. under the title of Sairat Al Ab Al Tbaqubani Tacalbaïmanout.

- HISTORY scarce supplies us with any memoirs relating to Ethiopia from the reign of Constantius to the time of the famous Elesbas or Elesbaan king of Ethiopia, called Caleb by the Abassines, who seems to have been the same prince with Adad or Aidog above, mentioned. This conqueror, having made up matters with Xenodon or Axenodon, an Indian prince, with whom, according to Simeon Beth-Arsamenis, he had been at variance, put a period to the kingdom of the Homerites or Sabaans in Arabia Felix, after having vanquished in battle the impious Dunawas, Dunaan, or Dhu Nowas, the last king of that people, who was of the Jewish religion. Elesbaan had some time before declared war against the king of the Homerites, for massacring certain christian merchants, and vowed most solemnly to become a christian, in case he proved victorious over him. Having, therefore, overthrown him, and stripped him of his dominions, he embraced the faith of Christ, in pursuance of the vow already made, and
- d placed a christian prince upon the throne of the Homerites; after whose death, which happened in winter, when the Ethiopians could not transport (M) a body of forces into Arabia, Dunaan found means to seize upon the crown. He began his reign with a violent persecution of the christians, upon whom he exercised unheard-of cruelties, a detail of which has been given us by various authors. St. Arctas, in particular, and many others, he caused to be burnt in the city of Nagra. This induced the Alexandrian patriarch to invite, by letters, Elesbaan to carry his arms into Arabia, in defence of the christians, who had been put to death in great numbers with the most exquisite tortures (N). Elesbaan embraced the occasion, and was favoured by

(L) Gabra-Menses-Keddus lived only upon herbs, and used for cloathing nothing but the leaves of trees, having all worldly pleasures and delights in the utmost contempt. He subdued lions and dragons, according to the Abassines, who still preserve many fabulous traditions concerning him. One of these is, that he had a conference with the ever-blessed Trinity, and our Saviour, at which he gave several answers too blasphemous to be mentioned (11).

(M) One of the most noted ports of the Ethiopians on the Red Sea was Adulis or Adulis, twenty stadia from the city of that name, and twelve days journey from Auxomis or Axuma the capital of Ethiopia. The Greek writers of the later ages denominated the Ethiopians in general Axumites from the name of this city, as we learn from Nonnosus, Procopius, and others. Adulis was the great mart for the commodities of Egypt, Arabia, &c. to which the merchants of those countries constantly resorted. Besides the wares already mentioned, those merchants exported from thence vast numbers of Ethiopian slaves, who, by this means, were dispersed over a great part of the world (12).

(N) It appears from Simeon Metaphrastes, Theophanes, Simeon Beth-Arsamenis, Alphonse Mendefius, and others, that this Caleb or Elesbaan was a prince of great sanctity, and as such the church of Rome has honoured him with canonization. M. Ludolphus informs us, that father Tellax observed a surprising agreement betwixt the Ethiopic and Latin writers, with regard to the life and actions of Elesbaan. To which we may add, that M. Assemanus has likewise exhibited to our view the harmony betwixt Metaphrastes and Beth-Arsamenis, in relation to the conduct and great achievements of the same prince.

But

God with an intire victory (N), which gave the Abassines (O) the possession of Aria-bia Felix till the time of Abd al Motalleb grandfather of Mohammed. Abrabab Ebn al Sabab al Afham was the governor of Yaman, under the king of Abassia, whose punishment we find mentioned in the tenth chapter of the Koran. He brought, says the author of that book, an army with a great number of elephants to the siege of Mecca; upon which came a cloud of birds, with the rage of thunder, upon him. Each of these birds had a stone in its beak, which it dropped with such violence upon the elephants, that they were pierced through; nor did the vengeance end here, but, according to some, pursued the viceroy into his master's dominions, where one of these fowls let its stone fall upon his head, and killed him.

That Atzham king of Ethiopia embraced Mohammedanism, not probable.

THE Mohammedan writers generally agree, that Atzham, or Afhamab Ebn Abbar, the Najásbi, or king of Ethiopia, during Mohammed's mission, did not only take under his protection a considerable number of Mohammed's friends, who were driven out of Hejaz by the Koreish, but likewise became a convert to the new religion of that impostor. This conversion, according to Mohammed Ebn Abdo'l Bâki, happened in the second year of the Hejra; though it is placed ten years higher by Abulfeda and Al Fannabius. Some learned men have, without any difficulty, admitted the truth of this relation, particularly Selden and Colomesius. But the absurdities with which Abdo'l Bakides's narration, which by a very able Oriental critic seems to have been judged more accurate and better than any other, is stuffed, and the absolute silence of the Ethiopians, as well as those authors who have written the histories of the patriarchs of Alexandria and the Saracens, on this head, will not permit us to come into such an opinion. That Atzham, all his bishops, presbyters, monks, &c. should allow, that our Saviour foretold another great prophet to come after him, and that Mohammed was this prophet; that the Abassine bishops and presbyters, by citing it to the Najásbi in favour of Mohammed, should admit for genuine a passage of the New Testament not to be found there; and, to omit other points carrying with them the like air of probability, that, upon the sight of the twenty-ninth and thirtieth chapters of the Koran, they should all burst out into a flood of tears, and be in the forest affliction; in short, that they should be converted to Moslemism by the Gospel itself; these, we say, are such glaring absurdities, as can be swallowed by none but a most bigotted Mohammedan. And such a train of remarkable effects must have followed a king of Ethiopia's embracing Moslemism, that the above mentioned historians could not have omitted taking notice of it; nay, the Mohammedan writers themselves would undoubtedly have recorded many transactions, the necessary consequences of such an event, which we find they have not so much as touched upon, had their prophet converted the king of Ethiopia, even before the Arabs themselves. It is to us, therefore, matter of great surprize, that the very learned M. Ludolphus should run himself into difficulties and errors, in order to evade the authority of Abdo'l-Bakides and Abulfeda with regard to the introduction of Moslemism into Ethiopia. The spirit with which the Koran was written, that is, a lying spirit; the ge-

But we shall be more particular and explicit on this head, in the history of the antient Arabs, whose country was the theatre of those achievements (12).

(N) This happened in the reign of the emperor Justin, probably about the seventh or eighth year of it, A. C. 524. or 525. and not, as Theophanes and Cedrenus seem to intimate, 521. or 523 (13).

(O) Procopius attributes this famous exploit to Hellestius, Elesbaan's son, whom he calls king of the Axumites, and is followed herein by cardinal

Baronius. But as this notion has been overthrown by Ludolphus, as so noble an action seems more agreeable to the high encomia passed upon Elesbaan, than the reign of his son, of whom the Abassine historians say but little, and as Metaphrastes and Beth-Arfamenis positively affirm Elesbaan (that prince who embraced christianity after the victory obtained over a former king of the Homerites) to have taken vengeance on Dunaan, we cannot but declare our- of another opinion (14).

a nius of the Mohammedan writers, not only with the worst kind of enthusiasm and superstition, but likewise addicted to romance and fiction in points attracted from religion; these, we say, in conjunction with what has been just offered, amount to little less than a demonstration, that this story was invented by the Moslems, purely with a design to do honour to Mohammed and the Koran. For which reasons we shall make no scruple to reject it intirely, with father Marracci.

Gebra-Meskel, successor to Elefbaan, according to the Ethiopian poet so often cited by Ludolphus, was a prince who greatly extended the limits of his dominions; though we have no particulars of his conquests. His subjects, however, enjoyed the sweets of peace a good part of his reign, which proceeded chiefly from the terror of his arms, all the neighbouring nations being kept in awe by him. Procopius gives us to understand, that the emperor Justinian entered into an alliance with him; but what hereupon ensued, we no-where find. The same author also relates, that even in Gebra-Meskel's time the Axumites or Ethiopians were so little acquainted with the art of navigation, that they crossed the streights of Bal al Mandab in rude vessels, consisting of nothing but planks or boards fastened together with ropes. This seems to have been chiefly owing to their want of proper materials for shipping, their maritime provinces affording them scarce any thing of this kind, and the Romans being obliged, by a particular law, not to transport any naval stores into Ethiopia. Next to this pious king, for as such he is described by the Abassines, one Constantine ascended the throne, and after him one Fresenna, whose name imports good fruit. During the (P) interval between Fresenna and Delnoad, who reigned about the year of the christian æra 960. the Ethiopian history is so barren, as not to supply us with one article meriting any great regard. About this time the usurpation of the Zagæan family commenced, the cause of which will hereafter be fully explained.

Their history to the usurpation of the Zagæan family extremely short.

(P) We are told, that about A. D. 836. Ethiopia groaned under the complicated miseries of war, pestilence, and famine; that their armies were routed and put to flight, whenever they came in sight of the enemy. The Abassines, continues this author, attributed these evils to the violence and indignities offered John the metropolitan sent them by James the fiftieth patriarch of Alexandria. A knot of the nobility had before caballed against this prelate, and, after bringing others over to their party, driven him out of the country. Under the influence, therefore, of the above-mentioned persuasion, he was recalled and re-established. But the queen, who at that time held the reins of government, raised new persecutions against the Abunna, and left him only the choice of being circumcised, or leaving the kingdom. John chose to undergo circumcision, and, being stripped in order to the operation, had upon him, by a singular miracle, say the Copts and Abassines, evident tokens that he had been circumcised on the eighth day. We must here observe, that as the church of Abassia acknowledges that of Alexandria as its mother, it is subject to it in a particular manner, not having the liberty of electing its own bishop. This subjection is as antient as the conversion of the Abassines to christianity, and confirmed by that book of canons which they held in equal esteem with the sacred writings. The particular canon here hinted at will be inserted when we come to the modern history of Abassia (15).

The history of the Arabs, and their antient state, to Mohammed.

Description of Arabia.

Many authors have taken great pains to give an accurate geographical description of Arabia.

Whence Arabia so called.

THE independency most of the Arabs maintained to the downfall of the Roman empire, and the surprising conquests they made under Mohammed and his successors, rendered their country so famous, that 'tis no wonder many authors should have taken such pains to give an accurate description of it. Ptolemy seems to have laboured this point more than any other: Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Pliny, with many more of the antients, in their accounts of Arabia, are likewise pretty prolix. But the Arab writers themselves have been indefatigable on this head. They are very particular and minute, both in their historical and geographical relations; which would have met with a more general esteem, had not the Arab genius, so strongly tinctured with enthusiasm and superstition, and consequently inclined to fable and romance, so eminently displayed itself through almost every part of those compositions.^a

Arabia, or at least the most considerable part of it, was, from remote antiquity, called by the natives Arabab; which name it still retains. However, we find it frequently styled by their historians Gjazirab or Jezirat al Arab, the peninsula of the Arabs, Belad al Arab, the region of the Arabs, Diyar al Arab, the provinces of the Arabs; and, by many of the *Oriental*s, Arabistân. Amongst some of the Syriac writers it seems to have gone under the appellation of Cushatha, and sometimes in Scripture that of Cush, as we have already observed in the history of the Ethiopians. 'Al-Motarezzi, in the book Mogreb, derives the name Arabab from Arbab, a district of Tehûma, where Ishmael dwelt, or, according to Safoddin, a town in the neighbourhood of Mecca; and 'Ebn Saïd 'Al-Magrebî, in 'Abu'l-Fedab, from Ya'rab, the son of Kabtân or Joktan, and grandson of Eber. But those bid the fairest for truth, who deduce it from a Hebrew original; the word arab or ereb having several significations very favourable to such a conjecture. For it imports, the west, a mixture, and merchandize, or traffick. Now, that the western part of Arabia was at first called ארץ ארב eretz arab or (A) ereb, the western country, may be deemed highly probable from hence, that its eastern provinces are denominated in Scripture ארץ קדם eretz kedem, the land of the east. Which if we admit, from ארב arab naturally and easily flows Arabab. This notion seems the less liable to exception, as Moses himself styles the western Arabia Arabab; which goes a good way towards evincing, that, from its situation, it first received that name. Afterwards the Ishmaelites, who were possessed of it, gradually reducing the other parts, carried the word Arabab along with them, and applied it to the whole peninsula. Some, however, think, that this tract might have assumed the name we are now considering, from that mixture of different tribes, which, they pretend, formed the Arab nation. In support of this opinion it is alledged, that in Scripture the Arabs are termed a mingled people, and that the antients enumerate many nations inhabiting Arabia. But, as the passage of Scripture here hinted at does not appear necessarily to denote the Arabs, as the various names given by the antients to the different clans of this region do not

(A) From hence, by the insertion of an epenthetic N, comes the word Erembi, the name of a nation mentioned by Homer and Strabo. Homer's Scholiast and Bochart intimate, that the Erembi werethe same people with the Troglodytes; though they likewise allow, that they might have been a branch of the Arabians. For a more ample discussion of this point, we must refer our readers to Bochart (1).

- a absolutely imply, that all those clans had a different original, and as the best Arabian historians assert all their countrymen to be sprung from two stocks only, perhaps our readers will allow a greater degree of probability to the former etymon. Lastly, others deduce the name Arabab from the third signification of عرب above-mentioned, because the Arabs in very early ages took their principal delight in merchandize or traffick; the gold, frankincense, myrrh, jewels, spices, and many other valuable commodities, either the natural produce of their country, or brought thither from India, prompting them thereto. Now, though it cannot be denied, that this carries a good appearance of truth, and that the facts on which it is founded are clear and incontestable; yet, as the most antient names of places seem chiefly to have been
- b taken, either from those of the first planters of colonies, builders of cities, &c. or some circumstance in the situation, we are inclined to adhere to the etymon suggested by the first signification of عرب arab. The sacred historian calls the territory, where the descendants of Joktan settled, Kedem, the east; which renders it probable, that in his time the name Arabab was not known there. This is sufficient to invalidate what has been advanced in the point before us by 'Ebn Saïd 'Al-Magrebi', which depends only upon an Arabian tradition, that can by no means stand in competition with Scripture. Neither ought we to be censured for deducing the most noted name of Arabia from the Hebrew tongue: for, that Moses uses this very name, has been already observed; and that in early ages the Hebrew and Arabic languages were the
- c same, seems to be acknowledged by the Arabs, when they make themselves the descendants of Eber and Abraham, the two great ancestors of the Hebrews^b.

Arabia, taken in its largest extent, lies between the twelfth and thirty-fifth de- The largest ex-

- grees of north latitude, and the fifty-third and seventy-eighth of longitude. The greatest length, or a line drawn from a point on the coast of the Red Sea about 1° 25' S. of the tropic of Cancer to the extremity of cape Ras al Ghat, is above eleven hundred miles; and its greatest breadth, that is to say, the distance from the northern extremity of the deserts of 'Al-Jazira' to the streights of Bab al Mandab, between thirteen and fourteen hundred. It is bounded on the west by Palestine, part of Syria, the isthmus of Suez, and the Red Sea, called by the Arabs the Sea 'Al-Kolzom; on
- d the east by the Euphrates, the Persian gulph, and bay of Ormuz; on the north by part of Syria, Diyar-Becr, Irâk, and Khûzestân; and on the south by the streights of Bab al Mandab, and the Indian ocean. It grows narrower as we approach the frontiers of Syria and Diyar-Becr; and, by reason of the proximity of the Euphrates to the Mediterranean, may be looked upon as a peninsula, and that one of the largest in the world^c.

- But the limits of the proper Arabia are much narrower, as reaching no farther Its proper limits. northward than the isthmus, which runs from Ailab to the head of the Persian gulph, and the borders of the territory of Cûsa; which tract of land the Greeks nearly comprehended under the name of Arabia the happy. Here the Arabs have been settled
- e almost ever since the flood. The eastern geographers make Arabia Petraea to belong partly to Egypt, and partly to Shâm or Syria; and Arabia Deserta they call the deserts of Syria. But as the Arabs have for many ages reduced these two provinces or kingdoms, either by settlements or continual incursions, the Turks and Persians at this day include them in Arabistân. The antients in like manner assigned different limits to this vast peninsula. Pliny extended it as far as the borders of Commagene, the north part of Syria, on account of the many Arabian colonies planted there by Tigranes; and Xenophon included in it the greatest part of Mesopotamia. But Ptolemy, who gives us a more accurate description of Arabia, determines its dimensions differently from those authors. According to him, the city of Phara, between the Ela-
- f nitic and Heroopolisan gulphs, or rather a line drawn a little to the westward of this city near the district of Heroopolis, was its boundary on the side of Egypt. On the west it was terminated by Palestine, part of Syria, the confines of Egypt, and the Arabian gulph; on the north by the Euphrates, from the city of Tbapfacus, near the borders of Palmyrene, to the district of Idicara in Babylonia; on the east by the Cbal-dæan mountains, and the Persian gulph; and on the south by the Erythraean sea. The same situation and extent, or nearly so, are assigned it by Diodorus and Strabo. Conformably to the sentiment of the Arabs, this region may be deemed a peninsula, whether we consider it as answering to the name of Arabia in its most usual sense, or as it is variously described by the antients, or, lastly, as comprehending all that large tract bounded almost intirely by the Euphrates, the Persian gulph, the (B) Sindian, Indian, Red seas, and part of the Mediterranean^a.

THE first division of the peninsula of the Arabs was into Kedem and Arabab, as we learn from Scripture. Kedem, or the land of Kedem, comprehended the Arabia Felix and Arabia Deserta of Ptolemy, whose limits and extent we shall soon define from that geographer. Arabab answered to that country called, from Petra its metropolis, Arabia Petraea by Ptolemy; Arabia Citerior, from its situation in respect of Italy, by Pliny; and Arabia Velus by Stephanus and Procopius, according to Ortelius. Moses seems to have determined the bounds of this kingdom with a precision worthy an accurate geographer, when he tells us, that on the south it reached to the sea of Suph, or the Red Sea; on the west to Paran and Tophel; on the north to Laban, Hatseroth, and Di-Zabab, that is, to the borders of Syria; and on the east to Kadesb-Barnea, eleven days journey from mount Horeb. As Arabab imports the west, so Kedem does the east; and these significations agree with the situations of those regions. The Arabic version makes Kedem to extend as far as Rekem or Petra, which runs counter to some other authors. In one passage Moses apparently comprehends Cbaldaea under the name of Kedem; but this will not overturn what is here advanced. The first inhabitants of Arabab, or the western Arabia, were the Cassibim, descended from Misraim, the Caphthorim, and the Horites, who occupied mount Seir, before they were expelled from thence by Esau and his posterity. Afterwards Ishmael and his descendants settled here; and last of all the Edomites, or Idumæans. As for Kedem, or the eastern Arabia, it was first peopled by the sons of Joktan, who are reputed the genuine Arabians though in process of time the Ishmaelites spread themselves over this country. That some of the Cushites also possessed themselves of part of it in early times, has been already observed. The children of Abraham by his concubine Keturab likewise contributed towards replenishing it with inhabitants, as appears from the sacred historian^e.

Ptolemy the first who divided it into three parts.

Ptolemy seems to be the first who divided the peninsula we are now upon into three parts. These he termed Arabia Petraea, Arabia Deserta, and Arabia Felix; and since his time that division has generally prevailed. In order, therefore, to give our readers a succinct idea of every one of these provinces, we shall pursue the method he has observed, and describe them upon the plan he has laid down^f.

Arabia Petraea.

Arabia Petraea on the east was contiguous to Syria and Arabia Deserta; on the west to Egypt, or rather that neck of land separating Africa from Asia, called at this day the isthmus of Suez, and the (C) Heroopolitan gulph; on the north to Palestine, the lake

(B) Sind or Sindia is that large tract comprehending all those countries between India, Carmania, and Sigistan. On the south it is washed by the sea, which from thence is called the Sindian sea, contiguous to the bay of Ormuz and the Indian ocean. Its metropolis is known by the name of Mansoura, according to the eastern writers. The sindon of the antients was so denominated from Sindia, where it was produced in vast quantities. The Arabs believe the people of this region to be the posterity of Cham (2).

(C) The Heroopolitan gulph received its name from the city of Heroopolis bordering upon it. This gulph, the western arm of the sea Al-Kolzum, is the Yam Suph, or Yam Souph, The weedy sea, of the Scripture. The ingenious Dr. Shaw supposes it to have been so called from the variety of algæ and fuci, that grow within its channel, and, at low water particularly, are left in great quantities upon the sea-shore. If this be admitted, the word סוף souph has not been rendered so properly flags by our translators, Exod. c. ii. ver. 8. Isa. c. xix. ver. 6. nor jun-

- a lake Asphaltitis and Cale-Syria; and on the south to Arabia Felix. This tract was for the most part uncultivated, the greatest part of it being covered with dry sands, or rising into rocks, interspersed here-and-there with some fruitful spots. Petra, its metropolis, seems to have been denominated by the Hebrews Selab, both which words were of the same import in the Greek and Hebrew languages. St. Jerom intimates, that among the Syrians it went by the name of Rekem, and was the same town that we find in Scripture styled Joktheel. Josephus calls it Arke and Arakeme; which Bochart takes to be equivalent to Rekem, as being only that word with an article prefixed. Petra was the chief fortress of the Idumeans, Edomites, or Nabathæans, as already observed, and derived its name from its rocky situation. It was accessible only by one narrow path, wherein but few could go at once; which, with the steepness of the ascent, rendered it almost impregnable. (D) Authors, however, differ with regard to its situation. It was seated in a plain full of gardens, and watered with fountains, but surrounded with rocks, according to Strabo. Pliny speaks of it almost in the same terms. He says, the Nabathæans inhabited the city of Petra, situated in a plain of about two thousand paces over, watered by a river, and encompassed by inaccessible mountains. But that it stood upon a steep rock, in a very dry and barren country, is intimated by Dio; with whom Herodian and the Nubian geographer in some sort agree. For the former describes the capital of the Agareni as standing upon the point of a very high mountain; and the latter represents the city of Petra as consisting of houses dug or cut out of a rock. As great a diversity of opinions, in this particular, prevails amongst the moderns. Some think, that the city of Karak, or Krak, lying on the confines of Arabia and Syria, inclining towards the north, is the antient Petra. According to them, this fortress, for that the word signifies in the Syriac and Chaldee tongues, answers to the Characha in the Maccabees, the Karkaa in the book of Joshua, the Charac Moab or Charac Moba of

tus or juncosum by Buxtorf. The same worthy gentleman relates, that whilst the surface of the sea is calm, such a diversity of madrepores, fuci, and other marine vegetables, presented itself to the eye, that it is natural to take those plants for a forest under water, agreeably to what we find observed by Pliny. It may not be improper farther to remark, that the Yam Souph was likewise denominated Yam Edom, or the sea of Edom, by the antient inhabitants of the countries adjoining to it. For the sons of Edom, having possessed themselves of those parts, from their father Edom, called the gulph we are now upon the sea of Edom. But the Greeks, who took this name from the Phœnicians, rendered Yam Edom improperly ἐρυθρὴ θάλασσα, The Red Sea, mistaking the word Edom for an appellative. However, they seem to have been well apprised, that this name was not derived from any redness peculiar to the territory bordering upon the sea of Edom; since many of the Greek and Latin authors expressly assert, that this sea was so denominated from one king Erythrus, who could be no other than Esaú or Edom. Though there are several thickets of the arundinaceous plants, at some small distances from the immediate banks of the Yam Souph, yet none are observed either upon them, or growing out of the sea; which is an additional argument in favour of Dr. Shaw's notion. The castle and garrison of Adjeronte are supposed to occupy at present the spot of ground on which the antient Heræopolis stood (3).

(D) It will be found difficult enough to determine the situation of Petra. Strabo places it three or four days journey from Jericho, and five days journey from the forest of Palm-trees, which was upon the Red Sea. Pliny makes it to be six hundred miles distant from Gaza, and an hundred twenty-five miles from the Persian gulph. But Reland and Cellarius think, that the numbers have been changed, and that the true reading in the last author is an hundred twenty-five miles from Gaza, and six hundred miles from the Persian gulph. Eusebius places Theman five miles from Petra, Carcaria a day's journey from the same city, and Elath or Ailah ten miles to the east of it. Some geographers believe, that there were more than one Petra. St. Athanasius distinguishes two, one in Palestine, and the other in Arabia. The paraphrasts Jonathan and Onkelos also represent Rekem and Petra as two different cities. Josephus mentions Petra and Rekem in the country of the Amalekites, near which Aaron died, and Petra in the land of the Midianites, though he seems to confound those two places. Petra, the capital of Arabia Petraea, is appropriated to Palestine by the author of the antient Notitia ecclesiastica, being the metropolis of what was called the Third Palestine. Eusebius and St. Jerom also extend Palestine as far as the Red Sea, to Elath; so that with them it comprehended Idumæa, and Arabia Petraea. But those countries were looked upon as distinct from Palestine in all the ages preceding Eusebius. Lastly, father Calmet supposes the Petra called Selah by Isaiab, and the author of the book of kings, to have been seated in the land of Moab, or the eastern part of Idumæa, and afterwards named Joktheel; whereas the other, called Rekem, was, according to him, situated in the south Idumæa, or Arabia Petraea, or the country of the Amalekites. The same author, together with M. Tillemont, also believes, that the Petra, ineffectually attacked by Trajan, which Dio had in view, appertained to Mesopotamia, and consequently was different from the city we are now upon (4).

Ptolemy, and the Cbarakmoha of Stephanus. Others make this city to be the same ^a with Hagr or Hijr the capital of a district in the kingdom of Hejaz. And, lastly, others believe Errakim, or Arrakeb, a town in a northerly direction from Hagr near Krak or Caracha, to correspond with the Petra of the antients. None of these notions seems remote from truth; though, by the assistance of 'Al-Makrisi, Bobadin, and the Nubian geographer, such reasons have been assigned for the last, as, we think, cannot easily be answered ^s.

Towns in Arabia Petrea.

It cannot be supposed, that such a barren region should abound with large and populous cities; and therefore most of those places, whose names have been transmitted down to us by Ptolemy, must be considered as insignificant and obscure. The principal towns appertaining to Arabia Petrea, taken notice of by Scripture, besides those already mentioned, were Paran, Duma, Diblatbaim, Dibo, Nebo, Bethmeon, Kariotb or Kiriotb, Nemrim, and Pithom. Paran, the Phara of Ptolemy, that gave name to a famous desert adjoining to it, was three days journey to the east of Elatb. Duma stood upon mount Seir, and, from what the prophet Isaiab intimates, was probably a place of some consideration. Diblatbaim, Dibo, Nebo, Bethmeon, Kiriotb, and Nemrim, from several passages in the Old Testament, appear also to have been places of some note, though their situation cannot from thence be ascertained. Heroopolis, on the western extremity of the Arabian gulf, is by some supposed to be Pithom, built by the Israelites for Pharoab, during their servitude in Egypt, and the Patumos or Patumon of Herodotus. Be that as it will, it is certain the Septuagint and Coptic versions countenance such a supposition, the one rendering Goshen Heroopolis, and the other Pethom. The generality of the antient geographers have ranked this city amongst those belonging to Egypt; but Herodotus was of another opinion. Haura, Zabag or Zatba, and Zize, three modern places of this country, correspond tolerably well with the Auara, Zanaatba, and Ziza of Ptolemy; but as for Lyssa, Gypsaria, Gerasa, and most, if not all, the other villages and towns enumerated by that geographer, scarce any footsteps or traces of them are now to be seen ^b.

Nations of Arabia Petrea.

THE most considerable nations inhabiting this tract, in the earlier ages, were the Ishmaelites, the Nabatai or Nabathæans, the Cedrei or Kedareni, and the Agareni or Hagareni (E). Of these the Ishmaelites were the most potent, if they did not comprehend all the rest. The Nabathæans and Kedareni apparently deduced their names from Nebaiotb and Kedar, the sons of Ishmael, and consequently ought to be looked upon either as branches of the Ishmaelites, or in all respects as the same nation with them. It is probable the descendants of Midian, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, seated themselves in the neighbourhood of the Ishmaelites; since we find the same people called in Scripture Ishmaelites and Midianites. Amongst the antient Greeks and Romans, the inhabitants of Arabia Petrea and Arabia Deserta, at least the bulk of them, for many ages, went by the names of Arabes, and Nabatai, Nauatai, or Nabatae. They extended themselves, according to St. Jerom, from the Red sea to the Euphrates; and all the tract they inhabited was, from them, denominated Nabatena; nay, so numerous were the Nabathæans, that we find them mixed with the Reubenites, Gadites, and people of Moab. The Cedrei or Kedareni and Chancei, seem to have been two tribes of them, the former of which Cellarius places near the nor- ^d

(E) To these we may add the inhabitants of the wilderness of Mabon, called in Scripture Mekunim, who bordered upon Goraz and Pharsa, and consequently were seated in the neighbourhood of Egypt.

- a thern confines of Arabia Felix. The Midianites made a settlement behind the Elanitic gulf, and incorporated themselves with the Cushites. If the Hagareni did not correspond intirely with the Ishmaelites, they must have been nearly related to them. Kunshi insinuates, that they were originally the children of Hagar by an Arab, after she had left Abraham; but others rather apprehend they assumed their name from the stony region they inhabited. Cellarius thinks, that at first they must have been but an obscure people, though neither Trajan nor Severus could reduce their metropolis, according to Dio. Their territory bordered upon the land of Moab, as may be inferred from Scripture. In after-ages, the names of all the nations here touched upon, were absorbed in that of Saraceni, which continued famous for several centuries over the eastern and western parts of the world. It is observable, that the Jerusalem Targum styles the Ishmaelites Saraceni. That the Arraceni of Pliny were the Saraceni of Ptolemy and Dioscorides, may be evinced by several arguments:
1. The same proper name has frequently an S and a vowel for its initial letters in different authors; as Ἀραμειῶτες and Σαλμειῶτες, Ἀραμειῶτες and Σαλμειῶτες, Ἑξίταρια and Σίξίταρια, Τασιράτης and Σιασιράτης, Ἀρδιαῖοι and Σαρδιαῖοι, Elana and Selana, Samnita and Amnita, &c.
 2. Ptolemy assigns the same situation to the Saraceni, that Pliny does to the Arraceni.
 3. They had both the same origin, and deduced their names from that of the same city. This will more evidently appear from the account we shall give of the Saraceni in the following section.

- c BEFORE we leave Arabia Petraea, our readers will expect us to touch upon the following remarkable places: 1. The town of Colzum or Kolzum, giving name to the sea adjoining to it, the Chysma, as may be supposed, of Ptolemy, which stood on the western extremity of the Red sea, near the spot where the present city of Suez was erected, and not far from the ancient Heroopolis. Betwixt this place and Elatb or Ailab was Eziongeber, a celebrated port in the reigns of Solomon and Jehosaphat, called afterwards Berenice. 2. The promontory of Phara or Paran, betwixt the Heroopolitan and Elanitic gulfs, on which stood the town of the same name. 3. The wilderness of Sur, extending from Palestine to the Arabian gulf, so celebrated in sacred writ. 4. The desert of Sin, which the Israelites entered into after they had left that of Sur. 5. The wilderness of Sinai, which the same nation traversed after the former. 6. That of Paran, terminated by Kadeshbarnea, on the confines of the land of Canaan. 7. That of Zin, contiguous to the south-western part of Idumaea, and terminated by Kadesh. This may possibly have been the wilderness or solitude of Kadesh or Cades, mentioned by the Psalmist. 8. The mounts Casius and Sinai, both which were in Arabia, according to St. Paul, Pliny, and Strabo. 9. The several stations of the Israelites here, on their march to the land of Canaan from Egypt, viz. Zalmona, Pbunun or Fenon, Oboth, Jim, Abarim, &c. 10. Adra, in the northern part of Arabia Petraea; an episcopal see, over which Proclus presided at the council of Chalcedon, according to Lucas Holstenius. 11. Elusa, which, according to the Jerusalem Targum, seems to have corresponded with Sur, and likewise the seat of a bishop. 12. Bosira, twenty-five miles from Adra, a town of this region greatly honoured by Trajan, and called also Philippopolis, from the emperor Philip, surnamed Arabi by Aurelius Victor. 13. Moca, a city taken notice of by a medal of Antoninus Pius as governed by its own laws. We shall pass over in silence here every thing relating to the Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites or Idumæans, Amalekites, and Midianites, though settled in Arabia Petraea, since they have been already treated of at large in the first volume of this history.

Arabia Deserta.

Arabia Deserta was bounded on the north by the Euphrates, which, bending its a course easterly, separated it from Mejopotamia (F); on the west by Syria, Judæa, and Arabia Petraea; on the east by Chaldaea and Babylonia, or more precisely by a ridge of mountains dividing it from those countries; and on the south by Arabia Felix, from whence it was likewise disjoined by several ranges of hills. The Cauchabeni, according to Ptolemy, inhabited that part of this province bordering upon the Euphrates, as the Batanai did that upon the confines of Syria. The Agubeni and Rbaabeni were placed more southerly, towards the frontiers of Arabia Felix; and by the Persian gulf the Orcheni. Under the Cauchabeni, near the borders of Babylonia, the Æsita had their habitation; and above the Rbaabeni the Masani. In the interior part the Agrai were seated; and in the mountainous region, near Chaldaea, the Mar- b teni or Martini. All these nations, or rather tribes, except the Æsita and Agrai, were very obscure; but those deserving some regard, a word or two concerning them may not prove unacceptable to our readers ¹.

The Æsita.

Bochart supposes the Æsita to have inhabited that tract, where the holy and patient Job was seated. He believes, that Ptolemy wrote Αυσίται Αυσίται; and that Uz the son of Nabor, settling here, gave name to the whole district. This notion, it must be owned, as well as the emendation that supports it, is not void of a good degree of probability; for the septuagint version renders in the land of Uz εἰς χώραν Αυσίταις, in the land of the Ausitæ; and Haran or Charræ, where Terah's family resided, was on the opposite bank of the Euphrates, and consequently in the neighbourhood of this c place. Add to this, that the Chaldeans and Sabeans are represented as Job's neighbours in Scripture; which circumstance agrees extremely well with the country of the Ausitæ or Æsita, as being contiguous to Chaldaea, and having, according to Pto- lemy, a city called Sabe situate in it. Further, Buz was Nabor's second son; and we find, adjoining to this territory, a district called Busitis, of which Elibu, one of Job's friends, was a native; and another of them came from Tema or Thema, a town of Arabia Deserta, not very remote from hence: which considerations, as well as several others that might be offered, render it not a little probable, that the land of Uz, and the territory of the Ausitæ or Æsita, were one and the same country ^m.

The Agrai.

THE Agrai lay more westerly, and even close upon the skirts of Arabia Petraea; d which possibly may have induced some learned men to call them Agarai, and make them the same people with the Hagareni above-mentioned, whom we have placed in Arabia Petraea. If this be admitted, they must have possessed a good part of Arabia, and been much more powerful than Cellarius is willing to allow them. Be that as it will, it is certain Pliny in the same passage takes notice of the Agrai and the city of Egra or Agra; that, in the cabinets of the curious, antique (G) coins have been discovered, with the words ΖΕΥΣ ΑΓΡΕΥΣ, Jupiter of Agra, or Jupiter the protector of Agra, upon them; and lastly, that the situation the Oriental geographers assign Hagr, a name not very remote from Agra, quadrates well enough with such a sup- e position. But as it is not a matter of any great moment whether the Agrai and Haga- reni were the same people or not, whether their territories were extensive, or confined within narrow bounds, we leave our readers to take which side of the question they please ⁿ.

(F) It appears from Strabo, that all the Arab tribes bordering on Mejopotamia, from their way of life, were by the Greeks and Romans denominated Arabes Scenitæ. That roving people, whom some authors make the same with the Saraceni and Nabathæans, dispersed themselves over several parts of Arabia Petraea and Arabia Felix, as well as through almost every district of this barren province (6).

(G) That the coins here mentioned belonged to this city, seems plain, not only from the legend they exhibit, but likewise from the workmanship, taste, and manner of them, since they agree intirely with those of the cities in the neighbourhood of Palestine. They prove therefore Pliny's text to have been corrupted, and that his present Egra was originally Agra. That Jupiter should have been honoured with such an appellation, will not appear strange, when we consider the Diana Ephesia, Apollo Delphicus, Apollo Clarus, &c. of the antients (7).

- a It is very well known, that the antient Ituræans, Edomites, Nabathæans, people of Kedar, and other nations settled in Arabia Petræa and Arabia Deserta, led, for the most part, a wandering life, like their posterity the present Bedoweens, without houses, towns, or any fixed habitations. By far the greatest part of both these provinces or kingdoms was a lonesome, desolate wilderness, no otherwise diversified than by plains covered with sand, or mountains consisting of naked rocks and precipices; neither were they ever, unless sometimes at the equinoxes, refreshed with rain. The few vegetables therefore, which they produced, must have been stunted by a perpetual drought, and the nourishment afforded them by the nocturnal dews sufficiently impaired by the intense heat of the sun in the day. Throughout the sandy deserts were found huge mountains of sand, formed by the violence of the winds, that continually blew over them in the day-time, though they ceased in the night. As for wells and fountains, they were so very rare in these parts, that it is no wonder they should have occasioned so much strife and contention. However, notwithstanding the natural sterility of the tract we are now upon, those vast plains of sand above-mentioned were here-and-there interspersed with fruitful spots, which appeared like so many little islands surrounded by an immense ocean, as has been observed by Pliny. These being rendered extremely delightful by fountains, rivulets, palm-trees, a variety of vegetables, and most excellent fruits, the Arabs, with their flocks, encamped upon some of them, and, having consumed every thing there, retired to others, as is the custom of the Bedoweens at this day. Such fruitful spots were likewise frequent in Libya, and by the Egyptians called Anafes or Abafes, as we learn from Strabo. The barren part of Arabia Felix, bordering upon the Red sea, was, in like manner, interspersed with such Abafes; which probably gave name to the Abaseni, a nation settled there, and in the adjacent fertile region. A body of these, crossing the streights of Bab-al-Mandab, passed into Ethiopia, which from them received the denomination of Abassia. This, notwithstanding what has been advanced to the contrary by M. Ludolphus, appears to us much more likely, than that either the Arabs or Ethiopians should have been called Abassines, from we know not what mixture peculiar to the former nation; for the very notion of such a mixture is repugnant to the whole stream of Oriental antiquity, and even to the sacred writings themselves, as our readers will easily collect from several passages of this history. It is certain the Nubians (H), a people inhabiting part of Libya Interior, abounding with Abafes, and Ethiopia, went antiently under the appellation of Abaseni; which adds no small weight to our opinion. That even the fruitful part of Arabia Felix itself should be called Abaseni, is not to be wondered at, since it might as well derive this name from Arabia Petræa, as it did from thence that of Arabab or Arabia; for that Arabia Petræa was styled Abasene, appears from Herodian and Dio, who have given an account of Severus's expedition into this country, in conjunction with a coin of that emperor, having on the reverse the word ABASHNON, exhibited by Goltzius. And this takes off the whole force of the objection offered by M. Ludolphus against the etymon of Abasene or Abassia here proposed.

THOUGH Ptolemy has handed down to us a large list of the towns appertaining to Arabia Deserta, our readers will be apt to conclude, from the foregoing observations,

(H) That the Nubians were a branch of the antient Ethiopians, appears from Aristotle, Ptolemy, and others; and that the Ethiopians were nearly related to the Egyptians, after consulting Herodotus, Diodorus, and Strabo, no one can doubt. The Ethiopic and Egyptian languages therefore, in early ages, must have been, in a manner, the same; which likewise may be immediately collected from the afore said authors. Anafes or Abafes therefore was probably an Ethiopic as well as an Egyptian word. Now, that the Arabic tongue antiently agreed with the Ethiopic, cannot well be denied, so uncommon an affinity betwixt them remaining to this day; so that Anafes or Abafes may be considered likewise as a word used by the antient Arabs. These points add great weight to the conjecture here proposed (8).

that few of them were places of any great repute. That geographer makes Thapsacus on the Euphrates, a city of some note on account of the bridge over which Alexander and Darius marched their respective armies, its frontier on the side of Mesopotamia; but Pliny and Stephanus think this town belonged to Syria. Near the mountains separating Arabia from Chaldaea stood Themma, Thema, or Tema, so called from Thema or Tema the son of Ishmael, and mentioned in various passages of Scripture; for the Ishmaelites extended themselves from the land of Havilah near the Euphrates to the confines of Egypt. Seba was upon the borders of Arabia Felix, and founded probably by Seba Abraham's grandson; since all that patriarch's children by Keturah, according to Moses, moved towards the east. Gadirtha, Auzara, Audathba or Adithba, Balatæa, Pbarga, Belgnæa, and the other antient cities situated along the banks of the Euphrates, have long since disappeared; unless we will allow some traces of Audathba, or Adithba, and Balatæa, to be still visible in the modern Haditha and Balladoc. Ammæa, Idacara, and Jucara, towards the Persian gulph, are equally obscure; except the present Al-Kere should be thought to bear some resemblance to the two latter. Salma, Calathusa, Arrade, Tedium, Odagena, Luma, Dumathba, &c. in the mediterranean parts; Artemita and Abæra on the skirts of Arabia Felix; Tbauba, Erupa, Alata, Aurana, Cboce, Barathena, &c. to the northward, never probably made any considerable figure. However, that some memory of Salma seems at this day to be preserved in mount Salma, of Dumathba in Dawmat-al-Jandal, of Aurana in Auran, and of Alata in Adadi, we think, cannot well be denied.

Arabia Felix.

Arabia Felix was limited on the north by the two provinces or kingdoms just described; on the south by the Erythræan sea; on the east and west by part of that sea, together with the Arabian and Persian gulphs. In short, it pretty nearly answered to that tract, which is looked upon as the proper peninsula of the Arabs by the Oriental geographers. Strabo tells us, that in his time it was divided into five kingdoms, which well enough corresponds with the division of the proper Arabia into five provinces by the eastern writers. These provinces are Yaman, Hejaz, Tebâma, Najd, and Yamama; to which some add Babrein, as a sixth. But the more exact make this a part of Irâk, and therefore come nearer to an agreement with Strabo. However, others reduce them all to two, Yaman and Hejaz, the last including the three provinces of Tebâma, Najd, and Yamama. The principal nations taken notice of by the antients as settled here were the Sabæi, Gerrai, Minæi or Minnæi, Airamitæ, Maranitæ, Catabani, Asitæ, Homeritæ, Sapphoritæ, Omanitæ, Saraceni, Nabatæi, Thamydeni, Bizomenæ, &c. As the limits and situation of these nations cannot be determined with any manner of precision, we shall be as concise as possible in the particular geography of the Happy Arabia.

The Sabæi.

THE Sabæi seem to have possessed a very considerable territory in the southern and best part of this peninsula. Their country was greatly celebrated amongst the antients for the vast quantity of frankincense it produced. Saba or Sabæ, its metropolis, according to the antient geographers, stood upon a hill, at no very considerable distance from the Red Sea, being a large, opulent, and strong city. It was defended by a castle, and, as has been supposed by many learned men, together with the Arab nation in general, the residence of the queen of Sbeba. However, provided we allow the modern Mâreb, in the province of Hadramaut, to correspond with the antient Saba, this last must have been seated more to the south, and near the coast of the Erythræan sea, or, as it is now called, the Indian ocean. And that the modern Mâreb answers to Saba, must be admitted at least extremely probable from Pliny, who, together with Strabo, mentions Mariaba or Meriaba, the same words apparently with Mâreb, as the capital of the Sabæi, but is intirely silent as to the city of Saba. According to the eastern geographers, the town of Mâreb or Mârab is something above three days journey from Sanaa the capital of Yaman, in an eastern direction. From the same authors it also appears, that Saba was originally the name of a district, as well as a city, which could only be deemed a small part of the kingdom of Yaman. But that this district should have been always confined to the province of Hadramaut or Sbibâm, if not a part of it, as they seem to insinuate, cannot be allowed; since frankincense, for the production of which the territory of a the Sabæi was so famous, is only found in the province of Sibir, different from that of Hadramaut. The Arabs assert both the town and district to have been so denominated from Saba the son of Jexbab, and grandson of Joktan, whose name imports to lead into captivity, because he was the first who reduced men to a state of servitude. Pliny makes the Persian and Arabian gulphs the eastern and western boundaries of this nation. The maritime towns were Marana, Marma, (I) Corolia, Sabaiba, &c. and inland cities Nascus, Cardaua, Carnus, &c. Rbegama or Rbegma, founded probably by Raamab the son of Cush, seated on the Persian gulph, seems likewise to have appertained to the Sabæi ^r.

b THE Gerræi and Minæi, according to Strabo, brought vast quantities of frankincense, and other kinds of perfumes, from the upper or southern parts of Arabia Felix to the sea-ports; which is a strong presumption of their being two tribes or cantons of the Sabæi. We find the towns of Bilæna or Bilbana, Gera, and Magindana, mentioned by Ptolemy as belonging to the Gerræi; and the Minæi, a powerful nation, joined with the Gerræi by Diodorus and Strabo. The last author calls the region of the Minæi Minæa or Meinæa, and makes its northern frontiers seventy days journey from Ailab. Its principal city was Carna or Carana, called, as should seem, Carnus by Pliny, and placed by him in the country of the Sabæi; which brings no small accession of strength to what we have just advanced. Some authors take notice of the Charmæi as a people contiguous to the Minæi and Gerræi, but deliver nothing of moment concerning them ^c.

As for the Atramitæ or Adramitæ, they undoubtedly inhabited part at least of the province at this day named Hadramaut or Hadramutta, and consequently were a tribe of the Sabæi. Their metropolis was called Sabota or Sabaiba, as may be inferred from Pliny and Ptolemy; besides which the port of Cane, at the southern extremity of Arabia Felix, belonged to them. Xibân, or Sbibâm, and Tezim, are now the principal towns of Hadramaut, both of them about a day's journey from the Indian ocean. Sbibâm stands upon a rough and rocky mountain of the same name, is fortified with a citadel of great strength, and rendered almost impregnable by its situation. It goes likewise under the name of Hadramaut amongst the Arabs, lies in about 13° 30' N. latitude, and is seven days journey from Aden. The province was denominated Hadramaut from one of the sons of Joktan, whose descendants first peopled it. Sbibâm and Tezim were also the names of two tribes, who founded, and settled themselves in, the cities so called, as we learn from the Arab historians. Ebisma, Dama, Ægisthæ, Trulla, Mapbatb, and other places fixed by Ptolemy here, deserve not the least attention ^d.

THE Maranitæ or Maranenses must have been in the neighbourhood of the two former cantons, though we cannot pretend to ascertain their situation. The metropolis of this nation was probably the Mara or Amara of Ptolemy, and the Mara of some of the Oriental geographers ^e.

Cellarius makes the Catabani a people of good consideration; which is confirmed by Pliny, who tells us, that the Larendani, Catabani, and Gebanitæ, had many towns, particularly Nagia and Tamna that contained sixty-five temples. Tamna must have been the seat of some Arab prince governing the Catabani, according to Strabo; from whence we may conclude, that they inhabited the province of Tebama stretching out as far to the southward as the city of Aden. Goli says, that the word signifies a violent heat; and that the country was so denominated from its being greatly exposed to the solar rays, whose heat there is very intense. But as many other places in Arabia were subject to the same inconvenience, our readers may possibly suppose it

(1) It is possible, that this town might be seated on some part of the Red Sea abounding with coral, especially since that sea was famous for the production of this marine vegetable; which if we admit, it may appear probable, that Corolia received its name from the coral in its neighbourhood. Notwithstanding what has been advanced by Pliny, the word coral seems to be of Oriental extraction. For חרל חרל or חורל signifies a thorn, a nettle, a thistle, &c. which are vegetables, and consequently bear some analogy to coral. Some may perhaps imagine, that coral was so denominated from the town we are here speaking of (9).

rather to have deduced its name from Tema the son of Ismael, whose posterity in a process of time might settle themselves in it. This seems to be confirmed by Almotarezzi, who says, that Ismael himself resided in Araba a district of Tebama. Tebala, the capital of Tebama, a town of considerable note, built by Tebala the son of Midian, stands in the road from Mecca to Sanaa the metropolis of Yaman ^a.

The Afritæ.

THE Afritæ possessed all that tract about the promontory Syagrus, the cape Ras al Gbat of the moderns, including, as should seem, part of the provinces of Omân and Mabra. Nay, they must have spread themselves much farther, if we suppose Hâsec, a maritime town on the coast of Hadramaut, to have been so denominated from them. Whether any traces of the Afritæ are still visible in Masfat an Arab town on the bay of Ormuz, a little above a degree north of the extremity of cape Ras al Gbat, and almost under the tropic of Cancer, we must submit to the judgment of our curious and inquisitive readers ^b.

The Homerites.

Ptolemy mentions the Homerites as a nation seated in the southern part of Arabia Felix, and bounded on the east by the Adramitæ, or province of Hadramaut. His Arabia Emporium he likewise places in their country, as Pliny does his Massala. Some authors make them the same people with the Sabæans, whilst others consider them in a different light. For our part, we look upon Sabæi and Homeritæ to have been different names of the same nation, and are countenanced herein by the Oriental historians. For these inform us, that the Sabæans were called Hamyarites from Hamyar the son of their great ancestor Saba; and that they ruled over almost the whole country of Yaman. Though the kingdom of the Hamyarites, or Homerites, was at length translated from the princes of Hamyar to the descendants of Cabân his brother, yet they all retained the title of king of Hamyar. We find them styled Immireni by Theodorus Lector, and Theophanes Byzantius gives them the name of Ethiopians, insinuating them to be the Macrobi of Herodotus, which yet we are by no means disposed to admit. They made a great figure amongst the antient Arabs before the time of Mohammed, as will more fully appear in the sequel of this history ^c.

The Sapphoritæ.

THE Sapphoritæ of Ptolemy cannot be considered as a people distinct from the Homerites, notwithstanding the authority of Ptolemy and Cellarius. They were only the citizens of Sapphar, or, as Pliny has it, Sapbar, a city of note in the dominions of the Homerites. Ptolemy assigns this place a position nearly agreeing with that of the present Sanaa, which we cannot help looking upon as extremely probable, especially as Sapbar is affirmed to be the metropolis of this country by Pliny. The Arabs believe, that all the mountainous part of the region producing frankincense went, in the earliest times, by the name of Sepbar; from whence the excellent Golius concludes this tract to have been the mount Sepbar of Moses. A strong presumption of the truth of which notion is, that Dbafâr, the same word with the modern Arabs as the antient Sapbar, is the name of a town in Sibir, the only province of Arabia bearing frankincense, on the coast of the Indian ocean, five parasangs from (K) Merbât, as we learn from Safioddin, who likewise informs us, that this thuriferous mountainous country of Dbafâr is about three days journey long, and of an equal breadth. Bochart therefore deserves little regard, when he intimates, that the Mesha of Moses was the Muza of Ptolemy, or the Mocha of the moderns, a celebrated port of the Red Sea, about four or five days journey from Dbafâr; since this is much too narrow an extent of territory to receive all the posterity of the thirteen sons of Joktan, as we are assured by Moses the tract between Mesha and Sepbar did. For which reason we cannot help preferring the sentiment of R. Saadias and R. Abraham Zacbutus, who assert Mesha to be Mecca; especially since it is a point agreed ^d ^e ^f a upon by the Arabs, that Mesba was one of the most ancient names of Mecca. Some authors believe, that in early times there stood a city called Dbafûr or Sapbar, the Arabic letter Ḍ frequently answering to the Hebrew Ḍ and Greek Ξ, in the neighbourhood of Sanaa, and others that Sanaa itself went formerly by that name; which in a great measure confirms what we have just advanced ^γ.

We find the Omanitæ taken notice of by Ptolemy, and Omanum their chief city ^{The Omanitæ.} represented by him as one of the most considerable places in Arabia. It cannot be doubted but the Omân of Alfraganus, and capital of the province of the same name, the common boundary of Taman and Babrein, is the Omanum of Ptolemy, and the country in which it is seated, the district of the ancient Omanitæ. From whence b it appears extremely probable, that they were under the jurisdiction of the Homerites, and consequently ought to be looked upon as a clan of that people. The citadel of Omân is defended by a strong garrison of Arabs. Either the tract itself, or the metropolis, seems also to have been called antiently Sobâr; but at this day the former is denominated Omân, and the latter Sobâr. The province of Omân stretches itself out three hundred miles on the coast of the Persian sea, which is there called the sea of Omân. In the time of Ptolemy, Omanum, or Sobâr, was a famous mart, but has been in a manner deserted by merchants for several ages ^z.

THE Saracens or Nabatæans possessed that part of Arabia Felix bordering upon ^{The Saracens.} Arabia Petraea and Arabia Deserta; but what extent this territory was of, we no-where find. Contiguous to them the antients placed the Thamydeni, Thamuditæ, or Tbamydeni, a people also mentioned in the Koran. Diodorus Siculus relates, that the (L) Thamydeni inhabited part of the coast of the Arabian gulph; and Pliny intimates their principal city to have been named Badanatba. In fine, Goli believes them to have occupied a good part at least of the province of Hejâz, and particularly that district wherein Hagr or Al Hejr, the Egra or Agra of Stephanus and Ptolemy, is situated; which, as well as other considerations that might be offered, plainly evinces them to have been nearly related to the Saracens and Nabatæans, if not intirely the same people with them ^a.

Diodorus Siculus tells us, that in the neighbourhood of the Thamydeni were like- ^{The Baizomenæ.} wise seated the Baizomenæ, who lived upon wild beasts taken in hunting. In their country stood a temple held in the highest veneration amongst all the Arabs. It is probable this temple was sacred to Isis, as Diodorus relates an island near the Baizomenæan coast to have been more immediately under her protection. These likewise must have been settled in some of the maritime parts of Hejâz, but their situation, for want of sufficient light from ancient history, cannot now be exactly determined. However, we doubt not but they appertained to the Nabatæans, as well as their neighbours the Thamydeni ^b.

We might here mention several other nations, or rather tribes, taken notice of by the antients as appertaining to Arabia Felix. But since these either coincide with c some of the Ethiopic cantons already described, as the Troglodytes, &c. or may be considered as branches of the Saracens, Nabatæans, Sabæans, Homerites, &c. our readers will excuse even a bare enumeration of them. The same may be said of that large catalogue of obscure and insignificant towns and villages, belonging to these tribes, to be met with in Ptolemy, of which that geographer himself had no idea. However, they will not dispense with an omission of certain towns and seaports of Arabia hitherto passed over in silence, that were held in good repute by the old geographers and historians ^c.

Nysa was a town of Arabia on the Red Sea, near the confines of Egypt, famous for the education of Bacchus, who from thence, and his father Jupiter, received the name f of Dionysus. Arga and Badeo, two maritime cities in a southerly direction from ^{Remarkable places in Arabia Felix.}

(L) The Thamydeni were the tribe of Thamid, so famous amongst the Arab writers, of whom we shall have occasion hereafter frequently to speak (11).

Nyfa, had royal palaces in which the sovereigns of the country sometimes resided. ^a Pudni we find esteemed by Ptolemy as one of the principal places of Arabia Felix. Musa or Muza was a celebrated emporium and harbour, to which the Arab merchants resorted with their frankincense, spices, and perfumes. The best authors take the modern Mocha or Mokba to correspond with the ancient Musa; but, in our opinion, Mofa, at present a small, but handsome town near ten leagues from Mokba, seems to bid the fairest for that ancient mart. This does not only appear from the very great affinity, or rather identity, of their names and situation, but likewise from hence, that Mofa is the rendezvous and thoroughfare of the fruits which come from the mountainous parts of Arabia, a circumstance well enough suiting with what the antients have related of Musa. Be that as it will, we cannot well deny, that some ^b traces of Musa are still preserved in Mofa; especially as Pliny intimates the Arab merchants to have brought in his time vast quantities of the produce of their country to the former place. Ocelis, according to Pliny and Arrian, stood upon the shore of that narrow sea called by the moderns the streights of Bab al Mandab, and supplied the merchants with fresh water in their Indian voyages. Arabia Emporium has been already mentioned, and will be described when we come to speak of the city of Aden, which is supposed to answer to it. The port of Mofcha our readers will probably place upon the spot occupied at this day by the city of Masfat, which is all that we can say of it. As for the Itamas portus, the memory and situation of it still remain in Cadabema, a town or village on the Persian gulph, or bay of Bas- ^c ra ^d.

Oriental geographers of Arabia.

BEFORE we conclude this section, our readers will expect a sketch of the Oriental geography of the peninsula of the Arabs. The best eastern writers, as has been already observed, divide this peninsula into five provinces or kingdoms, viz. Yaman, Hejaz, Tebama, Najd, and Yamama. This division is of great antiquity, as appears from Strabo; which is not to be wondered at, since the Arab customs, names of towns, &c. are nearly the same now that they were above three thousand years ago ^e.

Yaman.

THE province of Yaman, so called either from its situation to the right-hand or south of the temple of Mecca, or else from the happiness and verdure of its soil, extends itself along the Indian ocean from the streights of Bab al Mandab to cape Ras-falgat; part of the Red Sea bounds it on the west, as the towns of Najran, the Nagara Metropolis of Ptolemy, Haly or Haljo on the sea Al Kolzom, and Omân or Sobar, do on the north. It is subdivided into several lesser provinces, as Hadramaut, Sibir, Omân, Mabra, &c. of which Sibir alone produces the frankincense. The very learned Mr. Sale did not sufficiently attend to the Oriental geographers, when he limited Yaman on the north by Hejaz, and made Najran a province, neither of which particulars have any foundation in them ^f.

Principal ancient cities of Yaman.

THIS country has been famous from all antiquity for its fertility, riches, and happiness of its climate. The principal cities in it known to the antients are the following: 1. Mokba, if it was the Musa or Muza of Pliny, Ptolemy, and Arrian; which yet, we apprehend, will admit of a dispute. It is at present a port and town on the Red Sea of considerable trade; contains ten thousand inhabitants, Jews, Armenians, and Mohammedans; is surrounded with walls, after the ancient manner; and has four gates without a ditch, though strengthened by four towers with a proper number of cannon ^g placed upon them. 2. Aden, a celebrated mart on the Indian ocean, not far from the streights of Bab al Mandab, so called, according to the Arabs, from its founder Aden the son of Saba, and grandson of Abraham. Some believe the name to be the same with Eden, the Hebrew word denoting Paradise, and that the town under consideration received this name from the delightful country in which it was situated. It stands at the foot of several high mountains, which surround it almost on all sides. The Arabs have erected five or six forts on the summits of these mountains, with curtains, and many other fortifications on their necks. A fair aqueduct conveys from thence the waters into a great canal or reservoir, built

- a about three quarters of a mile from the city, which supplies the inhabitants with very good water. Goli produces several reasons to prove, that Aden is the Arabia Emporium of Ptolemy, which seem to carry considerable weight. It can scarce be doubted, but that Aden is the Adana which Stephanus mentions from *Uranius*¹. 3. Sanaa, the capital of Yaman, a very antient city, greatly resembling Damascus. It is seated in a mountainous territory, and blessed with a most delightful air; insomuch that it enjoys a double summer, or rather a perpetual spring. It is about fifty leagues distant from Mokha on the borders of Hadramaut, and was denominated Ozâl from its founder the son of Joktan, as the Arabs pretend. They likewise make Sanaa the son of Ozâl to have communicated that name to it by which it goes at present.
- b Some assert it to be the Sapbar of Ptolemy, as above observed. Sanaa, towards the beginning of the last century, consisted of good houses built with lime and stone, being as large as Bristol. It stands in a barren and stony valley, surrounded at a small distance with high hills, one of which overlooks the town to the northward. On this hill the Arabs have built a small castle to keep off the neighbouring mountaineers, who sometimes insult the city. The inhabitants have no water but what they receive from wells, which are very deep. Wood is brought from far, and consequently very dear. On the east side stands the castle invironed with mud-walls, flanked with towers and redoubts, in which every night are posted proper guards. The king of Yaman does not now reside here, but at Muab, a town built by one of the last monarchs of this country, not a mile from Dhamâr a little to the S. E. of Sanaa. About three quarters of a mile from this place, on a pretty high hill, the prince above-mentioned built a palace or pleasure-house, to which he frequently retired, in order to divert himself; and, from the pleasant country in which it was seated, styled it *Hish almawâbeeb*², or the castle of delights. 4. Saba or Mâreb in the province of Hadramaut, of which an account has been given above. It is at present little better than a village, and stands above three days journey E. of *Sanaa*³. 5. Sbibâm, Dbafâr, &c. towns of a very high antiquity, have been⁴ already described. 6. Omân or Sobâr, the Omanum of Ptolemy, was formerly frequented by merchants of various nations; but has for several ages been deserted by them. This
- d seems to have been occasioned by the vicinity of a small rocky island called Kis, so low that it cannot be discovered at any distance, on which many ships were dashed to pieces. Kis lies a little to the east of Charec, another small island opposite to the coast of Omân, and famous for a pearly-fishery, according to Abulfeda. Iacûtus and the Nubian-geographer make both these islands, now called the isles of Sobâr, about half a day's sail from the main land of Arabia; but authors are not agreed in this point. The heats in Omân are frequently so intense, that they have passed into a proverb amongst the *Oriental*s. The town of Sobâr must be in something more than 24°. N. lat. though Ptolemy places his Omanum Emporium in 19°. 45' N. lat. and Ebn Marûb, mathematician to sultan Morad or Amurâb II. asserts Omân or Sobâr to be in about
- e 23°. N. lat. All other particulars of note relating to this place our readers will find in the authors here referred to⁵.

THE best part of Arabia Felix, or that which the Greeks called most happy, was probably the country of Yaman; the delightfulness and plenty of which ought to be attributed to its mountains. For all that part lying along the Red Sea is a dry barren desert, in some places ten or twelve leagues over; but in return bounded by the aforesaid mountains, which, being well watered, enjoy an almost perpetual spring, and besides coffee, the peculiar produce of this country, yield great plenty and variety of fruits, and in particular excellent corn, grapes, and spices. The principal of these mountains taken notice of by the antients were Cabubatbra, Melan, Prionatus, and Didymi, whose Arabic names have not hitherto been brought into Europe. As the Greeks and Romans were little acquainted with this region, we must allow Ptolemy to have been very inaccurate in his geography of it; which might also be proved by an induction of particulars, were it in any manner necessary. Admit this, and we may be allowed to suppose, that the present Arab river Falj, emptying itself into the Bay of Basra, is the Prion of Ptolemy; and the modern city Masfa his Mapbath, situate about $0^{\circ} 30'$ N. of the source of that river. However, it must be owned, that a river of Omân, falling into the Indian ocean at Sûr, about $0^{\circ} 40'$ N. of Masfat, possibly the Moscha portus of Ptolemy, bids likewise fair for the Prion. No other rivers of note are to be met with in Yaman; which is not to be wondered at, since the streams, which at certain times of the year descend from the mountains, seldom reach the sea, being for the most part drunk up and lost in the burning sands of that coast.

Hejaz, with its chief cities,

Hejaz, either so named, because it divides Najd from Tebama, or because it is surrounded with mountains, is limited on the south by Yaman and Tebama; on the west by the sea ' Al Kolzom ; on the north by the deserts of Sbâm or Syria ; and on the east by the province of Najd p. This province is famous for its two chief cities Mecca and Medina, one of which is celebrated for its temple, and having given birth to Mohammed ; and the other for being the place of his residence for the last ten years of his life, and of his interment. The soil of Hejaz, as well as that of Najd, Tebama, and Yamama, is much more barren than that of Yaman ; the greater part of their territories being covered with dry sands, or rising into rocks, interspersed here and there with some fruitful spots, which receive their greatest advantages from their water and palm-trees. The chief towns in Hejaz, deserving any attention on account of their antiquity, are these that follow : 1. Mecca, sometimes also called Becca, which words are synonymous, and signify a place of great concourse, is certainly one of the most antient cities in the world. Some authors imagine it to be the Mesa or Mesha of the Scripture, as above observed, and that it deduced its name from one of Ismael's sons. It stands in a stony and barren valley, surrounded on all sides by mountains under the same parallel with the Macoraba of Ptolemy, and about forty Arabian miles from the sea ' Al Kolzom. The length of Mecca, from Maalah to Masphalab, is about two miles ; and its breadth, from the foot of the mountain Ajjad to the top of another called Koikaân, about a mile. In the midst of this space the town is seated, built of stone cut from the neighbouring mountains. The Arab authors tell us, that near a chapel, or holy house, for so the Arabs term it, in the centre of ' Al-Hharâm, or great temple, here, called ' Al-Caabah, stands a white stone, which was the sepulchre of Ismael ; and that ' Al-Caabah was first built by Adam of stone, but destroyed by the deluge. However, add they, God commanded Abraham and Ismael to rebuild it ; which they did, covering it with the boughs of olive-trees, and for pillars erecting the trunks of palm-trees. There being no springs at Mecca, at least none but what are bitter, and unfit to drink, except only the well Zemzem, the water of which, though far the best, yet cannot be drank for any continuance, being brackish, and causing eruptions in those who drink plentifully of it, the inhabitants are obliged to use rain-water, which they catch in cisterns. But this not being sufficient, several attempts were made to bring water thither from other places by aqueducts ; and particularly about Mohammed's time, Zobair, one of the principal men of the tribe of Koreish, endeavoured at a great expence to supply the city with water from mount Arafat, but without success ; yet this was effected not many years ago, being begun at the charge of a wife of Solimân the Turkish emperor. But long before the time of that prince, another aqueduct had been made from a spring at a considerable distance, which was, after several years labour, finished by the Khalif al Moktader Abbassida. Notwithstanding the sterility of the soil near Mecca, it being so barren as to produce no fruits but what are common in the deserts, yet a traveller is no sooner out of its territory, than he meets on all sides with plenty of good springs and streams of running water, with many gardens, and cultivated lands. The prince or Sbarîf of Mecca has a garden well planted at his castle of Marbaa, about three miles westward from the city, where he usually resides. This prince is lineally descended from Hassem, Mohammed's great-grandfather, who, being the head of his tribe, appointed two caravans to set out yearly, the one in summer, and the other in winter, to foreign parts, in order the more effectually to supply his countrymen with provisions, the people of Mecca having no corn or grain of their own growth. They are supplied with dates in vast abundance from the adjacent country, and with grapes from Tayef, about sixty miles distant, very few growing at Mecca. As for the citizens of Mecca, they are generally very rich, being consider-

- a able gainers by the prodigious concourse of people of almost all nations at the yearly pilgrimage, at which time there is a great fair or mart for all kinds of merchandize. They have also great numbers of cattle, and particularly of camels: however, the poorer sort cannot but live very indifferently, in a place where almost every necessary of life must be purchased with money. The Sharif of Mecca's troops consist intirely of infantry, which the Arabs call 'Al-Harrabah, i. e. archers or dartmen. We must not omit observing, that Safa and Marwab were two places in Mecca, in which the idols Asaph and Nayelab were placed before the time of Mohammed. As for the temple of Mecca, and the reputed holiness of this territory, they will be treated of in the modern history of the Arabs. Some authors write, that the interior or middle part of Mecca only had the name of Becca assigned it, because it was greatly crouded with inhabitants, which that word imports; others believe, that Mecca was the name of the city, and Becca of the temple; and lastly, others think, that Becca passed into Mecca, as Balbec into Malbec, Banbe into Manbe, &c. which seems to us the most probable opinion. We must distinguish between the Hbaram of Mecca, considered as the territory of the Sharif, extending some miles beyond the city, and the magnificent temple in it so called, being three hundred and seventy cubits long, three hundred and fifteen broad, and supported by four hundred and thirty-four^a pillars. It must not be forgot, that the Arabs have a tradition amongst them, that Ishmael, with his mother Hagar, fixed his residence here; which
- b seems to have induced them frequently to visit Mecca, and hold it in high veneration, even before the age of Mohammed. They likewise believe Zemzem to have been the well, near which Hagar sat down with her son Ishmael, and was comforted by the angel. Abulfeda places the city we are now upon in 67°. 31'. long. and 21°. 20'. N. lat. Some of the Orientalists make the patriarch Abraham to have been the founder of it; but others with more reason attribute its foundation to one of the sons of Ishmael. It does not follow from Moses's mentioning Mesba as inhabited by the posterity of Joktan, that Mecca was built before the time of Ishmael, supposing those places to have been the same, since he more than once uses the appellations by which towns went in his age, as might be proved by an induction of particulars,
- d were it in any manner necessary^r. 2. Medina, which, till Mohammed's retreat thither, was called Yatbreb, is a city standing in a plain, surrounded with a brick wall, and about half a degree from the coast of the Red Sea. Abulfeda intimates, that one of its antient names was Taibab, a word importing salubrious, derived from the healthy air its inhabitants breathed. It is about half as big as Mecca, ten days journey from thence, and salt in many places. In some parts its territory produces palm-trees, fruits, and several salsuginous plants. About the mountains Air and Obud, the first of which is about two leagues to the south, and the other as many to the north, of Medina, the country is fruitful in dates. The name Yatbreb was derived from the chief of the tribe that first settled here, whom the Arabs make the
- e great-grandson of Aram. Goli takes it to be the Ἰάβριττα of Stephanus, and the Ἰάβριττα of Ptolemy. Here Mohammed lies interred in a magnificent building, covered with a cupola, and adjoining to the east side of the great temple, which is built in the midst of the city. Its situation has not been exactly defined, some authors determining its longitude to be 67°. 30'. and others 65°. 20'. and its latitude either 24°. or 25°. N. The most ingenious Mr. Sale must be deemed guilty of an error, when he makes mount Thabir two leagues distant only from Medina, since that mountain is in the neighbourhood of Mecca. Medina is dignified by the Mohammedans with the title of the city of the prophet, from the kind reception Mohammed met with there, as we shall hereafter have occasion more fully to observe^s.
3. Thaifa or Taifa, a town sixty miles to the east of Mecca, behind mount Gazwan, where the cold is more intense than in any other part of Hejaz, but the air most ^a salubrious. It had the name of Vegja given it at first by its founder. The Turks call it the region of Al Abbās from the uncle of Mohammed, who fixed his residence here. The word Taifa plainly alludes to the wall with which this town is surrounded. Lat. 21°. 20' N. 4. Gjudda or Jodda, a port and maritime city, the bulwark of Mecca, must undoubtedly be a place of great antiquity, though scarce ever taken notice of by the Greek or Roman authors. The town of Aidūb, on the confines of Abassia, stands on the opposite shore, where great numbers of the African Mohammedans take shipping, in order to visit the holy city of Mecca. Lat. 21°. 45' N. 5. Yanbo', or 'Al-Yanbo', is undoubtedly the Iambia of Ptolemy, and not far from Medina, or, as the Arabs more properly style it, 'Al-Madinab. We find it represented as a small city by Abulfeda, who ^b likewise cites 'Ebn Sa'id, as affirming it to have a castle, and several fountains, in its neighbourhood. The port is about a day's journey from the high road leading to 'Al-Madinab. A little to the east of Yanbo' stands mount Radwā, about seven stations from 'Al-Madinab, from whence a vast quantity of the whetstone is exported into various regions. All the district of Yanbo' produces palm-trees, water, corn, &c. and was inhabited by the Hbasanites, who lived after the manner of the antient Arabes Scenitæ, and resembled them in all particulars. Ebn Hbawkal observes, that the Hbasanites and Giasarites, whose territories were contiguous, so weakened one another by bloody wars, that their country became a prey to the king of Yaman ^c. 6. Madian, the Modiana of Ptolemy, and Midian or Madian of Scripture, is a city of Hejaz, at present little better than a heap of ruins. It is situated on the eastern shore of the sea 'Al-Kolzom, at no great distance from the gulph of Ailab. The Arabs have several traditions relating to this place, viz. that it received its name from the tribe of Madian, who first built and inhabited it; that Shoa'ib, the son of Mika'il, the son of Yashjar, the son of Madian, of that tribe, was the same person with the father-in-law of Moses, called in Scripture Reuel or Reguel, and Yelbro; and that the well, whence Moses, or, as they call him, Mūsa, watered Yelbro's flocks, still remained when Abulfeda wrote his geographical description of Arabia. Most authors agree, that the Midianites ought to be looked upon as the descendants of Abraham by Keturab, who afterwards seem to have coalesced with the Ishmaelites; since Moses ^d names the same merchants, who sold Joseph to Potiphar, in one place Ishmaelites, and in another Midianites. The sacred historian makes Yelbro both the priest and prince of Midian. Ptolemy asserts the latitude of Modiana to be 27° 45' N. which almost exactly corresponds with that assigned it by 'Ebn Sa'id, viz. 27° 50' N. though other Oriental writers place it in 29° 00' N. lat. 7. Hejr, or 'Al-Hbeg'r, in 28° 30' N. lat. according to 'Ebn Hbawkal, was the seat of the tribe of Tbamud, the Tbamydeni of the antients. This clearly evinces Hejr to be the Egra or Agra of Pliny, since that author makes the Tbamydeni neighbours to that city. As Ptolemy likewise is far from being accurate in his determination of the longitude and latitude of places, we may safely enough take his Negra for the Egra of Pliny, and ^e Hejr of the moderns, since the latitude of the former differs but two degrees from that of the latter of these towns. 'Al-Hbeg'r stands amidst a ridge of rocky mountains, out of which many houses have been cut, as some suppose, by the Amalekites, or their ancestors the Adites, Iramites, Tbamudites, &c. But this notion we cannot rely upon, as depending chiefly on the authority of the Koran. 'Ebn Hbawkal calls this ridge of mountains 'Al-Atbāleb, i. e. the fragments of stones ^f.

Tibama, or Tebama, is a small province, whose limits have not been sufficiently defined by the Arab geographers, who have sometimes confounded it with Yaman and Hejaz. Tebama, according to Goliuz, derived that name from its sandy soil, as it did another, viz. Gaur, from its low situation. It is bounded on the west by the Red Sea, and on the other sides by Hejāz and Yaman, extending

- a almost from Mecca to Aden. Abulfeda mentions several towns in this province undoubtedly of great antiquity, but unknown both to the Greeks and Romans. The Tamna of Pliny, and Tbumna of Ptolemy, by the latitude he assigns it, viz. 17° 15' N. seem to bear some relation to Tebama ^a.

As the Nabathæans possessed the best part, if not all, of the province of Hejâz, contiguous to Tibama, the Tbimanci of Pliny, neighbours to the Nabathæans, must be the Arabs of Tibama.

- THE province of Najd, which word signifies a rising country, lies between ^{Najd.} those of Yamama, Yaman, and Hejaz, and is limited on the east by Irâk. Najd is peculiarly opposed to Tebama, as the name implies, though this last has several b ridges of mountains in it ^a.

- Yamama*, also called Arud, from its oblique situation in respect of Yaman, is ^{Yamama.} encompassed by Najd, Tebama, Babrein, Omân, Sibir, Hadramaut, and Saba. The chief city is Yamâma, which gives name to the province, and was antiently called Jaw, or Gjauva. It is four degrees to the E. of Mecca, and deduced its name, according to the excellent Golius, from the niece of Tasm, whose brilliant and piercing eyes rendered her so famous amongst the Arabs, that one of their proverbs was, more sharp-sighted than YAMAMA. This lady governed Yamama, and therefore the quality above-mentioned was the more conspicuous in her. However, some authors relate, that there was a river, or fountain, in this province, called c Yamama, from whence the province itself was so denominated. The false prophet Mosailama, Mohammed's competitor, rendered this place famous by residing in it. But, he being vanquished and killed, it submitted to Abubecr ^b.

- THOUGH the more accurate Oriental geographers make Babrein part of Irâk, yet ^{Babrein.} a short description of it ought not to be omitted here. Babrein then, in the most extensive acceptation of the word, denotes that maritime tract lying between Basra and the farthest limits of Omân; to which the Arabs have given the name of Babrein, i. e. Of two seas, or the country of two seas, because it connects the Persian gulph with the Indian ocean. In a more confined sense it is applied to an island, or rather two, of the Persian gulph, in 26° 30' N. lat. about a league from the d town of Al-Katif seated on that gulph. One of these islands seems to be the Ichara of Ptolemy, and Icharia of Strabo. As Jûsfâr and the other principal towns of Babrein were built after Mohammed's death, our readers will expect some account of them in the modern history of Arabia ^c.

- As for the islands of Ænus, Timagenes, Zygana, and many others, both in the Arabian and (M) Persian gulphs, enumerated by Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Ptolemy, ^{The principal islands on the coast of Arabia.} Ælian, &c. as appertaining to Arabia, they merit not the least attention. But it may not be improper to observe, that, in our opinion, Ptolemy's island of Socrates may be looked upon as the same with the Socotra of the moderns. 'Tis true, he places the former two or three degrees more to the northward, than the latter is found
e to be by experience. However, his inaccuracy, which we have frequently had occasion to observe, and the little acquaintance the Greeks and Romans had with the people of Arabia Felix, sufficiently account for such a difference; which being admitted, the affinity of the names Socrates and Socotra seems no inconsiderable argument in favour of the conjecture here proposed. With this observation we shall close our description of Arabia ^d.

(M) The antients frequently called the Persian gulph, or gulph of Basra, as well as the Indian ocean, the Erythraean or Red Sea, as we learn from Herodotus, Polybius, Strabo, Philostrophus, Mela, Pliny, Solinus, Dionysius Afcr, and Ælian. Several reasons have been assigned for that appellation; but the most probable seems to be the reflexion of the solar rays in that hot climate, which gave the water a reddish colour. The learned Dr. Frideaux without a sufficient foundation asserts this to have been the only proper Red Sea of the antients; since, according to Pliny, the Arabian and Persian gulphs were both branches of that sea. He seems likewise to be mistaken, when he affirms the whole Arabian gulph to have been the Yam Soup of the Hebrews; since 'tis highly probable, that the Heroopolitian gulph only was so called by that people (12).

S E C T. II.

The antiquity, government, laws, religion, language, learning, arts and sciences, disposition, manner of life, &c. of the Arabs.

posterity of Cush settle in Arabia.

THE descendants of Cush formed a kingdom in that part of Arabia Petraea ^a bordering upon Egypt, and extending itself along the eastern shore of the Red Sea towards the frontiers of Palestine and Arabia Felix, in very early times, as has been already observed in the history of the Ethiopians. His sons Seba or Saba, Sabtab, Regma or Raamah, Sabtecha, and grandsons Sbeba and Dedan, seated themselves likewise in the Happy and Desert Arabia, as appears from the cities Sabota, Rbegana, Rbegama or Rbegma, Saba, Saue, Saptha or Saptab, Dedan, and the country of the Sabæi, whose metropolis was the great city Saba; all of which preserved very sensible footsteps of the names of the first planters of those two provinces or kingdoms. However, it seems to us most probable, for the reasons already given, that the bulk of the Cushites made settlements in other parts. As a farther proof of this, it may ^b be observed, that the eastern writers take little or no notice of them.

Castubhim, Caphtorim, Hhorites, &c.

As for the Castubhim, Caphtorim, and Hhorites, occupying the hilly district about mount Seir, though very antient, they never made any considerable figure. The posterity of Edom, who after their excision seized upon the tract they inhabited, in process of time intermixing with the proper Arabs, formed one people with them. But neither do the present Arabs look upon Esau or Edom as one of the proper founders of their nation ^f.

We have already observed, that the Arraceni and Saraceni of the antients were the same people. From the situation assigned them by the old geographers, it can scarce be doubted but that the Arra of Pliny and Ptolemy was the capital of the ^c region they inhabited, and gave them the appellation they went under. Strabo, describing Ælius Gallus's expedition into Arabia, intimates, that the province of Ararena was thirty days journey from Petra, and fifty from the city of the Negrani, or Nagara Metropolis of Ptolemy, i. e. the modern Nag'ran; that it was for the most part desert, and inhabited by the Nomades, or Arabes Scenitæ; and that the interjacent tract betwixt it and the former city was a wild pathless region, interspersed in some parts with palm-trees. All which particulars, as well as the name itself, clearly evince this province to be the country of the Arraceni or Saraceni, which had the above-mentioned Arra for its capital city. From several circumstances in the description of the expeditions into Arabia made by Trajan and Severus, to be met with in Dio, ^d it appears that the Arraceni or Saraceni were likewise sometimes in the east denominated Agareni, and their chief town Arra Atra, or, as Herodian calls it, Atræ. It is therefore highly probable, that the antient Saraceni were styled Hagarenes, either from the disposition of the tract they inhabited, or from Hagar the mother of Ishmael ^e.

In order to confirm what is here advanced, it may be farther observed, that Stephanus mentions a country called Saraca, inhabited by the Saraceni (N), as con-

(N) Mr. Gagnier thinks, that the Saraceni of Arabia Felix and Arabia Petraea were two different nations; and that the latter received their name Araceni from the city of Arke, Arakeme, or Petra, their metropolis. But in the first article, we humbly conceive, he seems to contradict himself; since in the former part of the Distrib. so often cited, he appears to us to be of opinion, that the Ishmaelites spread themselves gradually over Arabia Felix as well as Arabia

Petraea; and that the Ishmaelites, Arabes Scenitæ, and Saraceni, were frequently taken for the same people. This notion we own ourselves inclined to espouse, as being not only supported by the proofs brought by Mr. Gagnier for that purpose, but likewise by Scripture, all those authors who have so justly represented the Saraceni as a most numerous and powerful nation, Mohammed, Al-Firauzabadi, and other eastern writers (13).

■ tiguous to that of the Nabatæans; and that the Arab geographer Yakût takes notice of the town 'Al-'Arakb seated on Agja, one of the two celebrated mountains of the Taïtes, or tribe of Tai, the Taueni of Pliny, and Tairoi Taini of Bardeſanes in Eusebius, who joins them with the Saracens. From hence, in conjunction with the reasons alledged by the learned Mr. Gagnier, we may conclude, that Pliny called this nation Arraceni; and that Dioſcorides was the first of the antients now extant that prefixed to that word the hissing letter S, as has been determined by the excellent Salmaſius^b.

THE Jerusalem Targum takes the names Iſhmaelites and Saracens to have been of an equal extent, and to have denoted the same nation. This not only included the b Arabes Scenitæ, bordering upon Palestine, Syria, and Chaldæa, but likewise those separated by the Red Sea from Ethiopia; all of whom we find in Scripture going under the general name of Arabians. That the word Saraceni cannot be derived from any of the following sources, notwithstanding the authority of the learned men here mentioned, we believe our readers will allow^c.

1. Joannes Damascenus, Nicetas Choniates, and others, suppose this word to have been of Greek extraction, alluding to Sarah's sending away Hagar empty, without any sort of necessaries or accommodations. But this is too absurd to merit any attention. 2. Scaliger deduces the name Saraceni from the Arabic سرك sarak, i. e. He stole privately, alluding, as that great critic observes, to their ancestor
c Iſhmael, who lived upon rapine and robbery. This, it must be owned, carries with it a greater appearance of truth than the former, since 'tis much more probable that the word should be of an Arab than a Greek origin. But the misfortune is, that Iſhmael was not a pickpocket, but a robber or highwayman; and therefore the root سرك sarak by no means comes up to the signification of Saraceni as determined even by this author himself. 3. Dr. Pocock asserts Saraceni to import Oriental, or people of the east. But as Mr. Gagnier has demonstrated, that the chief arguments he has offered in defence of this opinion hold equally true of the Chaldæans, Persians, Indians, and Chinese, they prove too much, and therefore we think not the least regard is due unto them. The etymon of Saraceni we have given must therefore be d allowed to approach the nearest to truth. As the Saracens were so celebrated a nation, and such different notions relating to their name, which points out their origin, have been advanced, we could not well avoid the prolixity our readers may possibly think us guilty of on this occasion^e.

IF we follow the Oriental writers, we must divide the Arabs into two classes, viz. Two classes of the old lost Arabians, and the present. The most famous tribes amongst the former
e the Arabs. were Ad, Tbamûd, Tasm, Jadis, the first Jorham, Amalek, Amtem, Hasbem, Abil, and Bar. Though these were very numerous, yet they are now either all destroyed, or lost and swallowed up among the other tribes; nor are there any certain memoirs or records extant concerning them. However, as the memory of some very remarkable events, that happened amongst them, and the catastrophe of some of these tribes have been preserved by tradition, and since confirmed by the authority of the Koran, we think it not improper to give our readers a succinct and concise account of them^f.

THE tribe of Ad deduced their origin from Ad, the son of Aws, or Uz, the son Ad of Aram, the son of Sbem, the son of Noab, who after the confusion of tongues settled in Al Abkâf, or the winding sands in the province of Hadramaut, upon the confines of Omân and Yaman, where his posterity greatly multiplied. The first prince that reigned over them was Sheddâd the son of Ad, of whom we find many f fabulous things related by the eastern writers. Some of these however tell us, that Ad had two sons Sheddâd and Sheddîd, who jointly swayed the sceptre after his decease, and extended their dominions from the sands of Alaj to the trees of Oman.

Sheddîd dying first, his brother became sole monarch, and having built a sumptuous palace, made a delightful garden in the deserts of Aden, in imitation of the celestial paradise, which he called Irem, after the name of his great grandfather. When it was finished, he set out with a great retinue in order to take a view of it; but, being arrived at a place within a day's journey of it, they were all destroyed by a terrible noise from heaven. However, according to them, the city still remains, though invisible, being preserved by Providence as a monument of divine justice, Sheddâd proposing by this impious imitation to create in his subjects a superstitious veneration of himself as a god. Al Beidawi adds, that one Abdullah Ebn Kelabab, or, as D'Herbelot calls him, Colabab, in the reign of the khalîf Mcâwiyah, accidentally had Irem discovered to him, as he was seeking a camel he had lost; but seeing no creature there, he was so terrified, that he stayed no longer than to take with him from thence some fine stones, which he shewed the khalîf ^m.

AFTER the death of Sheddâd, the kingdom of Ad was governed by a long series of princes, of whom the Oriental historians deliver many particulars, that have no great appearance of truth. The Adites in process of time falling from the worship of the true God into idolatry, God sent the prophet Hûd, supposed to be the same with Heber, to preach to and reclaim them. But they refusing to acknowledge his mission, or to obey him, God sent a hot and suffocating wind, which blew seven nights and eight days without intermission, and entering at their nostrils, past through their bodies, and destroyed them all, a very few only excepted, who had listened to Hûd, and retired with him to another place. Others relate, that before this terrible destruction they had been previously chastised with a three years drought; and therefore sent Kail Ebn Itbar, and Moribed Ebn Saad, with seventy other principal men, to Mecca, then in the hands of the tribe of Amalek, whose prince was Moâwiyah Ebn Becr, to obtain of God some rain. Kail, continue these authors, having begged of God, that He would send rain to the people of Ad, three clouds appeared, a white one, a red one, and a black one; and a voice from heaven ordered him to chuse which he would. Kail failed not to make choice of the last, thinking it to be loaden with the most rain; but when this cloud came over them, it proved to be fraught with the divine vengeance, and a tempest broke forth from it which destroyed them all. Some authors affirm, that Lokmân king of the Adites, after his subjects had been afflicted with a drought for four years, to incline them to hearken to the preaching of Hûd, and brought to the very brink of destruction, went with sixty others to Mecca to beg rain; which they not obtaining, Lokmân with some of the company stayed there, and by this means escaped being involved in the common calamity. They farther relate of this Lokmân, that his life was extended by God to the length of those of seven eagles, each of the six last of which was hatched the instant its predecessor expired. The few Adites with Lokmân that survived their countrymen, gave rise to a tribe called the latter Ad, who were afterwards changed into monkeys. Hûd returned into Hadramaut, and was buried near Hafec, where there is a small town now standing called Kabr Hûd, or the sepulchre of Hûd. When the Arabs would signify the high antiquity of any thing, they say as old as king Ad, in like manner as the Greeks, when they would express any thing extremely antient, made it coeval with Chronus, or Saturn, and Ogyges ⁿ.

Thamûd.

THE tribe of Thamûd were the posterity of Thamûd the son of Gather or Gither, the son of Aram, who falling into idolatry, the prophet Sâleh was sent to bring them back to the worship of the true God. M. Bochart takes this prophet to be Pbaleg, and M. D'Herbelot Salab the son of Arphaxad, and father of Heber or Hûd. The learned Mr. Sale determines in favour of M. Bochart, because, says he, the prophet Sâleh lived between the time of Hûd and of Abraham. On the contrary, ^f we own ourselves of M. D'Herbelot's opinion, because the identity of names is a stronger argument in favour of that opinion, than any small inaccuracy in chronology of the Arab historians can be against it. Besides, it does not appear from any Oriental author, that the prophet Sâleh did actually live between the times of Hûd and Abraham, as Mr. Sale suggests; nay, Mr. Sale himself disproves this, when he cites with approbation an eastern author making him later than Abraham. Some few

- a of the Thamudites received Sâleb as a true prophet, but the rest, as a proof of his mission, required that he should cause a she-camel big with young to come out of a rock in their presence; which having obtained of God, the camel was immediately delivered of a young one ready weaned. But instead of believing, the Thamudites cut the ham-strings of the camel, and killed her; at which act of impiety God being highly displeased, three days after struck them dead in their houses by an earthquake, and a terrible noise from heaven, which, some say, was the voice of Gabriel the archangel crying aloud, Die all of you. Jonda Ebn Amru, prince of the Thamudites, proposed this miracle to Sâleb, promising, that if it was wrought, he and his people would believe. Accordingly Jonda acknowledged the prophet's mission, but the greatest part of his subjects perished in their infidelity, as above observed. Sâleb, with those reformed by him, was saved from this destruction. The prophet afterwards went to Palestine, and from thence to Mecca, where he ended his days. This tribe first dwelt in Yaman, but being expelled thence by Hamyar the son of Saba, they settled in the territory of Hejr, in the province of Hejaz, where their habitations, cut out of the rocks, mentioned in the Koran, are still to be seen, and also the crack of the rock whence the camel issued, which, as an eye-witness hath declared, is sixty cubits wide. These houses of the Thamudites being of the ordinary proportion, are used as an argument to convince those of a mistake, who make this people to have been of a gigantic stature. They will likewise confute those commentators on the Koran, who affirm that the largest of the old Adites were an hundred cubits high, and the least of them sixty. By comparing the eastern writers with those of the ancient Greeks and Romans, we shall find, that the tribe of Thamud corresponded exactly with the Thamudeni or Tbamydeni of Diodorus, Pliny, and Ptolemy°.

- THE tribe of Tasm were the descendants of Lûd the son of Shem, and that of Tasm and Jadis a branch of the posterity of Getber, as we learn from Abulfeda. Both these tribes lived promiscuously together under the government of Tasm, till a certain tyrant made a law, that twenty maids of the tribe of Jadis should not marry, unless first deflowered by him; which the Jadisians not enduring, formed a conspiracy, and, inviting the king and chiefs of Tasm to an entertainment, privately hid their swords in the sand, and in the midst of their mirth fell on them, slew them all, and extirpated the greatest part of that tribe. However, the few who escaped obtaining aid of the king of Yaman, Dbu Habshân Ebn Akran, assaulted Jadis, and utterly destroyed them, there being scarce any mention made from that time of either of those tribes. As all the traditions relating to Tasm are reckoned of a very dubious authority, when any thing is advanced without a proper foundation to support it, the Arabs call it a story of Tasm. The notion many of the *Oriental*s have of Tasm's grand-daughter Yamama, our readers will find in the former section, where we give a short description of the province of the same name P.

- c ALL that we find delivered by the Arabs of the former tribe of Jorham is, that Jorham their ancestor was an antediluvian, and one of the eighty persons, who, according to a Mohammedan tradition, were saved with Noah in the ark¹. This tribe was cotemporary with that of Ad, and utterly perished, in a manner to us unknown.

- SOME of the Oriental authors inform us, that Amalek, the progenitor of the tribe of the same name, was the son of Eliphaz the son of Esau, though others make him the son of Ham the son of Noah. This tribe under their king Walid, the first who assumed the name of Pharaoh, before the time of Joseph, conquered Egypt, according to the eastern writers, who seem to confound the Amalikes with the Phœnician shepherds of Manetho. After they had possessed the throne of Egypt for a considerable period, they were expelled by the natives, and at last totally destroyed by the *Israelites*².

As for the tribes of Amtem, Hafhem, Abil, and Bar, all that the *Oriental*s know Amtem, Hafhem, Abil, and Bar.

of them is, that by some means or other they became extinct, most of them being a cut off, and the rest incorporating with the other tribes'.

The present
Arabs descended from Kathan and Joktan.

ACCORDING to their own historians, the present Arabs are sprung from two stocks, Kablân, the same with Joktan the son of Eber, and Adnân descended in a direct line from Ishmael the son of Abraham and Hagar (O). The posterity of the former they call al Arab al Ariba, i. e. the genuine or pure Arabs, and those of the latter al Arab al Mofâreba, i. e. naturalized or insititious Arabs, though some reckon the antient lost tribes to have been the only pure Arabians, and therefore call the descendants of Kablân also Môtareba, which word likewise signifies insititious Arabs, though in a nearer degree than Mofâreba; those acknowledging Adnân for their great ancestor, being the more distant graff. As Ishmael was by origin and language a Hebrew, it is no wonder those supposed to be descended from him should have no claim to be admitted as pure Arabs; however, since he contracted an alliance with the Jorbanites, by marrying a daughter of Modûd, accustomed himself to their manner of living and language, and became blended with them into one nation, they have certainly a right to be considered as Mofâreba. The uncertainty of the descents between Ishmael and Adnân is the reason why they seldom trace their genealogies higher than the latter, whom they therefore look upon as the father of their tribes; the descents from him downwards being pretty certain and uncontroverted. It is remarkable, that the eastern writers scarce take any notice at all of Abraham's progeny by Keturab, though they undoubtedly made up a considerable part of the inhabitants of Arabia. Their names were, Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian or Madian, Ishbak, and Shuab. Notwithstanding the Arabs affirm Ishmael's wife to have been a genuine Arabian, the Scripture says she was an Egyptian; which greatly shakes the authority of their historians, except it should be admitted, that he had a second wife, or several at once. His sons were Nebaiotb, Kedar, Adeel, Mibsam, Mishma, Dumab, Massa, Hadar, Tema, Jetur, Naphisb, and Kedemab; besides which he had a daughter called Mabalatb and Bashematb, whom Edom took to wife. Some writers make Kablân a descendant of Ishmael; but among the *Oriental*s this is not the most received opinion. However, it agrees the best with the Chaldee and Arabic paraphrasts, who believed the name of Ishmaelites to be as general and extensive as that of Arabs.

Government of the Scenite
Arabs.

WE have already observed, that the customs, manners, and genius, of the Arabs, except in matters of religion, are in effect the same at this day that they were betwixt three and four thousand years ago; and therefore we may presume, that the antient and modern forms of government of this nation may be considered as agreeing in almost all particulars. The Arabes Scenitæ, therefore, as their successors the present Bedoweens, were governed by Shekbs and Emirs. The Shekbs superintended only particular Dou-wars, that is, collections of tents called Hbymas, answering to villages or towns, already described. Every one of these Dou-wars, therefore, might have been looked upon as a little principality, governed by the chief of that particular family, which was of the greatest name, substance, and reputation, amongst the Arabs that composed it. The Emirs or Emeers, the phylarchs of the Greeks, ruled over a whole tribe, and consequently their authority extended to many of the above-

(O) As the genealogy of these tribes is of great use to illustrate the Arabian history, our readers would have judged this work incomplete, had we not here inserted the two genealogical tables of the descendants of Kablân and Ishmael, formed by the late learned and ingenious Mr. Sale from the most approved Oriental authors. In order to render that of the descendants of Ishmael the more perfect, we have added thereto the nine generations between Ishmael and Adnân, which is the most approved series of descents between them; though this, as here observed, cannot be absolutely depended upon; for Al Beihaki reckons one generation less, differing also in the names, in the following manner: Ishmael, Nabet, Tashab, Yârab, Yârah, Yâhur, al Mokawwam, Odad, Odd, Adnân, and Mohammed himself, according to a tradition of his wife Omm Salma, counted but three persons between Ishmael and Adnân, viz. Berâ, Zeid, and Odad. With the tables here exhibited, we have intermixed some few additional observations, that may tend either to illustrate or correct them, as our readers will find, by comparing them with the originals in Mr. Sale's excellent preliminary discourse. We must not forget to remark, that in the first series of descents between Ishmael and Adnân Mr. Sale has omitted Odd, which makes him run counter to the best Oriental writers, and therefore in that particular we have dissented from him.

- a mentioned Dow-wars. It is probable, that they were sometimes dignified with the title of (P) Shekh al Kibeer, as some of their successors are at this day. And lastly, from what has been observed of the Phylarchs of the Nomades, agreeing in most points with the Arabes Scenitæ, we may conclude, that the Emirs were under the domination of one particular prince, who was the sovereign of these Arabs, or at least distinguished from the other Emirs by the title of the Grand Emir, consonant to the form of government still prevailing amongst the modern Bedoueens. However, we take this prince not to have been intirely despotic, but considered by his subjects only as their supreme magistrate, who maintained them in the possession of their private laws, privileges, and customs.
- b THE Arabs that dwelt in cities and towns were undoubtedly ruled in the same manner as the Bedoueens. That many cities of Arabia Felix, particularly those of the Adramitæ or Chatramotitæ, were governed by princes of their own, we learn from Eratosthenes in Strabo. That author likewise informs us, that the order of succession in these cities was not hereditary, but that the first child born in any of the noble families after the king's accession was deemed the presumptive heir to the crown. As soon, therefore, as any prince ascended the throne, a list was taken of all the pregnant ladies of quality, who were guarded in a proper manner, till one of them was delivered of a son, who always received an education suitable to his high birth. However, Artemidorus in the same author intimates, that the Sabæan nation had only one sovereign; which manifestly implies, that all the little princes or Emirs above-mentioned had a supreme head presiding over the whole region. And that regal government prevailed here as described by Artemidorus and Eratosthenes, seems confirmed by Scripture, when the Psalmist mentions the KINGS OF ARABIA and SABA. The Arabians were for some centuries under the government of the descendants of Kâbtan; Yûrab, one of his sons, founding the kingdom of Yaman, and Jorham, another of them, that of Hejâz. The kings of Hamyar, who possessed the kingdom of Yaman, or at least the best part of it, had the general title of Tobba, which signifies successor, and was affected by these princes as that of Cæsar was by the Roman emperors, and Khalif by the successors of Mohammed. There were several lesser princes, who reigned in other parts of Yaman, and were mostly, if not altogether, subject to the king of Hamyar, whom they called the great king; but of these history has recorded nothing remarkable, or that may be depended upon. May you avert all malediction, or May God be propitious to you, was the form in which the antient Arabs used to address themselves to their king.
- d

THE principal civil institutions among the Arabs, that seemed to wear the face of laws, were the following: 1. That establishing the above-mentioned order of succession. 2. That in force among the Sabæans, whereby the king was solemnly invested with his prerogative by an assembly of the people. 3. That injoining the said king never to go out of his palace after he had taken upon him the reins of government. 4. That commanding his subjects to stone him to death, in case he should be found guilty of a violation of the former law. 5. That obliging them to an absolute and implicit obedience to all his commands, consistent with the aforesaid fundamental condition. As the other political maxims the Arabs observed may be considered as coinciding with their customs, there is no necessity of touching upon them here.

THE religion of the Arabs before Mohammed, which they call the state of ignorance, was chiefly gross idolatry; the Sabian religion having almost over-run the whole nation, though there were also great numbers of Christians, Jews, and Ma-

gians, amongst them. The idolatry of the Arabs, as Sabians, chiefly consisted in worshipping the fixed stars and planets, and the angels and their images, which they honoured as inferior deities, and whose intercession they begged, as their mediators with God. For they acknowledged one supreme God, the creator and lord of the universe, whom they called Allah Taâla, the most high God; and their other deities, who were subordinate to him, they called simply Al Ilahât, i. e. the goddesses. "These words, says Mr. Sale, the Greeks not understanding, and it being their constant custom to resolve the religion of every other nation into their own, and find out gods of theirs to match the others, they pretended the Arabs worshipped only two deities, Orotalt and Alilat, as those names are corruptly written, whom they will have to be the same with Bacchus and Urania; pitching on the former as one of the greatest of their own gods, and educated in Arabia; and on the other, because of the veneration shewn by the Arabs to the stars." But the impertinence of this observation will be touched upon immediately¹.

Most of the Arabs Sabians.

THAT the Arabs should easily be led into the worship of the stars, is not at all surprising, since by observing the changes of the weather to happen at the rising or setting of certain of them for a considerable period, they might easily be induced to ascribe a divine power to those stars, and think themselves indebted to them for their rains, a very great benefit and refreshment to their parched country. Hence possibly it came to pass, that they had seven celebrated temples dedicated to the seven planets; one of these, in particular, called Beit Ghomdân, was built in Sanaa, the metropolis of Yaman, by Dabac, to the honour of Al Zobarab, or the planet Venus, and was demolished by the khalif Othman. By the murder of this khalif was fulfilled, as the Mohammedans pretend, the prophetic inscription, set, as is reported, over this temple, viz. Ghomdân, He who destroyeth thee, shall be slain. The temple of Mecca is also said to have been consecrated to Zobal, or Saturn. That planetary worship was the first species of idolatry, we have already observed; and therefore it is no wonder the Arabs, at present the most antient nation in the world, should have been infected with it. To what has been already offered on this head, we shall here beg leave to add the testimony of Pausanias, who intimates, that the worship of the planets was earlier than the first arrival of the Pelagî in Greece; and that before this time they had statues erected in their honour. This observation will not only illustrate, but likewise bring a fresh accession of strength to what has been advanced in a former note².

fixed stars, as well as the planets.

BUT besides those stars which were the general objects of worship throughout Arabia, there were some more peculiarly revered in particular provinces. Thus the Hamyarites chiefly worshipped the Sun; Misam, al Debarân, or the bull's eye; Lakbm and Jodâm, al Moshtari, or Jupiter; Tay, Sobail, or Canopus; Kais, Sirius, or the dog-star; and Asad, Osâred, or Mercury. Abu Cabsha, a worshipper of Sirius, whom some will have to be the same with Wabeb, Mohammed's grandfather on the mother's side, though others make him of the tribe of Kbozâab, used his utmost endeavours to persuade the Koreish to leave their images, and worship this star. For which reason, when Mohammed endeavoured also to draw them off from image-worship, they nicknamed him the son of Abu Cabsha. However, the Arabs, together with the Indians in general, paid a greater regard to the fixed stars, than to the planets; which distinguished the Sabians amongst them from those amongst the Greeks, who directed their worship to the planets. The Arabs did not only attribute their rains to the influence of the fixed stars, but likewise their winds, storms, tempests, heat, cold, and all kinds of alterations in their atmosphere. They differed, however, amongst themselves in this, that some ascribed the influence producing all the meteorological phenomena to the rising, and others to the setting, of the constellations known amongst them by the name of *Al-Anwa*³.

As likewise angels, or intelligences.

OF the angels or intelligences which they worshipped, we find only three mentioned in the Korân, viz. Allat, Al-Uzza, and Manab; these they called goddesses, and the daughters of God; an appellation they gave not only to angels, but also to their images, which they believed either to be inspired with life by God, or else to become the tabernacles of the angels, and to be animated by them; and they paid them divine honours, because they believed them to intercede for their votaries with God. The Arab Sabians likewise, in common with those of other nations, imagined, that the Sun, Moon, and fixed stars, were habitations of intelligences of a middle nature betwixt men and the Supreme Being, who actuated their orbs in the same manner as the human body does the soul; and that this was the true cause of all their motions. These beings, they had a notion, became mediators between God and them; for the necessity of a mediator they clearly discovered from the beginning, and therefore, as Gods mediators, directed divine worship to them. They first worshipped them by their tabernacles, i. e. their orbs themselves; but these, by their rising and setting, being as much under the horizon as above, they were at a loss how to address themselves to them in their absence. To remedy this defect, they had recourse to the invention of images, in which, after their consecration, they thought these inferior deities to be as much present by their influence, as in the stars themselves; and that all addresses to them were rendered as effectual before the one, as before the other. And this may be considered as the origin of image worship. All other material particulars relating to the Sabians, omitted here, will either be found in note (Q), or the first volume of this history^a.

(Q) The Sabian, Jewish, and Christian religions, are the only religions tolerated by the Korân. We are told, that the eastern writers vary greatly in their notions of the religious tenets of the first sect; though those here mentioned seem to be attested by the best of them. The Sabians produce many strong arguments for the unity of God, and address themselves to Him in the following terms: I dedicate myself to thy service, O GOD! I dedicate myself to thy service, O God! Thou hast no companion, except thy companion, of whom thou art absolute master, and of whatever is his. From whence it appears, that they suppose idols not to be sui juris, though they offer sacrifices and other offerings to them, as well as to God, who was also formerly often put off with the least portion, as Mohammed upbraids them. The reason assigned by them for this was, that the idol wanted what was God's, but GOD HIMSELF wanted nothing. A sort of baptism they admit, and profess a great veneration for St. John Baptist, styling themselves, in their language, which is composed of the Chaldee and Syriac, Mendai Jahin, i. e. Disciples of St. John; and by this name they go amongst the Christians of the Levant. Besides the book of Psalms, the only true Scripture they read, they have another supposed to have been wrote by Adam, which they regard as their bibles, whose language almost intirely agrees with the Chaldee, but the characters differ from those of all other nations. Ebn Shonah makes them the descendants of the most antient people in the world, and intimates, that besides the books just mentioned, they have others esteemed equally sacred, particularly one full of moral discourses, denominated by them the book of Seth and Enoch, or, as they name him, Edris. They are obliged to pray three, or, according to others, seven times a day; the first half an hour, or less, before sun-rise, ordering it so that they may, just as the sun rises, finish eight adorations, each containing three prostrations: the second prayer they end at noon, when the sun begins to decline, in laying of which they perform five such adorations as the former; and the same they do the third time, concluding just as the sun sets. They are very fervent in their devotions. They fast three times a year, the first time thirty days, the next nine, and the last seven. They offer many sacrifices, but eat no part of them, burning them all. They abstain from beans, garlick, and some other pulse and vegetables. As to the Sabian Kella, or part to which they turn their faces in praying, authors greatly differ; one affirming it to be the north, another the south, a third Mecca, and a fourth the star to which they pay their devotions. They have a great respect for the temple of Mecca, as also the pyramids, in the third of which they believe Sabi, the author of their religion, lies buried. They go on pilgrimage to Harran, either out of regard to the memory of Abraham, or of Sabi Ebn Mari, who lived in Abraham's time, and is looked upon by some as the first propagator of their religion. Ebn Hazem asserts Sabianism to have been the universal religion till the age of Abraham, from whence all the succeeding sects were derived. According to Al-Sharestani, the Sabians say, that the difference betwixt them and the Mohammedans consists in this, that among creatures they give the preference to spirits, angels, or intelligences moving the celestial orbs; whereas the Mohammedans chuse to pay the greatest honour to body and matter, i. e. men; as prophets, patriarchs, &c. Housain Vaez, in his Persic commentary on the Korân, says, that they were a sort of Sadducees, not believing a future state. We must not omit observing, that at the pyramids they sacrificed a cock and a black calf, and offered up incense. Ebn Khalecan, in his life of Ibrahim al Sabi, affirms, that the Sabians are as antient as the Magians, but different from them; however, that both of them pretended to deduce their origin from Abraham, whom they confounded with Zerdusht. The same author relates, that the word Sabi in the Arabic tongue denotes one who leaves the religion of his forefathers, and introduces a new one; for which reason the Korish, by way of reproach, called Mohammed Sabi, or Sabian. The eastern Christians scruple not to affirm, that Constantine the great himself professed Sabianism before he became a convert to Christianity. Sharestani divides the Sabians into two sects, those that worship the stars, and those that worship images. The first maintain, that God created the world, but has commanded his servants

Allat. Allat, whom some of the Arabs called Allab, was the idol of the tribe of Tbakif,^a who dwelt at Tayef, and had a temple consecrated to her in a place called Nakblab. We shall see more of this deity hereafter, when we come to the modern history of Arabia, especially that part of it which relates to the transactions wherein Mohammed was more immediately concerned^b.

Al-Uzza. Al-Uzza, or Al-Ozza, was the idol of the tribes of Koreish and Kenanab, and part of the tribe of Salim, as some affirm; but a tree called the Egyptian thorn, or Acacia, worshipped by the tribe of Ghatfan, first consecrated by one Dbâlem, who built a chapel over it named Bos, so contrived, as to give a sound when any one entered, according to others. When Kbâled Ebn Walid, by Mohammed's order, had demolished the chapel, cut down the image, or tree, and slain the priests of Al Uzza, Mohammed, alluding to the death of the priests, said, she was Al Uzza, who therefore will never hereafter be worshipped. The name Uzza is derived from the root azza, and signifies the most mighty^c.

Manab. Manab was the object of worship of the tribes of Hodhail and Kbozâab, possibly the Caljanitæ of Ptolemy, who dwelt between Mecca and Medina, and, as some say, of the tribes of Awis, Kbazraj, and Tbakif also. Dr. Pocock renders it highly probable, that the Manab of the Arabs was the Meni of the prophet Isaiah. This idol was a large stone, demolished by one Saad in the eighth year of the Hejra, so fatal to the idols of Arabia. The name seems derived from mana, to flow, from the flowing of the blood of the victims sacrificed to the deity; whence the valley of Mina, near Mecca, had also its name, where the pilgrims at this day slay their sacrifices. Some take Meni, or Manab, to be the name of a constellation; which notion is favoured by the most obvious signification of the word Manab in the Arabic tongue^d.

Wadd, Sawâ, Yaghûth, Yaûk, and Nafr. BESIDES these, we find five antediluvian idols taken notice of by the Arabian writers, viz. Wadd, Sawâ, Yaghûth, Yaûk, and Nafr. They are said to have been men of great repute and piety in their time, whose statues the Arabs at first revered with a civil honour only, which in process of time became heightened to a divine worship^e.

Wadd. Wadd was supposed to represent the heaven, and was worshipped under the form of a man by the tribe of Calb, in Dawmat al Yandal. For a further account of him, we must refer our readers to the authors here cited^f.

Sawâ. Sawâ was adored under the shape of a woman by the tribe of Hamadan, or, as others write, of Hodhail in Robat. This idol, lying under water for some time after the deluge, was at length, as the Arab writers assert, discovered by the devil, and worshipped by those of Hodhail, who instituted pilgrimages to it^g.

Yaghûth. Yaghûth was an idol in the shape of a lion, and was the deity of the tribe of Madbaj, and others, who dwelt in Yaman. Its name seems to be derived from ghatba, which signifies to help^h.

vants to pay great regard to the stars, and to turn themselves towards those luminous bodies whenever they pray; the other, that, by the mediation of images, they have access to the stars, and, through the assistance of those intellectual agents informing them, to the Supreme Being. They all believe, that the souls of wicked men will be punished for 9000 ages, but that afterwards they shall be received to mercy. Their feasts in general they have appointed upon the days when the exaltations of the planets happen; but the greatest of them, in particular, upon the day that the sun enters Aries, which, with them, is the first day of the year, when they all wear their best cloaths. They celebrate the feast of every planet in a chapel dedicated to him, and derive their religion from Noah himself. The Sabians of mount Lebanon seem to pay a greater regard to Seth, than the Supreme Being; for they always keep their oath when they swear by the former, but frequently break it when they swear by the latter. They likewise maintain, that once in 36425 years there will be a complete revolution in all mundane things. They endeavour to perfect themselves in the four intellectual virtues; God they call God of gods, and Lord of lords; but those intelligences supposed to actuate the stars gods and lords. This sect say, they took the name of Sabians from the above-mentioned Sabi, though it seems rather to be derived from שבי Saba, or Tsaba, the host of heaven, which they worship. Before the growth of Christianity and Mohammedanism, the greatest part of the world professed the Sabian religion. The other particulars, relating to this sect, our readers will find, either in a former part of this work, or in the authors here referred to (16).

- a Yaûk the tribe of Morâd esteemed as their proper object of worship, or, according to others, that of Hamadan, under the figure of a horse. The name Yaûk probably comes from their verb âka, to prevent, or avert¹ (R).

Nar seems to have been the proper deity of the tribe of Hamyar, whom we may Nasr. consider either as the Homerita or Hamirai of Pliny, or adored at Dhû'l Kbalaab in their territories, under the image of an eagle, which the name signifies^k.

- b THE four deities Sakia, Hâjedba, Râzeka, and Salema, were peculiar to the tribe Sakia, Hâjedba, Râzeka, and Salema. of Ad. The first supplied them with rain, the second preserved them from all dangers abroad, the third provided food for their sustenance, and the fourth restored them to health when afflicted with sickness; according to the signification of their several names. To these may be added Al-Laizan, or Saturn, a most antient Arab idol, Hbebar, Al-Auf, &c. mentioned by Al-Jaubarius, Al-Firauzabadius, and others^l.

- c As image-worship in some measure proceeded from the deification of dead men, who had been the authors of some signal advantages and benefits to the people they governed, or else greatly famed for their conquests, as well as the cause above-mentioned, it is no wonder the Arabs, as well as other nations, should fall into it. Sir Izaak Newton takes hero worship, or the worship of deified dead men, to have been no older than the age of Sesac, the great Egyptian conqueror so often mentioned, who ordered all the nations he conquered, and amongst the rest a good part of the Arabians at least, to pay divine honours to his father Ammenemes, or Ammon, under the name of Jupiter, or Jupiter Ammon. This therefore was the great hero-god of the Arabs, as well as of the Egyptians, Garamantes, Ethiopians, Indians, &c. and his son and successor, Sesac, who enjoined this worship, the Bacchus, according to Sir Izaak Newton, of the antients, little inferior to him. The Arabs, it is probable, set up oracles to Ammon, who reduced at least a good part of their country, as well as the Libyans and Egyptians; and Sesac, on account of his having coasted Arabia Felix, sailed to the Persian gulph, penetrated afterwards into India, where he erected two pillars on two mountains near the mouth of the Ganges, and another at Dire, a promontory of Ethiopia, was, according to very good authors, esteemed as his father's colleague in Arabia, as well as the other regions subjugated by him. This, considering the authorities on which it is founded, is a much stronger proof in favour of the Arabs really worshipping Jupiter and Bacchus, or Ammon and Sesac, than what Mr. Sale has offered, from the supposed vanity and ignorance of the Greeks, is to evince the Arab worship of those deities to be purely imaginary. Nay, we may venture to add, that could he have produced a whole volume of Arab traditions, stuffed as they are with fables and absurdities, in support of his opinion, it would not have mended the matter; especially as he gives up the main point, by allowing Bacchus to have been educated in Arabia. For this concession, though the thing granted is false, must be deemed a sufficient reason, on his part, for the Arabs to have paid divine honours to so celebrated a personage as Bacchus, as well as his father Jupiter, or Jupiter Uranius = (S).

We must not omit observing here, that the antient Arabs, in order to shew the high veneration in which they had their idols, reckoned it glorious to be accounted their servants and votaries; which they demonstrated by the names given to their children, viz. Abd Wadd, Abd Yaghûth, Abd Manab, Abdol Uzza, &c. i. e. the servant of Wadd, the servant of Yaghûth, the servant of Manab, the servant of Uzzab, &c.^m

BESIDES the idols already mentioned, the Arabs worshipped many others, the chief of whom was Hobal, brought from Belka in Syria to Arabia by Amra Ebn Lobai, pretending it would procure them rain whenever they wanted it. According to Safioddiu, Hobal was placed without the Caaba, under the figure of a man. His

(R) It is said Yaûk was a man of great piety, and his death much regretted; whereupon the devil appeared to his friends in a human form, and, undertaking to represent him to the life, persuaded them, by way of comfort, to place his effigies in their temples, that they might have it in view when at their devotions. This was done, and seven others, of extraordinary merit, had the same honours shewn them, till at length their posterity made idols of them in earnest (17).

(S) The Arabs also worshipped Mars, according to Suidas (18).

statue was made of red agate, which having, by some accident, lost a hand, the Koreish repaired it with one of gold: he held in his hand seven arrows without heads or feathers, such as the Arabs used in divination. This idol is supposed to have been the same with the image of Abraham, found and destroyed by Mohammed in the Caaba, on his entering it, in the eighth year of the Hejra, when he took Mecca, and surrounded with a great number of angels and prophets, as inferior deities; among whom, as some say, was Ishmael, with divining arrows in his hand. Hobal, according to Al-Jannabius, was the chief of three hundred and sixty idols, a fresh one of which the Arabs might, if they thought proper, worship every day in the year. We are told, that among the idols in the Caaba was a wooden pigeon, as likewise another above that structure, to destroy which, Mohammed lifted Ali upon his shoulders. Asáf and Nayelab, the former the image of a man, the latter of a woman, were also two idols brought with Hobal from Syria, and placed the one on mount Safá, and the other on mount Merwa. They tell us, Asáf was the son of Amru, and Nayelab the daughter of Sabál, both of the tribe of Jorham, who, committing whoredom together in the Caaba, were by God converted into stone, and afterwards worshipped by the Koreish, and so much revered by them, that tho' this superstition was condemned by Mohammed, yet he was forced to allow them to visit those mountains as monuments of the divine justice. We are told, that these idols were first fixed on the mounts Safá and Merwa by one Amru in the reign of Sapor or Sabur surnamed Dil Eñaf, king of Persia; but this notion has been overthrown by Abulfeda. As for the idols Saad, an oblong stone on the shore near Giódá, Soair or Sair worshipped by the tribe of Anza, Aud adored by the tribe of Beer Wayel, Nasb or Nosb, Al-Sbarek, from whence the Arab name Abdol-Sbarek was derived, Dar, whence Abdol-Dar, Madan, Yalil, Awal peculiar to the tribes of Beer and Taglab, Dul Casfain the deity of the tribe of Daus, Bajar or Bajer that of the tribe of Azd, Al-Okaisar worshipped in the eastern part of Syria, Bag or Bagb, from whence Abulfeda deduces the name of the city Baghdad, Al-Chalasab, Dushshara, the Dysares of the Greeks and Romans, &c. it is sufficient just to have mentioned them. Besides these, according to the Oriental authors, every housekeeper had his household god, which he last took leave of, and first saluted at his going abroad, and returning home.

idols stones.

SEVERAL of the Arab idols, besides Saad above-mentioned, and Manab in particular, were no more than large rude stones, the worship of which the posterity of Ishmael first introduced, according to Al-Jannabius. To us it seems most probable, that these great stones were the first public places of divine worship amongst the Arabs, on which they poured wine and oil, as Jacob did upon the stones that served him for a pillow, when he saw his vision. Afterwards they might worship these stones themselves, as the Phanicians, in all probability, did; but this has already been touched upon. Some authors relate, that when the territory of Mecca grew too strait for the Ishmaelites, so that great numbers of them found themselves obliged to look out for new habitations, those that departed from Mecca took with them some of the stones of that reputed holy land; and at first only compassed them out of devotion, as they had accustomed to do the Caaba. But this at last ended in rank idolatry, the said Ishmaelites forgetting the religion, left them by their father, so far, as to pay divine honours to any fine stone they met with. To the idols already mentioned we may add another peculiar to the tribe of Hanifa, which was nothing more than a lump of dough. This they never presumed to eat, till they were compelled to it by famine.

Magian religion in Arabia.

THE Persians, by their vicinity to, and frequent intercourse with, the Arabians, introduced the Magian religion among some of their tribes, particularly that of Tamim, a long time before Mohammed, who was so far from being unacquainted with it, that from it he borrowed many of his own institutions. The professors of this religion acknowledged the world to have been created by God, as their successors do at this day: but, being at a loss otherwise to account for the origin of evil, they held two principles, a good Dæmon or God, and an evil one. The first they

a supposed the author of all good, and the other of all evil, believing them to be represented by light and darkness, as their truest symbols, and that of the composition of these two all things in the world are made. The good principle or God they named Yezad or Yezdân, and Ormозd or Hormizda, which the Greeks wrote Oromazes; and the evil Dæmon they called Abârîman or Abrîman, and the Greeks Arimanius. Though one sect of the Magi asserted, as the Manichæans and other heretics did, both those principles to have existed from all eternity, yet they were reputed heterodox; the original doctrine being, that the good principle or God only was eternal, and the other created, as appears from Zoroastres's description of the supreme BEING. Amongst other tenets they maintained, that there were good and bad angels; the former guarding and protecting men from evil, and the latter instigating them to all kinds of wickedness. They also believed, that the wicked angels, after they had drawn men out of the paths of virtue, became the instruments of their punishment; and that these angels were continually meditating the ruin and destruction of mankind. As for Zoroastres, or Zerdusht, as the Persians called him, he made no alterations in the doctrinal and fundamental points of the Magian religion, but only abolished some superstitious rites and practices, that had crept in amongst the professors of it, who, according to Dr. Hyde, constantly adhered to the worship of the true God, as they received it from their great ancestors Sbem and Elam. But, as so ample an account has already been given of the Magi, and their system of religion, we shall expatiate no farther on this head; but conclude it with observing, that whether we consider the Arabs as Sabians or followers of Zerdusht, it must be allowed, that they held the existence of Dæmons, Genii, or middle intelligences, influencing the affairs of the world: a truth indeed near as extensive as the belief of a God, and acknowledged by the antient heathen of almost all denominations ¹.

HOWEVER, some of the pagan Arabs believed neither a creation past, nor a resurrection to come, attributing the origin of things to nature, and their dissolution to age. Others allowed both; among whom were those, who, when they died, had their camel tied by their sepulchre, and so left without meat or drink to perish, and accompany them to the other world, lest they should be obliged, at the resurrection, to go on foot, which was reckoned very scandalous. Some believed a metempsychosis, and that of the blood, near the dead person's brain, was formed a bird named Hâmab, which once in a hundred years visited the sepulchre; though others say, this bird is animated by the soul of him that is unjustly slain, and continually cries Oscûni, Oscûni, i. e. Give me to drink, meaning of the murderer's blood, till his death be revenged; and then it flies away. Some of the antient Arabs seem to have been addicted to augury, since they held an owl in great abhorrence, as imagining that it always brought ill news, and portended something bad. The camel above-mentioned furnished the Arabs with a proverb, which they applied to all people doomed to a miserable end. Those, who expected a future judgment, adored idols, as they pretended, that they might be hereby induced to intercede for them with God hereafter. It appears probable from some passages of the Korân, and the commentators on those passages, that the antient Arabs, under the word Jin or Genii, comprehended both angels, good as well as bad, and that intermediate species of rational invisible beings going amongst the present Orientals by the same name. From the same passages and commentators we may likewise infer, that most of the Arabians before Mohammed's time, in conformity to the Sabian scheme, paid religious honours to these Genii. The Mohammedans call the evil principle of the Magi, the Satan of the Scripture, and Sammaïl of the Jews, Eblis, which seems to be a corruption of the Διδβολα or Diabolus of the New Testament ².

Abu Carb Asad king of Yaman, about seven hundred years before Mohammed, is said to have introduced Judaism among the idolatrous Hamyarites. The Jews likewise, who fled in great numbers into Arabia after the destruction of their country by the Romans, made proselytes of several tribes, those of Kanânab, al Hareth Ebn Caaba, and Kendab in particular. In time, therefore, they became very powerful, and possessed themselves of several towns and fortresses. At last one Yusef, surnamed Dbu Nowás, king of Yaman, having raised a terrible persecution against all who would not turn Jews, putting them to death by various tortures, the most common of which was throwing them into a glowing pit of fire, from whence the Arabs gave him the opprobrious title of the lord of the pit, Caleb or Elefbaan king of Ethiopia, to revenge the massacre of the christians at Najrán, put an end to Judaism, and the kingdom of the Hamyarites, in Yaman, at the same time. This happened in the reign of the emperor Justin, as has been already related in the history of the Ethiopians, and will be more fully set forth in the following section^a.

christianity.

WHETHER St. Paul preached in any part of Arabia, properly so called, we cannot pretend to determine; but that the christian religion was planted very early in this country, will not admit of a dispute. The Arabians we find ranked amongst those nations, some of whose members first had the happiness of being made converts to christianity, several of them being present when the HOLY GHOST first descended upon the apostles. When the eastern church, soon after the beginning of the third century, was greatly harassed by disorders and persecutions, vast numbers of christians sought for shelter in Arabia; who being for the most part of the Jacobite communion, that sect generally prevailed among the Arabs. The principal tribes that embraced christianity were Hamyar, Ghassân, Rabiâ, Tagblab, Babrâ, Tonúch, part of those of Tay and Kodâa, the inhabitants of Najrán, and the Arabs of Hira. The people of Najrán became converts to christianity in the time of Dbu Nowás above-mentioned, and those of Hira received a great accession by several tribes, who fled thither for refuge from the persecution of that prince. How Al-Nooman, surnamed Abu-Kabús, king of Hira, who was slain a few months before Mohammed's birth, came to profess himself a christian, and brought off with him from paganism the whole nation he governed, will be hereafter related. According to Abulfeda, his grandfather Mondar embraced christianity, and built several churches for the christians in Hira. Safioddin says, that Najrán was a bishop's see, and remarkable for having a christian church in early times. From Shabrestani we learn, that Mondar king of the Arabs declared war against the emperor Justinian, because he had treated ill those who asserted only one nature in Christ, since the Arab christians at that time were of the Jacobite persuasion. This is a sufficient proof, that christianity had got footing in Arabia before the reign of that prince. The Jacobites give out, and M. Asseman thinks it probable, that the Syrian bishop Jacobus Baradaeus, who, according to Abulpharagius, visited all the regions adjacent to Syria, and ordained there bishops, presbyters, &c. of the Jacobite sect, first infected the Arabian christians with Monophysism. How our Saviour appeared in the air, surrounded with rays of glory, walking on a purple cloud, to the Jews of Hamyar, who had challenged some neighbouring christians to a public disputation about Dbu Nowás's time, our readers will be informed when we come towards the close of this history^b.

Bishopricks in Arabia.

It is natural to suppose, that as the christians were so numerous in Arabia before the age of Mohammed, they had several bishops there, when that impostor first began to form a new system of religion. Accordingly we find, that the Jacobites had two bishops of the Arabs subject to their Masriân, or metropolitan of the east. One of these was styled absolutely the bishop of the Arabs, whose seat was for the most part at Akula, which some authors make the same with Cusâ, others a different town near Baghdâd. The other had the title of the bishop of the Scenite Arabs, of the tribe of Tbaalab in Hira or Hirta, as the Syrians call it, and seated in that city. Gregentius, who held a famous dispute sub dio for three days with Herbanus the Jew, before the king of Hamyar, was bishop or archbishop of Dbasâr or Tepbra, as it is called by the Greek authors, in the century preceding Mohammed; and that Najrán

a also was a bishop's see at the same time, has been already observed from Safioddin. We find likewise, a prelate of this country styled the bishop of the Tayites, though the extent and limits of his diocese cannot so easily be defined. The Nestorians had but one bishop, who presided over both the dioceses of Hira and Akula, and was immediately subject to their patriarch. Arabia was in the earliest ages famous for heresies, which might, as Mr. Sale observes, be in some measure attributed to the liberty and independency of its tribes. The specification of these heresies will more properly fall under our province in the modern history of the Arabs, when we shall enumerate the principal causes, that concurred to favour the propagation of the Mohammedan religion ^a.

b BEFORE we conclude our account of the religion, or rather religions, of the ancient Arabs, we must observe, that some of them attributed a power to the fixed stars superior to what even the Sabians themselves allowed; insomuch that they would not take the least step without receiving a favourable omen from them. Several of them also not only worshipped Dæmons or Genii, but likewise asserted them to be the daughters of God. The Koreish were infected with Zendicism, an error nearly related to that of the Sadducees among the Jews. We are told, that several of this tribe worshipped one God, and differed from all the other religions of the country, before the time of Mohammed ^w.

Other sects in Arabia different from those already mentioned.

As the Arabs are one of the most antient nations in the world, having inhabited the country they at present possess almost from the deluge, without intermixing with other nations, or being subjugated by any foreign power, their language must have been formed soon after, if not at the confusion of Babel. The two principal dialects of it were that spoken by the Hamyarites and other genuine Arabs, and that of the Koreish, in which Mohammed wrote the Korân. The first is styled by the Oriental writers the Arabic of Hamyar, and the other the pure or defecated Arabic. As Yarab, grandfather to Hamyar, is supposed by the Oriental writers to have been the first whose tongue deviated from the Syriac to the Arabic, the Hamyaritic dialect, according to them, must have approached nearer to the purity of the Syriac, and consequently have been more remote from the true genius of the Arabic, than that of any other tribe. The dialect of the Koreish, termed by the Korân the perspicuous and clear Arabic, is referred to Ishmael as its author, who, say the above-mentioned writers, first spoke it, and, as Dr. Pocock believes, after he had contracted an alliance with the family of Jorham by marriage, formed it of their language and the original Hebrew. As therefore the Hamyritic dialect partook principally of the Syriac, so that of the Koreish was supposed to consist chiefly of the Hebrew. But, according to Jallak'uddin, the politeness and elegance of the dialect of the Koreish ought rather to be attributed to their having, from the remotest antiquity, the custody of the Caaba, and dwelling in Mecca, the centre of Arabia. For by this situation they were not only rendered more incapable of any intercourse with foreigners, who might have corrupted their language, but likewise frequented by the Arabs of all the circumjacent country, both on a religious account, and for the composing of their differences, from whose discourse and verses they took whatever words or phrases they judged most pure and elegant; by which means the beauties of the whole tongue became transfused into this dialect. The Arabs are full of the commendations of their language, which is very harmonious, expressive, and, as they say, so immensely copious, that no man uninspired can be a perfect master of it, in its utmost extent. How much in this last article it is superior to the Greek and Latin tongues, in some measure appears from hence, that sometimes a bare enumeration of the Arabic names of one particular thing, and an explication of them, will make a considerable volume. Thus we are told, that Ebn Kbalawih, one of the most learned of the Arab grammarians, wrote a whole treatise, which consisted intirely of an interpretation of five hundred words signifying a lion; and another whose only subject was a collection of two hundred words denoting a serpent. Mohammedes Al-Firauzabadius, author of the great Arabic lexicon called Kamus, or the Ocean, relates, that he composed a piece, containing a description of the nature and advantages of boney, together with an explication of eighty different terms by which it was styled; and yet that it had several other names. He likewise mentions another of his books, wherein he had enumerated above a thousand words expressive only of a sword. Notwithstanding which, the Arabs believe the greatest part of their language to be lost; which will not seem improbable, when we consider how late the art of writing became generally practised amongst them. For though it was known to Job, their countryman, to the Edomites, as well as the other Arabian nations bordering upon Egypt and Phœnicia, and to the Hamyarites many centuries before Mohammed, as appears from some antient monuments, said to be remaining in their character; yet the other Arabs, and those of Mecca in particular, unless such of them as were either Jews or Christians, were to the time of Morâmer perfectly ignorant of it. It was the antient Arabic language preceding the reign of Justinian which so nearly resembled the Ethiopic; for since that time, and especially since the age of Mohammed, all the Arabic dialects have been not a little corrupted. This is now the learned language of the Mohammedans, who study it as the European Christians do the Hebrew, Greek, and Latin.

A great affinity between the antient and modern Arabic.

A VERY great affinity between the antient and modern Arabic must, however, be allowed; so great an affinity, that in substance we may pronounce them the same. Many considerable advantages flow from a knowledge of the Arabic tongue, all which may be considered as so many inducements to the study of it: but amongst these, the chief seems to be, an investigation of the true meaning of many Hebrew words, whose radices cannot be discovered in the Hebrew original of the Old Testament, though they are still preserved in the Arabic. This we might prove by an induction of particulars, did not the discussion of such a point more properly belong to the modern history of Arabia. For a complete history of the language we are now upon, as well as a full display of the elegance, beauties, and utility of it, we must refer our readers to a curious and learned piece published by the Reverend Mr. Hunt, professor of Arabic in the university of Oxford, a gentleman as well versed in the whole circle of Oriental literature as any of the present age.

Letters.

WE have just observed, that the Hamyarites were not strangers to the art of writing. The character used by them, the most antient of any peculiar to the Arabs, wherein the letters were not distinctly separate, went by the appellation of Al Mosnad, from the mutual dependency of its letters or parts upon one another. This was neither publicly taught, nor suffered to be used, without permission first obtained. Could we depend upon what Al-Firauzabadius relates from Ebn Hashem, this character must have been of a very high antiquity; since an inscription in it, according to the last author, was found in Yaman, as old as the time of Joseph. Be that as it will, Morâmer Ebn Morra of Anbar, a city of Irâk, who lived not many years before Mohammed, was the inventor of the present Arabic character, which Basbar the Kendian, who married the sister of Abu Sofiân, is said to have learned from those of Anbar, and to have introduced at Mecca, but a little while before the institution of Mohammedanism. Morâmer's alphabet the Oriental authors agree to have been very different from the antient one of the Hamyarites, since they distinguish the Hamyaritic and Arabic pens. In Mohammed's time the Morameric alphabet had made so small a progress, that not a soul in Yaman could either write or read it; nay, Mohammed himself was incapable of doing either; for which reason he was called the illiterate prophet. The letters of this alphabet were very rude, being either the same with, or very much like the Cuphic, which character is still found in inscriptions, and the titles of antient books; nay, for many years it was the only one used by the Arabs, the Korân itself being at first written therein. According to Khalican, the present Arabic character was first formed from the Cuphic by Ebn Moklab, Wazîr, or Visîr, to Al Moktader, Al Kaber, and Al Râdi, khâlîfs of Baghdad, who lived about three hundred years after Mohammed; and brought to great perfection by Ali Ebn Bowâb, who flourished in the following century, and whose name is yet famous among them on that account. Others, however, attribute the honour of the invention of this character to Ebn Moklab's brother, Abdallab al Hasan; and the perfecting of it to Ebn Amîd al Kûteb, after it had been reduced to near the present form by Abd' Al-

- a bamid. But the best authors contradict the last of these notions, as well as the former, by affirming, that Yakût al Mostafemi, secretary to Al Mostafem, the last of the khâ'ifs of the family of Abbas, gave the finishing hand to it, for which reason he was surnamed Al Khattat, or the scribe. In order to perpetuate the memory of Morâmer's invention, some authors call the Arabic letters al Morâmer, i. e. the progeny of Morâmer. The most remarkable specimens of the Cupbic character, so denominated from Cupha, or Cufa, a city of Irâk, where some of the first copies of the Korân were written, are the following: part of that book in it on vellum, brought from Egypt by Mr. Greaves; some other fragments of the same book in it published by Sir John Chardin; certain passages of a MS. in the Bodleian library; the legends on several Saracenic coins dug up about twenty years ago on the coast of the Baltic, not far from Dantzick; and, according to Mr. professor Hunt, those noble remains of it that are, or were lately, to be seen in Mr. Joseph Ames's valuable collection of antique curiosities. As to the true origin of the antient and modern Arabic alphabets, we must own ourselves pretty much in the dark. However, that very learned and profound orientalist Mr. Schultens, seems not very remote from truth, when he deduces the letters, of which they consist, from the most antient Hebrew or Assyrian.

- b In order to give our readers a clearer idea of what that learned gentleman has advanced on this head, we shall here insert both the antient and modern Arabic alphabets, together with that of the African Saracens published by Kircher, which seems to be the old Hamyaritic character mentioned by Al-Firauzabadius, Al-Jannabius, Ebn Kbalicân, and Georgius Ebn Amid, under the title of Al Mofnad. As the Persians were neighbours to the Arabs, and of the same religion with part of them, before the time of Mohammed, we have thought proper here likewise to give them the old Persic alphabet (S), which, we doubt not, they will look upon as a very agreeable curiosity.

It appears, from comparing the old Persic and modern Arabic alphabets, that the following letters of the latter are wanting in the former, viz. ح ه ث. Now Ludovicus de Dieu, in his Persic grammar, observes, that the true Persic words have scarce ever any of these letters in them. It is observable, likewise, that the Arabic characters, which the Persians adopted in the reign of Jezdegerd, do not always answer the sounds they represent, so well as the old Persic letters did. In proof of which, it will be sufficient to produce the two following instances.

THOUGH by far the greatest part of the Arabs before Mohammed could neither read nor write, every one of which went under the denomination of Al Ommio; yet several of them became famous for their eloquence, and a perfect skill in their own tongue. Herein they exercised themselves by composing of orations and poems. Their orations were of two sorts, metrical and prosaic, the one being compared to pearls strung, and the other to loose ones. They endeavoured to excel in both, and whoever was able in an assembly to persuade the people to a great enterprize, or dissuade them from a dangerous one, or gave them other wholesome advice, was honoured with the title of Kbâteb, or orator, which is now given to the Mohammedan preachers. They called an oration giving a detail of some glorious achievements, delivered from the rostra, Kbôitab, according to Al-Barezi, a word of the same origin with Kbâteb above-mentioned. From what we find in several authors, they pursued a method very different from that of the Greek and Roman orators; their sentences being like loose gems, without connection; so that this sort of composition struck the audience chiefly by the fulness of the periods, the elegance of the expression, and the acuteness of the proverbial sayings (T). So persuaded were they of their excelling in this way, that they would not allow any nation to understand the art of speaking in public, except themselves and the Persians; which last were reckoned much inferior in that respect to the Arabians. Two of the ancient Arabs, who immortalized their names by their eloquence, were Koss and Sabban, of the tribe of Wayel. Hence came the proverbs, More expert in the art of speaking than Koss, and More eloquent than SABBAN. To their poetry they seem to have been chiefly indebted, for the polishing, and even preservation, of their language, before the use of letters was introduced amongst them; for which reason their authors generally consider this and the study of their language together. In their poems, likewise, were preserved the distinction of descents, the rights of tribes, and the memory of great actions. An excellent poet, therefore, reflected an honour on his tribe, so that as soon as any one began to be admired for his performances of this kind in a tribe, the other tribes sent publicly to congratulate them on the occasion, and

(T) Now we are speaking of the Arab literature, our readers will expect some account of the fabulist Lokmán, so famous over all the east. Lokmán, surnamed Al Hakím, i. e. the wise, or the sage, according to Saddi, Akramas, and Schaub, was endued with the gift of prophecy, which came to him by succession, he having been the son or grandson of a sister or aunt of Job. The author of Tafsir makes him the son of Baura, or Béor, the son of Nabor, the son of Terah, and consequently related to Abraham. Aboulis gives Lokmán the surname of Abou Anam, i. e. the father of Anam, though others call his son Mathan. The author of the book intitled Ain al mani says, he was born in the time of David, and lived till the age of Yusuf; but this exceeds all belief. According to the description of his person by the Arab writers, he must have been deformed enough; for they say he was an Ethiopian or Nubian slave, and consequently of a black complexion, with thick lips, and splay feet. But in return he received from God wisdom and eloquence in a great degree, which some pretend were given him in a vision, on his making choice of wisdom preferably to the gift of prophecy, either of which were offered him. The generality of the Mohammedans therefore hold him to have been no prophet, but only a sage or wise man. Others relate, that when God, in order to reward his transcendent piety, offered to make him his vicegerent on earth, he chose rather to remain in the condition of a slave, though with an intire resignation to the divine will, begging that God would enable him to execute all His orders, in case He thought proper to fix him in so sublime a post. This, continue the same authors, so exceedingly pleased God, that he made him superior to all other men in wisdom; insomuch that he wrote ten thousand proverbs and fables, for the instruction of mankind. From several authors it appears, that he lived in the reigns of David and Solomon, and that by nation he was an Ethiopian, sold to the Israelites, but by religion a Jew. The author of Tarikh Moutakhab affirms, that the sepulchre of Lokmán was to be seen in his time at Ramlah or Ramah, near Jerusalem; and that he was interred near seventy prophets, who had been starved by the Jews, and all died in one day. He is said to have obtained his liberty on the following occasion: His master having one day given him a bitter melon to eat, he paid him such exact obedience as to eat it all; at which his master being surprised, asked him how he could eat so nauseous a fruit? To which he replied, it was no wonder, that he should for once accept a bitter fruit from the same hand, from which he had received so many favours. Our readers will naturally observe, that Lokmán, who lived in the time of the prophet Hud, or Hiber, could not be the same person with the fabulist here mentioned.

As most of the particulars relating to the person of Lokmán here recited, as well as the quick repartees of which he is made the author by the commentators on the Korán, agree so well with what Maximus Planudes has written of Æsop, these two sages are generally thought to have been the same person. The great resemblance the fables of Lokmán bear to those of Æsop is an additional argument in favour of this notion. We are inclined to believe, that Planudes borrowed great part of his life of Æsop from the traditions he met with in the east concerning Lokmán, and concluded these two persons to have been the same from the circumstances above-mentioned. That the fables attributed to Æsop were of Oriental extraction, cannot well be denied, since they favour much more of the genius of the *Oriental*s than of that of the Greeks. Fable or apologue was of a very high antiquity in the east, and even the countries bordering on Arabia, if not in Arabia itself; as may be learned from the noble example of this form of instruction in the speech of Jorham to the men of Shechem, which was made near two hundred years before the time of Lokmán, supposing him to have been cotemporary with David. In fine, we are disposed to think, that the Arab traditions concerning the wisdom of Lokmán were only corruptions of some passages of Scripture relating to Solomon king of Israel, especially if we admit the queen of Sheba to have been a Nubian or Ethiopian. This will appear at least probable, from 1 Kings c. iii. ver. 9—13. c. iv. ver. 30—34. compared with what has been already observed of Lokmán from the eastern writers. The generality of these writers make Lokmán cotemporary with David and Solomon, and of the same religion with those princes; which adds no small weight to our opinion. As for the deformity of his person, that might have been introduced by them, in order to set off to the greater advantage, by such a contrast, the excellency of his wisdom. We must not omit observing, that the thirty-first chapter of the Korán, from whence several hints relating to our sage may be drawn, is intitled LOKMAN; nor that some fables going under his name have been published by Goli, at the end of his edition of Erpenii's Arabic grammar. What is here advanced will meet with a better reception from our readers, when they have consulted Mr. D'Herbelot in the article Lokmán (19).

- a themselves made entertainments, at which the women assisted, dressed in their nuptial ornaments, singing, to the sound of timbrels, the happiness of their tribe, who had now one to protect their honour, to preserve their genealogies, and the purity of their language, and to transmit their actions to posterity. For this was all performed by their poems, to which they were solely obliged for their knowledge, and instructions, moral and oeconomic, and to which they had recourse, as to an oracle, in all doubts and differences. No wonder, then, that poetry was in such esteem among them, that they looked upon it as a great accomplishment, and a proof of ingenuous extraction, to be able to express one's self in verse with ease and elegance, on any extraordinary occurrence; nor that even in their common discourse they
- b made frequent applications of celebrated passages of their famous poets. As the Arabs considered an elegant and instructive poem as the summit of human performances, a spirit of emulation was kept up amongst their poets; in order to which, the tribes had once a year a general assembly at Ocadb, a place famous on this account, and where they kept a weekly mart or fair, which was held on our Sunday. This annual meeting lasted a whole month, during which time they employed themselves, not only in trading, but in repeating their poetical compositions, contending and vying with each other for the prize; whence the place, it is said, took its name. The poems that were judged to excel, were laid up in their king's treasuries, as were the seven celebrated poems, thence called Al Moallakât, rather than from
- c their being hung up on the Caaba, which honour they also had by public order, being written on Egyptian silk, and in letters of gold; on which account they had also the name of Al Modbababât, or the golden verses. It is worthy observation, that such a public congratulation as has been already mentioned was made only on the birth of a boy, the rise of a poet, and the fall of a foal of generous breed; which they reckoned three great points of felicity. Though poetry was of so high an antiquity amongst the Arabs, they did not at first use to write poems of any just length, but only expressed in verse occasionally; nor was their prosody digested into rules, till some time after Mohammed; for this was done, as it is said, by Al Kbalîl Ahmed al Farâbîdî, who lived in the reign of the khalîf Harûn al Rashîd. The first
- d author of a poem that consisted of thirty verses, or Al-Kasîdah, was Mohalbel. According to Al-Khalîl, there are fifteen different kinds of Arabic verse; Zamakhshari makes them sixteen, and others only eleven or twelve. Mohammed suppressed the fair and assembly at Ocadb, which occasioned poetry to decline in his time, and for some years after, the Arabs being then employed in extending their conquests; which having done, upon the return of peace this study was revived, and almost all sorts of learning encouraged, and not a little improved by them. However, this interruption occasioned the loss of most of their ancient pieces of poetry, which were then chiefly preserved by memory. The Arabian poetry agrees with the Greek and Roman in this, that it consists of Ajzac, parts corresponding with their feet; and
- e these differ, according to the different number and quantity of syllables, as the Greek and Roman feet did. The whole art of the Arab versification consists in the disposition of letters called moveable and quiescent. A moveable letter has its proper vowel; a quiescent letter one that has no vowel of its own, but is joined to the preceding letter, and with it makes one syllable. Thus, for instance, in harson, هـ (H) has its vowel (a), and therefore is moveable; but ر (R) is destitute of one, and therefore joined to the preceding هـ (H), with which it forms but one syllable. We must not here omit taking notice of the quick transitions from subject to subject in the Arab poetry, nor of the most celebrated ancient Arab poets, whose works were hung up in the Caaba, adorned in the above-mentioned manner: viz.
- f 1. Amriol Kais. 2. Tarafah. 3. Zobair. 4. Labid. 5. Antarah. 6. Al-Hareth. 7. Amru Ebn Kaltûm. Some authors, in the room of Antarah and Al-Hareth, substitute Al-Aasha and Al-Nabega. The title affixed to every copy of verses in the Caaba was, Modbababato Foblan, i. e. the golden verses of a certain poet, which are the best he ever wrote^b.

BEFORE we dismiss our present subject, it will be proper to take notice of some a few particulars relating to the chronology of the Arabs. They divided the year into twelve months, whose ancient names were, 1. Mutemer. 2. Nagir. 3. Chavan. 4. Savan. 5. Kisma. 6. Ida. 7. Asam. 8. Adil. 9. Natil. 10. Vail. 11. Varna. 12. Burec. But Kelâb, the son of Morrah, from whom Mohammed was lineally descended, having, from certain events happening in every month, given new names to them, the old ones in his time began to grow obsolete amongst the Koreish; and afterwards, by the authority of Mohammed, when he had brought all the rest of the Arab tribes under his power, were totally abolished in every part of Arabia. As Mohammed made the use of the modern names one of the distinguishing characteristics of his followers, it is no wonder they should still prevail amongst the Mohammedans. The first day of Mutemer, or Mubarram, being the first day of the year, was celebrated by the ancient kings of Yaman with great festivity and munificence, as it was likewise by the Persians, and other eastern nations. The nation we are now upon anciently divided the year also into six seasons: 1. The season of herbs, flowers, &c. 2. Summer. 3. The hot season. 4. The season of fruits. 5. Autumn, or rather the latter part of autumn. 6. Winter. That the ancient Arab year was lunifolar, has been already observed; but the custom of intercalating months, in order to make the course of the moon to agree with that of the sun, was abolished by Mohammed. The Arabs, like the Egyptians, Indians, Greeks, Romans, &c. anciently computed their time by weeks, or periods of seven days, as we learn c from a very ancient Arab poet, who died many ages before the publication of the Korân. The old names of these days are given us by that poet in the following order: 1. Euvel. 2. Babûn. 3. Gebâr. 4. Debâr. 5. Mûnis. 6. Aruba. 7. Xijâr. We have already delivered our sentiments concerning the origin of this manner of computing time, and may possibly say something farther of it, when we come to the history of the Indians b.

The sciences they chiefly cultivated.

THE sciences chiefly cultivated by the ancient Arabians were three; that of their history and genealogies, such a knowledge of the stars as to foretel the changes of weather, and the interpretation of dreams. They valued themselves extremely on account of the nobility of their families, and so many disputes happened on that d occasion, that it is no wonder, if they took great pains in settling their descents. Their knowledge of the stars was gathered from long experience, and not from any regular study, or astronomical rules. The Arabians and Indians, as has been already hinted, applied themselves to observe the fixed stars, contrary to other nations, whose observations were almost confined to the planets; and they foretold their effects from their influences, not their nature. The stars or asterisms they most usually foretold the weather by, were those they call Arwâ, or the houses of the moon. These are 28 in number, and divide the zodiac into as many parts, through one of which the moon passes every night. As some of them set in the morning, others rise opposite to them, which happens every thirteenth night; and from their e rising and setting, the Arabs, by long experience, observed what changes happened in the air; and at length came to ascribe divine power to them, saying, that their rain was from such or such a star. This expression Mohammed absolutely forbade them to use in the old sense, unless qualified in such a manner as to make the Supreme Being the director and manager of them. We find Al-Rayesh, one of the kings of Yaman, surnamed the philosopher, not so much on account of his learning, as of his great prudence, and intellectual endowments. That the Arabs understood something of physic before the time of Mohammed, appears from hence, that the famous Arabian physician Al Harith Ebn Kbalda, so celebrated amongst his countrymen, was older than that impostor. They seem to have made no farther progress in astronomy, which they afterwards cultivated with so much success and applause, than to observe f the influence of the stars upon the weather, and to give them names; which it was obvious for them to do, by reason of their pastoral way of life, lying night and day in the open plains. The names they imposed on the stars generally alluded to cattle and flocks, and they were so nice in distinguishing them, that no language has so many names of stars and asterisms as the Arabic. For though they have since borrowed the names of several constellations from the Greeks, yet the far greater part a are of their own growth, and much more antient; particularly those of the more conspicuous stars, dispersed in several constellations, and those of the lesser constellations, which are contained within the greater, and were not observed or named by the Greeks. Some of the chief of these are Auwâ in Virgo, Benât Al Nash in Urja major, Aiyûk and Al Gjdyân in Auriga, Ma'laph and Al Himarcin in Cancer, &c. To wave all other arguments in favour of the high antiquity of the names of several stars and asterisms amongst the Arabs, it will be sufficient to observe, that some of these names were prior to the time of Job; nay that, in all probability, they were coeval with the first peopling of Arabia, since from the beginning the Arabs led a pastoral life, lying altogether in the open air, and continually viewing their flocks

b and the stars; from whence it came to pass, that the first appellations, given to some of the latter, alluded to the former. Neither can we absolutely reject what has been hinted by Ricciolus, viz. that some degree of attention is due to those who believe astronomy to be as antient as Adam, and consequently that several names of stars and constellations now in use amongst the Arabs, may be supposed to precede even the deluge itself. Onirocritic, or the art of interpreting dreams, this nation had in common with the Egyptians, Chaldeans, &c. as likewise divination by arrows, and, as is probable, something of genethliacal astrology.

THAT some of the Arabs had a good degree of knowledge in several mechanical arts, appears from Strabo, who informs us, that the people of Tamna and the c adjacent provinces had magnificent temples, and elegant houses, built in the Egyptian taste. The same author likewise relates, that in Arabia Felix, besides the husbandmen, there were many artificers, and, amongst others, those who made palm-wine, which, he intimates, was much used by the Arabs. As for the exercise of arms and horsemanship, they looked upon this as one of their principal accomplishments; being obliged to practise and encourage it by reason of the independency of their tribes, whose frequent jarrings made wars almost continual amongst them, which for the most part ended in field battles. Hence it became a usual saying amongst them, that God had bestowed four peculiar things on the Arabs, viz. turbans instead of diadems, tents instead of walls and houses, swords instead of intrenchments, and d poems instead of written laws. The principal arms used by the antient Arabs were bows and arrows, darts or javelins, and broad swords or cymeters. The bows and arrows were the most antient of these, being used by Ismael himself, according to Scripture. It is probable also, that some of them were acquainted with every branch of the military art cultivated by their neighbours, the Egyptians, Syrians, and Phœnicians^d.

WITH regard to the disposition of the antient Arabs, it will be proper to remark, that they had their good and bad qualities, their excellencies and defects, as well as e people in the world to all nations, but particularly some of the Greeks. Hatem of the tribe of Tay, and Hasn of that of Fezârab, were principally famous on this account: the latter of these, we are told, fell into as great a transport of joy, when he conferred any signal favour upon a petitioner, as others did when they received such a favour. Nay, the contrary vice was so much in contempt amongst the Arabs, that a certain poet upbraids the inhabitants of Wafet, as with the greatest reproach, that none of their men had the heart to give; nor their women to deny. As a mark of their hospitable disposition, the Arabs used to light fires on the tops of hills, which in the night conducted travellers to their tents, and assured them of a kind reception. Every one of these fires they called the fire of hospitality, and the larger f and higher it was, the greater honour and glory it reflected upon the person or persons concerned in lighting it. The highest compliment that could be paid a man was, to pass an encomium upon his munificence; as that most acceptable to a woman was, to celebrate her parsimony, and her beauty. The antients likewise commend the Arabs for being exact to their words, and respectful to their kindred; and they have always been celebrated for their quickness of apprehension, and penetration, as well as the vivacity of their wit; especially those of the desert^e.

On the other hand, that the Arabs had a natural inclination to war, bloodshed, cruelty, and rapine, is acknowledged by their own writers. They had always been so much addicted to bear malice, that they scarce ever forgot an old grudge; which vindictive temper, some physicians say, ought to be attributed to their frequent feeding on camels flesh, that creature being most malicious, and tenacious of anger. And at this day the Arabs of the desert, who eat little else, are observed to be most inclined to these vices; which account, according to Mr. Sale, suggests a good reason for a distinction of meats^f.

Scenite Arabs lived chiefly upon plunder.

THAT the ancient Scenite Arabs, Ismaelites, or Nabatæans, in conformity to the divine prediction, lived upon plunder, harrassing their neighbours by continual robberies and excursions, we learn from Diodorus Siculus. That author observes, that it was in a manner impossible either to subdue or attack this nation of robbers; because they had wells digged at proper distances in their dry and barren country, known only to themselves: so that if any body of foreigners ever pursued or invaded them, they for the most part either died of thirst, or were consumed by the fatigues they found themselves obliged to sustain. Neither are their posterity less infamous at present, on account of the robberies they commit on merchants and travellers. This they are sensible of, and endeavour to excuse themselves, by alleging the hard usage of their father Ismael, who, being turned out of doors by Abraham, had the open plains and deserts given him by God for his patrimony, with permission to take whatever he could find there. This therefore, they think, authorizes them to indemnify themselves, as well as they can, not only on the posterity of Isaac, but also on every body else; always supposing a sort of kindred between themselves and those they plunder. And, in relating their adventures of this kind, they think it sufficient to change the expression, and, instead of, I robbed a man of such and such a thing, to say, I gained it. We must not, however, imagine, that they are the less honest for this among themselves, or towards those whom they receive as friends; on the contrary, the strictest probity is observed in their camp, where every thing is open, and nothing ever known to be stolen. The Ismaelites also employed themselves in pasturage, as well as pillaging of passengers, and lived chiefly on the milk and flesh of camels, as above-mentioned. However, some of them used horses flesh, as well as that of camels, according to the Arab poet Tograi. They often changed their habitations, as the convenience of water, and of pasture for their cattle, invited them, staying in a place no longer than that lasted, and then removing in search of another. They generally wintered in Irâk, and the confines of Syria. Before the Romans subdued Syria, the Scenite Arabs made dreadful excursions into that country, where they committed great depredations, as we learn from Strabo^g.

The more civilized
Arabs
dwelt in towns,

BESIDES these free-booters, we find a more civilized kind of Arabs, who dwelt in cities and towns. These lived by tillage, the cultivation of palm-trees, breeding and feeding of cattle, and the exercise of all sorts of trades, particularly merchandizing, wherein they were very eminent, even in the time of Jacob. The tribe of Koreish were much addicted to commerce, and Mohammed, in his younger years, was brought up to the same business; it being customary for the Arabians to exercise the same trade that their parents did, according to Strabo. Neither ought it to appear surprising, that the Arabs should have had such a genius for traffick, if their country produced such immense quantities of the most precious commodities, as some authors suggest. Balsam, cinnamon, and cassia, the Happy Arabia abounded with, as likewise myrrh, frankincense, and all the most noble spices and perfumes. Cattle likewise its inhabitants had sufficient to supply all their neighbours with, and even many of the remoter nations. But, above all, the gold, which was the proper produce of this country, has been represented by Agatharchides and Strabo^h.

a to be so copious as to exceed all belief. According to them, the Alilai and Cassandrini, in the southern parts of Arabia, had gold in that plenty amongst them, that they would give double the weight of gold for iron, triple its weight for brass, and ten times its weight for silver. In digging the earth they found some pieces of pure gold, which needed no refining, as big as olive-stones, others as big as medlers, and lastly others equal to walnuts. Hence it came to pass, that all the furniture of their houses, even their chairs, beds, cups, and vessels of all kinds, consisted of gold and silver. Nay, according to Agatharchides, they alone enriched Syria to a great degree under the Ptolemies, and rewarded the mercantile diligence and labour of the Phœnicians. Contiguous to the Alilai and Cassandrini were the Dedebe or Debe, through whose country passed a river so abounding with small gobbets of gold, that the mud at the mouth of it seemed to consist intirely of that metal. Diodorus relates, that this gold was of so bright and glorious a colour, that it added an exceeding lustre and beauty to the most valuable gems set in it. In short, continues the last author, Arabia Felix, at least the region of the Sabai, was so immensely rich, that all the treasures of the world seemed to centre there; all the commodities of Asia and Europe being brought thither, as to an universal mart. But, notwithstanding the happiness of its climate, its fertility and riches, Strabo intimates, that Arabia was aggrandized solely by trade, and that in reality a great part of the riches, which the ancients imagined were the produce of Arabia, came from the Indies, and the coasts of Africa. For, the Egyptians, who had engrossed that trade, which was then carried on by way of the Red Sea, to themselves, industriously concealed the truth of the matter, and kept their ports shut, to prevent foreigners from penetrating into those countries, or receiving any information from thence. And this precaution of theirs on the one side, and the deserts, unpassable to strangers, on the other, were the reason why Arabia was so little known to the Greeks and Romans. Amongst other vessels the Arabs used on the Red Sea, to carry on their commerce with Egypt and Ethiopia, were some made of leather, the invention of which the reflux of that sea suggested to them^b.

Amongst the principal customs of the ancient Arabs, besides those couched under d some of the former general heads, may be ranked the following:

1. THE ancient Arabs used circumcision, either on the eighth day, according to Philostratus, or after they had completed the thirteenth year of their age, when Ishmael was circumcised, as Josephus asserts. Al-Gazali intimates, that they underwent the rite of circumcision when all their teeth were completely formed, and Ebn al Abir betwixt the tenth and fifteenth year, which seems to correspond pretty well with what we find advanced by Josephus. The Arab writers affirm Mohammed to have been born both without a navel and a prepuce. 2. They frequently fed upon black-puddings, which consisted of the intestines of camels filled with their blood, which they called moswadd. 3. They were extremely addicted to divination and augury. When any one of them set out upon a journey, he observed the first bird he met with; and, if it flew to the right, he pursued his journey, but if to the left, he returned home. Some of them paid the like regard to the motions of all other animals. When a person, distrusting the fidelity of his wife, went a journey, he tied together some of the boughs of a tree called Al-Ratam, and if upon his return he found them in the same position, he judged she had been faithful to him, otherwise not. For the manner of their divination by arrows, we must beg leave to refer our readers to Dr. Pocock's Specimen historiae Arabum. All the species of augury and divination were forbid by Mohammed; as likewise the plays of chess, dice, cards, &c. which in the Korân are comprehended under the name Al Majser. 4. When a she-camel or ew had brought forth twins ten times, she had an ear cut off, and was afterwards sent to graze at liberty; but women were never permitted to taste of her flesh. 5. According to some authors, many of the idolatrous Koreish buried their daughters alive as soon as they were born, upon a mountain near Mecca, called Abu-Dalamah. 6. It was not uncommon for the Arabs to marry their father's wife, who, as they imagined, by an hereditary right, belonged to the eldest son, or, if he was already provided for, to one of his brethren; but this the most virtuous of them condemned as an ignominious and shocking crime, and stiled the person guilty of it Al Daizan. 7. Some of them married two sisters; which Shabrestani a looks upon as one of the worst things they were guilty of. 8. Most of them went a pilgrimage to the Caaba, observing some particular ceremonies, which our readers will find described by Abulfeda. 9. The Caaba, their great temple or place of religious worship from the remotest antiquity, was their Keblab, or place towards which they turned themselves when they prayed. 10. Every third year they intercalated a month, their years consisting of lunar months, as already observed. 11. They frequently washed their mouth and nostrils, combed their hair, cleaned their teeth, pared their nails, and had other usages conducive to external purification. 12. Whenever any one was found guilty of theft, they immediately cut off his right hand. 12. They addressed themselves to their kings in these terms, May you avert all malediction, or, according to Dr. Pocock, in order to shew their profound respect and reverence for, as well as submission to, his person, He bath averted all malediction; i. e. May God be propitious to you, or May God prolong your life. This form of salutation was first used to Yarab the son of Kâbtan, whose memory is held in great veneration by the Arabs to this day. 13. In Arabia Petraea a prince of one family, called the royal family, always governed, and was attended and served by a person styled the king's brother. 14. In Arabia Felix the king's brothers preceded his sons, and had greater respect shewn them, as being more advanced in years. 15. The Trogodytes, in the neighbourhood of Arabia, lived a pastoral life, and kept their wives and children in common. They were governed by several tyrants, who had wives, whom none of their subjects must lie with, under the penalty of a sheep. The women hung a fish-shell about their necks, which they believed to be a preservative against all kinds of fascination. 16. Strabo seems to intimate, that there was but one wife in a family, amongst some tribes of the Arabs, with whom all the men lay by turns; and that, whilst one was engaged with her, a staff, which all of them walked with, was erected before the door of the tent, as a signal to prevent another's approach. But the senior of the family, who always governed it, lay with her in the night. Adultery they punished with death; but esteemed him only guilty of it, who had to do with a woman of another tribe. 17. The Nabathæans were good œconomists, and therefore inflicted punishment publicly d on such as squandered away their substance; but paid great respect to such as increased it. 18. As they had very few slaves amongst them, relations either served at meals, and on other occasions, or they assisted one another, or, lastly, served themselves; which usage likewise extended to their phylarchs. 19. At their feasts they generally admitted only thirteen persons; and had always two musicians to perform during the whole entertainment. 20. Their phylarchs had so little power, that they were almost upon a level with the populace, and had their conduct frequently inspected into, and were obliged to give an account of it in person to a public assembly of their respective tribes. 21. Their cities were not walled round, scarce any foreign invader ever attempting to disturb them. 22. It was a common practice e amongst the Saracens or Scenite Arabs to have mercenary wives, hired for a time, marrying in one place, bringing forth in another, and educating their children in a third. Nor is this matter much altered since the admission of divorces; on the contrary, amongst many of them it is in all respects the same. 23. According to some authors, the antient Arabs circumcised their daughters, as well as their sons. 24. When the Sabæans found themselves near overcome by the strong odours emitted by their perfumes and aromatic plants, they had recourse to the fumes of bitumen, and the hair of goat's-beard, set on fire under the nose of the patient, which recovered them. 25. They reaped twice a year, having two harvests as well as the Indians and Ethiopians. 26. In their wars they brought into the field a great number f of camels, carrying each of them two archers sitting back to back, that in any general action they might be able to oppose the enemy both in rear and in front at the same time. Several other customs prevailing amongst the antient Arabs, depending upon the authority of the Korân, will be touched upon hereafter occasionally, when we come to consider the tenets and doctrines of that book i.

C H A P. IX.

The history of the Arabs, to the time of Mohammed.

- ^a JOKTAN the son of Eber, whom the Arabs call Kabtân, had thirteen sons, who, some time after the confusion of languages at Babel, settled in Arabia, extending themselves from Mesha to Sepbar, a mountainous district in the south-eastern part of that peninsula. To this district, in all probability, part of the provinces of Hadramaut and Sbibr corresponds, particularly that adjacent to the city of Dbafâr or Saphâr, in which some traces of Moses's Sepbar seem still to be preserved. The names of these thirteen planters were, Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Ferab, Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, Obal, Abimael, Sbeba, Opbir, Havilah, and Jobab. As for Hadramaut, Seba, Ofir, and Kawilah, the sons of Kabtân, mentioned by M. D'Herbelot, they were undoubtedly the same with Hazarmaveth, Sbeba, Opbir, and Havilah; as appears, not only from the affinity of names, but likewise the order in which the three last are placed. According to Abmed Ebn Yusef, Kabtân had thirty-one sons by the same mother, of whom all but two, leaving Arabia, went and settled in India. Yarab, the elder of those two, succeeded his father in the kingdom of Yaman, giving name, if we will believe the Arab writers, both to their country and language, as has been already observed: Jorham, the younger, founded the kingdom of Hejâz, where his posterity kept the throne till the time of Ishmael. That Yarab and Jorham are the Ferab and Hadoram of Scripture, we cannot help thinking probable, though we are far from insisting upon it. Let this be admitted, and it will follow, that the second king of Yaman was called Ferab or Yareab, not Yarab; and consequently, that the peninsula of Arabia (A), and the Arabic tongue, could not have received their denominations from that prince, as the Arabs pretend. But whether Yarab and Jorham be the same persons with Ferab and Hadoram or not, we cannot infer from the disagreement betwixt their names, as M. Gagnier seems to have done, that every thing related by the Arabs of the former is a downright fiction; because, as their language differed gradually more and more from the Hebrew, the Arabs undoubtedly altered the most antient proper names. Of this Hazarmaveth and Hadramaut, Joktan and Kabtân, which confessedly denote the same persons, are a sufficient proof. Elmacinus says, that Kabtân was the father of the Arabs, and that he begat many children, who chose for their princes or leaders Saba, Opbir, and Gjawilah, i. e. Sbeba, Opbir, and Havilah; which runs counter to what we find advanced by Abmed Ebn Yusef, Abulfeda, and others. And this disagreement between the most celebrated eastern writers, with regard to the first kings of Arabia, clearly evinces, that none of them, at least in this point, can be intirely depended upon *.

(A) It is at least equally improbable, that the peninsula of Arabia should have been so denominated from we know not what mixture of different nations inhabiting it: for the Arabs agree, that they had only two principal planters, viz. Kabtân and Ishmael, whose families by intermarriages became one and the same. And it is generally allowed, that no people in the world have had a less mixture with foreigners than the Arabs, nor have preserved their antient customs and manners more invariably the same than they have done. Nor indeed can we conceive an introduction of foreign customs amongst them likely to be effected, since neither the Persians, Greeks, or Romans, could ever subdue them; and as for the Egyptians, though Sesac obliged a good part of Arabia to submit to him, his successors could not long keep their footing there. All the other etymons of Arabia, except that we have already given, are so apparently remote from truth, that not the least regard is due unto them (1).

As does Ishmael the son of Abraham.

Ishmael forms an alliance with the Jorhamites, by marriage.

Some particulars relating to the kings of Hamyar.

Ishmael, and his mother Hagar, having been dismissed by Abraham in the manner already related, retired into the wilderness of Paran, where they were supported by the Divine favour and assistance. God had assured Hagar in her distress, before the birth of Ishmael, that her son should be the father of a most numerous and potent nation; that he and his descendants should be wild, and live in a state of enmity with the rest of mankind; and yet that they should never be thoroughly subjugated by any foreign power. The truth of which most surprising prediction to demonstration appears, from the manner of life, disposition, power, government, &c. of the Scenite Arabs, or, as they are frequently now styled, the wild Arabs, from the age of Ishmael to this very day. For, from Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, Ammianus Marcellinus, to omit other ancient authors, as well as the relations of all modern travellers, who have visited the countries they inhabit, they now live in the same manner their father Ishmael did, and have always done so from his time to the present. Their disposition likewise is the same that it was predicted to be, as it always has been; that is, their band has been against every man, and consequently every man's band against them; since they always have, and still do, for the most part, live by pillaging passengers of all nations. They never were reduced to, or at least for any time continued in, a state of servitude, as appears from all the principal ancient historians mentioning them, and their present almost absolute independence on the Turk; which gives us an idea of their power and government, sufficient to convince us of the agreement of both with the Divine prediction, relating to Ishmael and his posterity. The vast puissance and conquests of the Saracens, the descendants of Ishmael, as well as the similitude of their manners and those of the Ishmaelites, as foretold by God himself in the Mosaic history, likewise confirm the authority of Scripture in this particular. But this point our readers will find set in a just and proper light by two authors, who deserve well both of literature and religion.

Ishmael, as we learn from the sacred historian, held his residence in the wilderness of Paran, and married an Egyptian. In conformity to the Divine prediction to Abraham, he had twelve sons, the heads of so many tribes, which in after-ages grew exceedingly potent, whose names we have already given. The Arab writers say, that he took to wife the daughter of Modad king of Hejaz, descended lineally from Jorham the founder of that kingdom. Be that as it will, he died at an hundred and thirty-seven years of age, probably not far from the borders of Egypt. As the Arabs have always considered him, and still do consider him, as the father of the greatest part of their nation, and this notion is strongly countenanced by Scripture, we may look upon him and Joktan as the principal planters of Arabia. This seems an additional proof to those already offered, that the (B) Cushites did not settle in any great numbers here, or at least, that their settlement was not of any long continuance, but that they passed, either through Egypt, or on the eastern coast of the Red Sea, and over the streights of Bab al Mandab, into Ethiopia. The silence of the Orientalists, with regard to such a settlement, seems to confirm what is here advanced. We must not imagine, that the Scenite Arabs were the only descendants of Ishmael, though probably they might be the bulk of them; since Moses gives us to understand, that some Ishmaelites had castles and towns. For all other particulars relating to Ishmael, our readers may have recourse to the Jewish history.

In order to render our history of the ancient Arabs as complete as possible, we shall here give our readers catalogues of the kings of Hamyar, or Yaman, Hira, Ghassân, and Hejaz, extracted from the best Oriental historians.

As the kings of Hamyar were the most considerable princes in Arabia, it will be proper to begin with them. But, before we do this, some particulars relating to

(B) The Scripture seems to distinguish the Arabs from the Cushites, when it makes a branch of the former contiguous to the latter. The passage here referred to will give great strength to what has been already advanced, in relation to the first settlements of the Cushites (2).

(2) 2 Chron. c. xxi. ver. 16. Univ. hist. vol. vii. pass.

- a them must be premised. The kingdom of Yaman, or at least the better part of it, particularly the provinces of Saba and Hadramaut, was governed by princes of the tribe of Hamyar, the son of Saba, the great-grandson of Kablân, though at length the kingdom was translated to the descendants of Cablân his brother, who yet retained the title of king of Hamyar. The Hamyarites were called Homerites by the later Greek and Latin authors, and Immireniens by Theodorus Leitor; all their princes had the general title of Tobba, which signifies successor, as the Egyptian kings had that of Pharaoh, the Roman emperors that of Cæsar, and the successors of Mohammed that of Khalif. Several lesser princes reigned in other parts of Yaman, but they were chiefly, if not intirely, subject to the king of Hamyar, who was styled the great king. But, as history has recorded nothing of these reguli, that deserves the least attention, we shall drop them, and immediately proceed to the series of the kings of Yaman or Hamyar^d.
1. Kablân, or Joktan, the son of Eber, is said to have first reigned, and wore a Kablân diadem, in Yaman; but how long he sat upon the throne, or what remarkable events happened during his reign, we no-where learn^e.
2. Yarab, the son of Kablân, was a prince greatly celebrated by the Arab histo- Yarab rians; but as the principal things related of him have already been taken notice of, we shall proceed to his successor^f.
3. Yasfab, son to the preceding prince, has had only his name transmitted down Yasfab to us^g.
4. Abd Shems, i. e. the servant of the sun, surnamed Saba, the son of Yasfab, next Abd Shems ascended the throne; who, the Arab historians tell us, was successful in his expeditions against his enemies, carried off great spoils, and took many of them prisoners. Hence, they pretend, he derived his surname, which to us seems by no means probable: it is more likely, that it was used before in his family, since the Scripture mentions Sbeba, or Saba, one of the sons of Joktan. He is said to have built the city of Saba or Mâreb, as likewise that stupendous mound or building, which formed the vast reservoir above that city. By means of this reservoir, which received all the water that came down from the mountains, the kings of Yaman did not only supply the inhabitants of Saba, and their lands, with water, but likewise kept the territories they had subdued in greater awe; since, by cutting them off from a communication with it, they could at any time greatly distress them. Abd Shems had many sons, but the most noted of them were Hamyar, Amru, Cablân, and Albaar^h.
5. Hamyar, the son of Abd Shems or Saba, according to the Oriental authors, was Hamyar so called from the red cloaths he wore. This seems a plain indication, that Hamyar was only a surname. He expelled Thamûd from Yaman, who took refuge in Hejâz. From this prince the tribe or kingdom of Hamyar deduced its name. Some assert, that not Kablân, but Hamyar, was the first king of Yaman that wore a diademⁱ.
6. Wayel, the son of Hamyar, according to Abulfeda, succeeded him in the king- Wayel dom; but other authors make his brother Cablân his successor^j.
7. AFTER Wayel reigned his son Alfascac^k. Alfascac.
8. Yaasar, the son of Alfascac, next mounted the throne^l. Yaasar.
9. To him succeeded Dhu Riyash^m. Dhu Riyash.
10. AFTER him Al Nooman, the son of Yaasar, swayed the sceptre of *Yaman*ⁿ. Al Nooman.
11. THEN came Asmab, the son of Nooman^o. Asmab.
12. Shaddâd, the son of Ad, the son of Al Matata, the son of Saba, a very Shaddâd potent prince, succeeded Asmab^p.
13. Lokmân, the brother of Shaddâd, was the next king, according to the most Lokmân received opinion, though some authors are of a different sentiment^q.

- Dhu Sadâd. 14. He was succeeded by his brother Dbu Sadâd ^a.
- Al Hareth. 15. Al Hareth, the son of Dbu Sadâd, next ascended the throne. He greatly enriched the kingdom of Yaman, and was the first who had the title or surname of Tobba above-mentioned given him by his subjects ^c.
- Dhu'l Karnain. 16. Dbu'l Karnain Affaab, the next king, was the son of Rayesh. This was the two-born prince mentioned in the Korân, and not Alexander the great, as we learn from Ebn Abbas ^a.
- Dhu'l Manar. 17. Dbu'l Manar Abrakab, the son of Dbu'l Karnain, succeeded his father; but nothing remarkable happened during his reign ^w.
- Africus. 18. Africus, the son of Dbu'l Manar Abrakab, from whence that part of the world called Africa was so denominated, according to some of the eastern writers, b next took the reins of government upon him ^a.
- Dhu'l Adbaar Amru. 19. Dbu'l Adbaar Amru, the son of Africus, who reigned after his father, received the name or surname of lord of terrors, from the terror with which his subjects were struck at the sight of certain monstrous men, or satyrs, or apes, as some will have it, whom he had taken prisoners in war, and brought into Yaman.
- Sharhabil. 20. The Hamyarites placed upon the throne Sbarhabil, of the posterity of Alfascac, in the room of Dbu'l Adbaar Amru, whom for some enormity they expelled from thence ^a.
- Al Hodbad. 21. Al Hodbad, the son of Sbarhabil, succeeded his father ^a.
- Balkis. 22. Balkis, the son of Hodbad, is said to have reigned twenty years. According c to some authors, Al Hodbad was succeeded by a daughter named Balkis or Belkis, whom they assert to be the famous queen of Sheba, who had an interview with Solomon, king of Israel, at Jerusalem ^b.
- Nasherol'neam. 23. Nasherol'neam, so called from his surprising magnificence and liberality, was likewise styled simply Malec, or king. Having had bad success in an expedition, wherein his army was overwhelmed by torrents of sand, he caused a brazen statue to be erected, with this inscription, in the old Hamyaritic character, engraven upon it; There is no passage behind me; no moving further; the son of Sharhabil ^c.
- Shamer Yaraash. 24. Shamer Yaraash, the son of Nasher, swayed the sceptre after Nasherol'neam. We are told, that he was so denominated from the tremor that always possessed him, d and that he gave name to the city of Samarcand. That Samarcand was built by one of the Hamyaritic kings, surnamed Tobba, seems to be a point agreed upon by the best of the eastern writers. To confirm this notion, it is pretended, an inscription in the old Hamyaritic character was found under one of the gates of Samarcand; though what this inscription imported, we are no-where informed. It is possible the authors that relate this may mistake the old Cufic character for the Hamyaritic, since in the time of Arabshah considerable quantities of dirhems, and a small coin called a salous, with Cufic letters upon them, were frequently dug up at old Samarcand. That the Hamyaritic, Cufic, and modern Arabic alphabets were derived from that of the Hebrews, as the excellent Loefer and Schultens with great reason suppose, seems e farther to appear from hence, that the Arabs, in order to help the memory, distribute their letters into six words, Abjad, Howaz, Hotai, Colman, Saaphas, and Karshat; wherein the order of the Hebrew alphabet is exactly preserved. This, in conjunction with others, we take to be no contemptible argument in favour of what Loefer and Schultens have advanced ^a.
- Abu Malec. 25. Abu Malec, the son of Shamer, after his father's death, took possession of the throne ^c.

 32. Abu Carb Asaad, the succeeding king, we find mentioned in the Korân. He lived seven hundred years before Mohammed, adorned the Caab with hangings or tapestry, and first introduced Judaism amongst the Hamyarites. The Oriental writers say, that he was put to death by his subjects, probably on the score of religion⁵. Abu Carb.

 41. Sabban mounted the throne upon Abrahah's death, or, according to some of the Oriental writers, Ebn Dakikan. Ebn Dakikan had that famous sword of Ebn Maad Cerb called Samsama; this sword came afterwards into the hands of the khâlif Râsîd, who with it cut in two several noble swords, sent him as a present by the Greek emperor, in the presence of that prince's ambassadors, who brought them, without doing it the least damage. How far this story may be depended upon, we shall not take upon us to determine¹⁴. Sabban.
 d 42. Dbu Shanater, according to Al Firauzabadius, had six fingers on each hand. He was dethroned by the Hamyarites for being abandoned to an unnatural species of lust, and abusing several youths of some of the noblest families amongst them¹⁵. Dhu Shanater.
 43. Yusef, surnamed Dbu Nowas, from his flowing curls, lived about seventy years before Mohammed. He persecuted all who would not turn Jews, putting them to death by various tortures, the most common of which was, throwing them into a glowing pit of fire; whence he had the opprobrious appellation of the lord of the pit. This persecution we find mentioned in the *Korân*¹⁶.
 44. Dbu Jadan, i. e. the person with a sweet voice, succeeded Dbu Nowas, and was the last of the Hamyaritic monarchs, according to Abulfeda; but Abmed Ebn Yusef and Al Jannabius make Dbu Nowas the last prince of the true Hamyaritic line, reigning in a continual succession. He was a bigotted Jew, as just observed, and treated his Christian subjects with such barbarity, that Elesbaas, or Eleshaan, king of Ethiopia, sent over forces to assist them. Dbu Nowas, not being able to make head against the Ethiopians, was at last drove to that extremity, that he forced his horse into the sea, and lost both his crown and life together. According to Abmed Ebn Yusef above-mentioned, he reigned sixty-six years, which, though improbable, does not exceed all belief, as does the length of his reign recorded by Al Jannabius. the reason of which appellation appears from the following story, handed down to a us by the commentators upon the Korân. Abraba built a magnificent church for the Christians in Sanaa, the metropolis of Yaman, with a design to draw the Arabs to go in pilgrimage thither, instead of visiting Mecca, as they before had done; which he imagined would greatly contribute towards their conversion to Christianity: for he doubted not abolishing paganism, could he destroy the veneration of the Arabs for the Caaba, by bringing them to a place more sumptuous and grand, and which would more strongly attract their curiosity, and gradually excite their devotion. This had soon such an effect, that the devotion and concourse of the pilgrims at the Caaba began considerably to diminish; which being observed by the Koreish, who were superstitiously fond of that place, they sent one Nosail, as he is named by some, b of the tribe of Kenânah, to offer an indignity to the Christian church at Sanaa, in order to lessen that religious regard, which the Arabs began to have for it. Nosail therefore getting into it by night, upon a solemn festival, defiled the altar and walls thereof with his excrements; and, making his escape by favour of the night, published every-where what he had done. At this profanation Abraba being highly incensed, vowed the destruction of the Caaba, and to that end assembled a considerable body of forces, wherein were several elephants, which he had obtained of the king of Ethiopia, their number being, as some say, thirteen; though others mention but one, at the head of which he advanced towards Mecca. The Meccans, unable to defend their temple and city, and terrified at Abraba's approach, parti- c cularly on account of his elephants, none of which creatures had ever before been seen in Arabia, retired to the neighbouring mountains, where they intrenched themselves. But GOD HIMSELF, at this juncture, interposed in an extraordinary manner: for when the Ethiopian drew near to Mecca, and would have entered it, the elephant on which he rode, being a large one, and named Mahmud, refused to advance any nigher to the town, but knelt down whenever they endeavoured to force him that way, though he would rise, and march briskly enough, if they turned him towards any other quarter. As he was the chief of the elephants, and, both by reason of his size and whiteness, greatly revered by the others, they immediately followed him, so that Abraba could not so much as reconnoitre the town. The Meccans, observing d this from their retrenchment, were at a loss to what to attribute so unexpected a motion, believing that the enemy were going to return home. In the mean time, whilst matters were in this situation, a large flock of birds, called Ababil, like swallows, came flying on a sudden from the sea-coast, every one of which carried three stones, one in each foot, and one in its bill, of a middle size betwixt a small lentil and a vetch, but so ponderous, that, being let fall, they pierced through the helmets and bodies of men, and even, according to some, the elephants likewise, which they threw down upon Abraba's soldiers, certainly killing every one they struck. Then God sent a flood, which swept the dead bodies, and some of them who had not been struck by the stones, into the sea: the rest fled towards Yaman, but perished by the e way, none of them reaching Sanaa, except only Abraba himself, who died soon after his arrival there, being struck with a sort of plague, or putrefaction, so that his body opened, and his limbs rotted off by piece-meal. It is said, that one of Abraba's army, named Abu Yacsum, or, according to others, Abraba himself, escaped over the Red Sea into Ethiopia, and, going directly to the king, told him the tragical story. Upon which, that prince asked him what sort of birds they were, that had occasioned such a destruction; in answer to which question he pointed to one of them, which had followed him all the way, and was at that time hovering directly over his head; which he had no sooner done, than the bird let fall the stone, and laid him dead at the king's feet. Some of the Mohammedan writers say, that the names of all the persons to be destroyed were inscribed on the stones that destroyed f them; that this flock of birds consisted of two sorts, one whose feathers were black, and bill white; the other all over green except the bill, which was yellow: and that they threw all their stones at once upon the Ethiopians. This memorable event, according to the Mohammedans, is said to have happened in the time of Abd al Motalleb, the grandfather of Mohammed, and the very year in which that impostor was born^h.

- a THAT this piece of history has all the air of one of those fictions, with which the Arab writings in general, and the Korân in particular, abound, will be readily acknowledged by all our intelligent readers. We therefore, with Dr. Prideaux, rather take the fact therein asserted to be a creature of Mohammed's brain, than a feat of evil spirits, as is suggested by father Marracci; and yet, supposing it a real fact, we see no absurdity in this last notion. The very learned Mr. Sale, to our no small surprize, is of opinion, that this ridiculous story, for so we cannot help terming it, is not without some foundation, since "it seems to him, that there was something extraordinary in the matter." The reasons he alledges in support of this opinion, are the two following: 1. The event is said to have happened not above fifty-four
- b years before the pretended revelation mentioning it was made; and therefore had it been a fiction, several living witnesses could have disproved it; which we find never was done, and consequently may presume, that the reality of this remarkable action could not be denied. 2. Mohammed had no occasion to coin a miracle to gain the temple of Mecca any greater veneration, the people of Mecca being already so religiously attached to it, that he was obliged, contrary to his original plan, to make it the chief place of his new-invented worship. In answer to the first reason, it will be sufficient to observe, that, according to Mr. Sale himself, after Abu Beer had vouched for Mohammed's veracity, in the twelfth year of his mission, which falls within the time mentioned, his disciples were ready to swallow whatever he was
- c pleased to impose upon them; that the story, as told in the Korân, is supposed a revelation, and therefore might only describe the supernatural unknown cause of a noted defeat; that Mr. Sale himself allows the thing might be worked up into a miracle, at which it must be owned, none of the preceding Arabs had so excellent a knack as Mohammed; and, lastly, that the same turn and genius appear in this as in the most extravagant absurdities of that impostor. To the second reason it may be replied, that we are under no necessity to allow, though Dr. Prideaux supposes it, that the gaining a veneration to the Caaba amongst the pagan Arabs was the motive to the forging such a story; on the contrary, it appears that this could not possibly be the motive, even from Mr. Sale's own observation, viz. because the Meccans, or pagan Arabs,
- d held their temple in the highest veneration at the time this pretended revelation happened. But, notwithstanding this, Mohammed might coin a miracle, either to draw the christian Arabs to Mecca, and make them converts to his religion, or to render them odious to all the other Arabs; which, from the whole tenour of the story, appears to have been his design. But as what Mr. Sale has offered on this occasion seems rather to proceed from a desire of shewing some disrespect to Dr. Prideaux, on account of his attachment to religion in general, than a full persuasion of the truth of what he seems to advance, we shall offer nothing farther on this head, but immediately resume the thread of our history e.

47. Yacsum, the son of Abraba, succeeded him; but we find nothing remarkable Yacsum.
e related of him by any ancient historians d.

48. Masruk, another son of Abraba, and the last of the Ethiopian princes in Masruk.
Taman, came to the throne after Yacsum. The Ethiopians, according to some eastern writers, occupied the kingdom of Hamyar about seventy-two years e.

49. Seif Ebn Dhu Yazan, of the old royal family of Hamyar, having obtained Seif Ebn Dhu succours of Khosrû Anushirwân, king of Persia, which had been denied him by the Yazan. emperor Heraclius, recovered the throne, and drove out the Ethiopians, but was himself slain by some of them, who were left behind. The Persians appointed the succeeding princes, Wabzar, Marzaban, Siban, Jorjis or Georgius, and Bazan, till Taman fell into the hands of Mohammed, to whom Bazan, or rather Badbân, the f last of them, submitted, and embraced his new religion. This induced Mohammed to give Sababr, the son of Bazan, part of his father's dominions f.

THUS stands the series of the kings of Hamyar, which we wish was more perfect. Duration of The petty princes already mentioned, tributary to the king of Hamyar, were styled the kingdom of Al Kail, and the governors of provinces Al Makawel. According to Abulfeda, this Ha.ny.r. monarchy continued 2020 years, or above 3000, if we will believe Abmed Ebn Yusuf, and Al Jannabius. The length of the reign of each prince must be allowed to be very uncertain. The history of the kings of Hamyar, surnamed Tobba or Tobbai, which the Arabs pronounce Tababéab, and Tabbâiab, has been wrote by Shababeddin

The inundation of Al Arem.

It has been already observed, that Saba made a vast mound or dam, to serve as a basin or reservoir, to supply the inhabitants of the city built by him, and called after his name, with water, which it constantly received from the mountains, as also to keep the country his predecessors had subdued in greater awe, by rendering him master of the water. This building stood like a mountain above the city, and was by the Sabaans esteemed so strong, that they were under no apprehension of its ever failing. The water rose to the height of almost twenty fathoms, and was kept in on every side by a work so solid, that many of them had their houses built upon it. Every family had a certain portion of this water distributed by aqueducts. But at length God, being highly displeased at their pride and insolence, and resolving to humble and disperse them, sent a mighty flood, which broke down the mound by night, while the inhabitants were asleep, and carried away the whole city with the neighbouring towns and people. This inundation is styled in the Korân the inundation of AL AREM, and occasioned so terrible a destruction, that from thence it became a proverbial saying, to express a total dispersion, that they were gone and scattered like Saba. Al Beidawi supposes the aforesaid mound to have been the work of queen Balkis, and that the above-mentioned catastrophe happened after the time of JESUS CHRIST. But both these notions run counter to the most received opinion, which attributes the building of AL AREM to Saba, and fixes its destruction about the time of Alexander the great. Be that as it will, no less than eight tribes, viz. those of Anmâr, Jodhâm, Al Azd, Tay, Kbozâab, Banu Amela, &c. were forced to abandon their dwellings on this occasion, some of which gave rise to the kingdoms of Hira and Ghassân (B).

Hira.

THE kingdom of Hira was founded by Malec, a descendant of Cablân, in Chaldæa or Irâk; but after three descents the throne came by marriage to the Lakbmians. These princes, whose general name was Mondar, preserved their dominion, notwithstanding some small interruption by the Persians, till the khalifat of Abubecr, when Al Mondar Maghrûr, the last of them, lost his life and crown by the arms of Khaled Ebn al Walid. The kingdom of the Mondars, supposed to be the descendants of Nadar Ebn Rabia, continued, according to Ahmed Ebn Yusef, six hundred twenty-two years and eight months. Its princes were under the protection of the kings of Persia, whose lieutenants they were over the Arabs of Irâk, as the kings of Ghassân were for the Roman emperors over those of Syria. The Lakbmians were descended from Lakbm the son of Amru, the son of Saba. If the kingdom of the Lakbmians or Mondars was not of any longer duration than six hundred and twenty-two or twenty-three years, Al Beidawi seems not to be much mistaken, when he affirms the inundation of Al Arem to have happened after the birth of Christ, notwithstanding the authority of those who carry it above three centuries higher. This space was taken up by the reigns of the following kings, according to the best Oriental historians¹.

Malec.

4. Amru, the son of Ad and Rakab the sister of Jolaimab, by the assistance of Amru. one Kofair, who had been servant to Jodaimab, revenged the murder of his uncle by the following stratagem: Kofair, at his own desire, had his ears cut off, and was whipped in a most cruel manner, by Amru's order; after which he fled to Zoba, making the heaviest complaints of the inhuman treatment he had met with. By this means he soon became a confident of Zoba, who permitted him to convey into her castle some large chests, full, as was given out, of wares, but, in reality, of armed men, who immediately dispatched her. The memory of Amru is still preserved
b amongst the Arabs by several proverbs which particularly allude to him ⁿ.
5. Amrio'l Kais, the son of Amru, surnamed Albada, succeeded his father ^o. Amrio'l Kais.
6. Amru, the son of Amrio'l Kais, flourished in the time of Sabur, or Sapor, Dil Amru. Ataf, king of Persia. This Persian monarch, whose surname imports as much, according to Abulfeda, cut off the shoulders of all the Arabs he took prisoners, in a war he had with that nation. His mother's name was Mary, whose ear-rings occasioned a proverb amongst the Arabs. If this piece of history may be depended upon, it is an additional proof of the truth of what Al Beidawi has advanced in relation to the time when the inundation of AL AREM happened ^p.
7. Aus, the son of Kalam, an Amalekite ^q. Aus.

9. Amrio'l Kais, the son of Amru, next ascended the throne. He was surnamed Amrio'l Kais Amobrek, or the burner, because he first tortured criminals with fire ^s.
10. Al Nooman, the son of Amrio'l Kais, surnamed Alawar, or the blinkard, who, Al Nooman. when he had reigned thirty years, abdicated the government, and retired from the world, saying, What signifies a kingdom that will certainly have an end? Al Nooman built those castles or towers called Kbaouarnak and Al Sadir, so celebrated by the Arab poets and proverbs. Senemmar, the builder of Kbaouarnak, was thrown head-
d long from thence by Al Nooman's order, which gave occasion to the proverb, The reward of Senemmar. We are told, that Al Nooman became a convert to the Christian religion, and in consequence thereof thought fit to resign the reins of government to his son Hendu, as just hinted. Jezdegerd, king of Persia, committed the care of his son's education, and the establishment of his constitution, to Al Nooman, who was afterwards very instrumental in fixing him upon the throne of his ancestors. The cause of Senemmar's tragical end, and all the other remarkable particulars relating to the reign of the prince we are now upon, our readers will find an ample account of in the history of the Persians ^t.
11. Al Mondar Ebn Noomab, the Hendu of the Persian historians, attended Ba- Al Mondar. haram, the son of Jezdegerd, into Persia; with an army of 40000 men, to enable Ebn Noomab. him to dethrone one Kerfa, an usurper whom the Magi had elected king. The success and particulars of this expedition have been already related at large in that part of this work to which they most properly belong ^u.
12. Al Aswad, son to Al Mondar, overthrew the king of Ghassan, and took many Al Aswad. of his relations prisoners, according to some of the Oriental historians; but Abmed Ebn Yusef relates, that the king of Ghassan prevailed against him, and slew him, after a short reign ^v.
13. He was succeeded by his brother Al Mondar, whose true name has not reached An anonymous us. It is probable, nothing of moment happened whilst this prince sat on the throne, king.
f since the eastern writers say little of him ^w.
14. Al Kamab, successor to the last king, was styled Al Damyali, from the family Al Kamab. of Damyal, of which he was a member. All the transactions that happened during his reign, are likewise buried in oblivion ^x.
15. Amrio'l Kais, the son of Nooman, the son of Amrio'l Kais al Mohrek, next Amrio'l Kais. swayed the sceptre of Hira. Abmed Ebn Yusef asserts, that it was he who threw Se- the son of Nooman.

16. Al Mondar, the son of the last king and Mawwab the daughter of Ans, a lady of such transcendent beauty, that she was called Maiffamai, i. e. water of heaven, governed after his father in Hira. From his mother he and his posterity were likewise surnamed Al Mondar Ebn Maiffamai; which appellation they had in common with the kings of Gbassan, according to Al Jaubarius. For these last princes were so denominated from Abu Amer, of the tribe of Azd, the father of Amru Mazikia, who by his surprising liberality and beneficence supplied the want of rain, furnishing his people with corn, when an extreme drought had rendered it so dear, that they were incapable of buying it. This prince was deposed by Kbofrú Kobád, king of Persia ^b.

Al Hareth.

17. Al Hareth Ebn Amru, of the tribe of Kenda, was placed on the throne of Hira by Kbofrú Kobád, in the room of Al Mondar Ebn Amriol Kais, whom he had deposed. However, Kobád's son and successor Anushirwán, surnamed the just, in whose reign Mohammed was born, restored the lawful king to his dominions, and drove away the usurper Al Hareth Ebn Amru. Kobád embraced the tenets of an impostor called Mazdak, who pretended himself a prophet sent from God to preach a community of women and possessions, since all men were descended from the same common parents; and in most points agreed with Manti. By rendering wealth and women common, he proposed taking away the lust of both; from whence, he insinuated, generally arose the feuds, quarrels, and animosities, that disturbed the repose and tranquillity of mankind. Such a doctrine well suiting the disposition of Kobád, he not only professed himself a convert to Mazdak's religion, but likewise obliged all his dependents to do the same; and therefore, when Al Mondar Ebn Amriol Kais refused this, he stripped him of his dominions, and appointed Al Hareth, who had declared himself a zealous follower of Mazdak, to preside over them in his stead. But Anushirwán, called Nouschirvan by the Persian historians, in consequence of a vow he had made before his accession, restored the Mondar family to the throne of Hira, put Mazdak to death, and abolished the profession of his impious opinions. It is said, when Mazdak knew his fate, he told Anushirwán, that God had raised him to the throne of Persia to protect his subjects, and not to destroy them. To which that monarch answered, True, abandoned villain; but dost thou not remember, that with the utmost difficulty, even by kissing thy bathsome feet, I prevailed upon thee not to lie with my mother, when my father, at thy impudent request, had given thee a permission to do so? Yes, replied Mazdak. Upon which, the king ordered him to be executed immediately, cut off many of his followers, and established once more amongst his subjects the ancient Magian religion ^c.

Other authors, from his mother Henda, give him the surname of Ebn Henda. In the eighth year of his reign the false prophet Mohammed was born ^c.

21. Al Nooman, surnamed Abu Kabus, was the twenty-first king of Hira, and became a convert to Christianity on the following occasion: In a drunken fit he had ordered two of his intimate companions, who, overcome with liquor, had fallen asleep, to be buried alive. When he came to himself, he was extremely concerned at what he had done; and, to expiate his crime, not only raised a monument to the memory of his friends, but set apart two days, one of which he called the unfortunate, and the other the fortune's day; making it a perpetual rule to himself, that whoever met him on the former day, should be slain, and his blood sprinkled on the monument; but he that met him on the other day, should be dismissed in safety, with magnificent gifts. On one of the unfortunate days, there came before him accidentally an Arab, of the tribe of Tay, who had once entertained this king, when fatigued with hunting, and separated from his attendants. The king, who could neither discharge him, contrary to the order of the day, nor put him to death, against

- a the laws of hospitality, which the Arabs religiously observe, proposed, as an expedient, to give the unhappy man a year's respite, and to send him home with rich gifts, to make his family amends for the great loss they were to sustain, on condition that he found a surety for his returning at the year's end, to suffer death. One of the prince's court, out of compassion, offered himself as his surety, and the Arab was discharged. When the last day of the term came, and no news of the Arab, the king, not at all displeased to save his host's life, ordered the surety to be brought out to execution. Those who were by, represented to the king, that the day was not yet expired, and therefore he ought to have patience till the evening: but in the middle of their discourse the Arab appeared. The king, admiring the man's generosity, in offering himself to certain death, which he might have avoided by letting his surety suffer, asked him, what was his motive for so doing? To which he answered, he had been taught to act in that manner by the religion he professed; and Al Nooman demanding what religion that was, he replied, the Christian. Whereupon the king, desiring to have the doctrines of Christianity explained to him, was baptized, together with all his subjects; and not only pardoned the man and his surety, but abolished his barbarous custom. This prince, however, was not the first king of Hira who professed himself a convert to the Christian religion; Al Mondar, the son of Amr ibn Kais, his grandfather, declared himself a Christian, and built large churches in his capital. As Al Nooman took a particular delight in tulips, and would not permit them to grow in all gardens, the Arabs, from him, call them the variegated flowers of Al Nooman. After a reign of twenty-two years, Al Nooman was slain by Khosrû Parwiz, by whom the kingdom of Hira was translated from the family of the Lakhmians to Ayas the Tayile.

22. Mohammed's mission commenced in the sixth month of Ayas's reign.

The four royal families of Persia, governing that kingdom before this period, were the Pisbadadian, the Catanian, the Asfganian, and that of Khosrû; which, as Hira was a state dependent on the Persians, we thought not improper to be observed.

The kingdom of Ghassân, as well as that of Hira, owed its origin to the invitation of Al Arem. The founders of this kingdom were of the tribe of Azd, who, according to some, settling in Syria Damascena, near a water called Ghassân, thence took their name; though others make them to have gone under this appellation before they left Yaman. Having driven out the Dajadman Arabs, of the tribe of Salib, who before possessed the country, they made themselves masters of a very considerable territory. Here they maintained their kingdom four hundred years, as others say, six hundred, or, as Abulfeda more exactly computes, six hundred and sixteen. If Ghassân was their name prior to this migration, they probably were the Cassanite of Ptolemy. Be that as it will, five of the kings of Ghassân were named Hâreth, which the Greeks and Latins wrote Aretas; and one of them it was, whose governor ordered the gates of Damascus to be watched to take St. Paul. Dr. Pocock gives us the following list of the kings of Ghassân, extracted from the Oriental historians.

 Amru. 29. Amru, another of their brothers.
 Jabalah. 30. Jabalab, Ebn al Hareth, Ebn Jabalah.
 Jabalah. 31. Jabalab, the son of Al Ayham, and the last of the kings of Ghassân, who, on the great successes of the Arabs in Syria, under the khalif Omar, professed Noaham-meism; but, receiving afterwards a disgust from him, returned to his former faith, and retired to Constantinople. As in the regal line of Hamyar, Hejûz, and Kenda, we find the name of Hareth, or Al Hareth, we think Scaliger had some colour of reason, when he asserted this to be a general name amongst the Arab emirs or phylarchs, though Dr. Pocock is of another opinion. The scholiast on the poem of Ebn Abduni differs something from Abulfeda in his account of the kings of Hira. For he tells d us, that Al Hareth Ebn Amru, Ebn Amer, Ebn Hareth, Ebn Amriol Kais, Ebn Niazzen, Ebn Al Azd, surnamed Ebn Abi Shamer, was the first king; and that the whole series of these princes contained thirty-seven kings, the last of which was Jabalab, who embraced Christianity in the khalifat of Omar: which if we admit, and that St. Paul was at Damascus A. C. 34. as Calvisius will have it, the Aretas mentioned by that apostle was in all likelihood one of the most antient kings of Ghassân (C), and probably the first of them. From whence it will follow, that Al Beidawi has probability on his side, when he affirms the inundation of Al Arem to have happened after the birth of Christ; since the kingdom of Ghassân commenced immediately after that inundation. And some sort of sanction is given to this notion even by Abulfeda e himself, when he intimates, that Amru the son of Jafnah, the second king of Hira, founded many monasteries in Syria. Be that as it will, had the Arab historians not been so defective in point of chronology, their works would have been much more valuable, and deserved a much greater degree of credit, than at present the learned are willing to allow them¹.

(C) In opposition to this it may be urged, that we find several princes called Aretas, kings of the Arabs, seated in Syria, or, at least, near the frontiers of that country, mentioned in the Maccabees, as likewise in Josephus, before the period here hinted at. But to this it may be replied, that these princes might preside over the Dajassian Arabs, expelled by those of the tribe of Azd above-mentioned, or reign in Arabia Petraea and Deserta, especially if we admit Hareth to have been a general name amongst the Arab emirs or phylarchs. And, in support of the last notion, it may be observed, that Petra was the metropolis of the Aretan princes mentioned by Josephus. But we leave our readers to determine for themselves, in relation to the commencement of the kingdoms of Hira and Ghassân. The transactions specified in the passages here referred to, in which the Arabs were concerned, our readers will find an account of in the history of the Jews, to which they properly belong (3).

Some authors relate, that Kidâr, one of Ismael's sons, had the crown resigned to him by his uncles the Jorbamites; but, according to others, the descendants of Ismael expelled that tribe, who retiring to Jobainab, were, after various fortune, at last all destroyed by an inundation. The following catalogue of the kings of Hejâz, taken from Dr. Pecock, is the best that has been hitherto exhibited to the public^m.

After the expulsion of the Jorbamites, the government of Hejâz seems not to have continued many centuries in the hands of one prince, but to have been divided among the heads of tribes; almost in the same manner as the Arabs of the desert are governed at this day. The tribe of Kbozdab, descended from Cablân, the son of Saba, after the inundation of Al Arem, fled into the kingdom of Hejâz, and settled themselves in a valley called Marri, near Mecca; in which territory they founded an aristocracy, assuming to themselves both the government of the city of Mecca, and the custody of the Caaba or temple there. Their name they derived from their being cut off or separated from the other tribes of Taman by the accident above-mentioned. They continued masters of the city and territory of Mecca, as well as presidents of the Caaba, for several ages; till at length one Kofa (C), of the tribe of Koreish, circumvented Abu Gabshan, a weak and silly man, of whom, while in a drunken humour, he bought the keys and custody of the Caaba, for a bottle of wine. But when Abu Gabshan grew cool, and came to reflect upon what he had done, he sufficiently repented of his imprudence; whence the proverbs of the Arabs: More vexed with late repentance than Abu Gabshan; More foolish than Abu Gabshan; which are applied to those persons who part with things of great moment for a trifle, and are afterwards sorry for what they have done. The tribe of Kbozdab endeavoured afterwards to give some disturbance to the Koreish in the possession of what Kofa had purchased; which furnished the latter with an opportunity of divesting the former of the civil government of Mecca. Notwithstanding what has been said, it is not certain, whether the tribe of Kbozdab were the descendants of Ismael or Joktan. We find Amru, one of their kings, a descendant of Cablân, frequently mentioned by the Arab historians; but as nothing remarkable is related either of him, or his son Caab, we shall take no further notice of them. After the Koreish

(C) Kofa was the son of Kalâb, who first gave the months of the year those names by which the Arabs ever since have called them, even to this day. The ancient names were Musumet, Nagiv, Chavan, Savan, Risma, Ida, Asam, Adil, Nasil, Vad, Varna, and Burec. The present names Kalâb derived from some contingencies that happened in the months to which they are applied; which names, receiving a sanction from Mohammed's authority, who made them one of the distinguishing marks of his followers, have been continued ever since they were first imposed. It will not be improper to observe here, that the Arabs had antiently four sacred months, in which they could not carry on any war, especially amongst themselves. Something of this kind was observed amongst the Greeks; since, according to Pausanias, they had always a respite from war, during the time of the celebration of the Olympic games. Some authors intimate, that the ancient Arabs abstained from war only in that month which is at present called Muharrem or Maharrem (3).

had possessed themselves of Mecca, they kept up there the same form of government that before had prevailed^a.

BESIDES the kingdoms that have been already taken notice of, there were some other tribes, which in latter times had princes of their own, and formed states of lesser note. The tribe of Kenda in particular had several kings, of which the three following were the principal^b:

Hojr.

1. Hojr, surnamed Acelo'l Morar, i. e. the eater of Morar, a fruit of a bitter taste, on which camels feed. That surname was given him by his wife, who had an aversion to him, because his lips were so contracted, that they did not cover his teeth; which made him resemble a camel, when brouzing upon the aforesaid shrub. Kenda, from whom the tribe deduced its name, was also called Tbour. Abulfeda asserts, that before the time of Hojr the people of Kenda were without any kind of government, from whence many inconveniences ensued; which induced them to chuse him for their king^c.

Amru.

2. Amru, the son of Hojr, surnamed Al Maksur, i. e. contracted, or confined, because he did not attempt to extend the dominions left him by his father^d.

Al Hâreth.

3. Al Hâreth, the son of Amru, was by Kbofrâ Kobâd elevated to the throne of Hira, and deposed by Anushirwân, for the reasons already mentioned. He endeavoured to avoid his enemies by flying to Diyar Calb, where he died, but in what manner we are not told. Al Hâreth placed his son Hojr over the Bani Asad, and his other sons over other tribes. Hojr was the father of Amrio'l Kais a celebrated poet. The Bani Asad endeavouring to take off Hojr by treachery, he treated them with great rigour and severity; which occasioned his meeting with a violent death. Amrio'l Kais, being apprised of this, assembled a body of forces out of the tribes of Beer and Taglab, with which he defeated the Bani Asad. But afterwards, his troops being dispersed through the fear of Al Mondar, he found himself obliged to fly to the Romans, in order to implore their protection, and died in his return home near Ancyra. Some authors say, that Cæsar gave him a poisoned garment, which was the cause of his death; but Abulfeda looks upon this as a downright fable, meriting no regard. To the kings of Kenda here mentioned we find one Ebn Ommil' Kotam added by Al-Firauzabadius^e.

THE following princes, or chiefs of tribes, deserve likewise a place in the history of the ancient Arabs:

Zohair.

1. Zohair, Ebnol Habab, who presided over the tribe of Kelâb, and, by reason of his wonderful sagacity, was surnamed the wise. He attained to a very old age, and died at last covered with glory. He invaded the Bani Gafsan with a powerful army, because they pretended to build a temple in opposition to the Caaba, and entered into an alliance with Abrahah al Ashram, styled master of the elephant. Notwithstanding what has been said of him here, some authors intimate, that he came to his end by excessive drinking^f.

2. Colab Ebn Rabiab governed the Bani Maad, the Saraceni Maadani of Procopius, and was so proud, that he would not suffer any one to hunt in his neighbourhood, nor any camels to be watered with his, nor any fire to be lighted near that which he himself used. He was at last slain by one Jassas, for shooting a camel named Sarab, that he found grazing on a prohibited spot of ground. This camel belonged to an Arab, who had been entertained by Basus, a near relation of Jassas. The murder of Ebn Rabiab occasioned a forty years war; whence came the Arab proverbs: A worse omen than Sarab; More ominous than Basus. It may not be improper here to observe, that the kings and chiefs of the Arabs generally forbade others to bring their flocks upon those places and pastures, which they chose for themselves. In order to ascertain the limits of these pastures, when they came to a fruitful valley or plain, they caused a dog to bark, and the whole extent of ground over which he could be heard, they appropriated to themselves (D)^g.

(D) Though the flocks and herds of inferior people were absolutely prohibited coming into that spot of ground, which was looked upon as the property of the prince, yet his flocks and herds might go into any of their pastures. Mohammed abolished this custom, and did not permit a spot of ground to be confined to the use of any particular animals, except horses that had served in wars carried on for the propagation of his religion, or camels consecrated to, and set apart for, sacred uses (4).

(4) Poc. not. in carm. Tograi, p. 81. & not. ad spec. hist. Arab. p. 333.

3. Mohalbel Ebn Rabiab, brother to Colaib, formed an army out of the Families Mohalbel, of Taglab, with which he carried on a long and bloody war; as hinted above, with those of Beccr, in order to revenge his brother's death.

4. Zohair Ebn Jodaimab, who received a certain toll or tribute from the Arabs, Zohair, that frequented the celebrated fair of Ocadh above-mentioned, was assassinated by one Khaled, who afterwards fled to Al Nooman king of Hira. That prince took him under his protection; however, he was privately murdered by one Al Hâreth, who had pursued him, which occasioned long and bloody broils.

5. Kais, the son of Zohair Ebn Jodaimab, had two famous horses called Dabes Kais and Gabrab, which ran with two others, upon a challenge, belonging to one Hadifa, for a prize of a hundred camels. This event gave rise to that bloody war called by the Arab historians the war of Dabes and Gabrab, which continued, without intermission, forty years. King Kais, in order to atone for so great an effusion of blood, is said to have embraced the christian religion, and even entered upon the monastic state.

Thus have we gone through the history of the ancient Arabs before Mohammed, as far as it can be collected from the most noted of the Arab historians. But, in order to render that branch of this work we are now upon the more complete, we shall give a brief account of the principal transactions the ancient Arabs were concerned in with the Egyptians, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, extracted from the most approved writers of the two last nations.

ACCORDING to Diodorus Siculus, Sesostris, that is, as Josephus and Sir Isaac Newton will have it, Sesac, in his father's life-time, subdued Arabia. However, that the Arabs were never thoroughly subjugated, nor even long paid any sort of homage to the kings of Egypt, appears from hence, that, according to the same author, Sesac himself was obliged to draw a line from Heliopolis to Pelusium, in order to secure Egypt from the excursions of the Arabs and Syrians. The Scenite Arabs contiguous to Palestine and Syria, therefore, at least, must have been independent on that prince. Nor indeed can it be inferred from Diodorus, that he ever traversed Arabia Felix, though he had a fleet of four hundred sail upon the Red Sea, but only coasted it, or at farthest seized upon some of its maritime provinces in his voyage to India. As the word Arabia sometimes denotes only Arabia Deserta, at other times Arabia Petraea, and sometimes Arabia Felix, or a part of that country, in the Greek and Latin authors, it can by no means be inferred from any of them, that the whole peninsula of the Arabs ever was, at least for any considerable time, in a state of servitude to the Egyptians. But the contrary seems to appear, even from Diodorus Siculus himself, who gives us the most pompous account of the conquests of Sesostris or Sesac.

We learn from the same author, that neither the Assyrians, Medes, nor Persians, could ever get any considerable footing amongst them. The Persian monarchs, indeed, were their friends, and so far respected by them, as to have an annual present of frankincense: yet they could never make them tributary; and were so far from being their masters, that Cambyfes, on his expedition against Egypt, was obliged to ask their leave to pass through their territories. This we learn from Herodotus; nor does any other ancient author, that we know of, contradict him herein.

When Alexander the Great had subdued the Persian empire, notwithstanding his exorbitant power, the Arabians had so little apprehension of him, that they alone, of all the neighbouring nations, sent no ambassadors to him, either first or last; which, with a desire of possessing so rich a country as that they inhabited, made him form a design against them; and, had he not died before he could put it in execution, this people might possibly have convinced him, that he was not invincible. The happiness of its climate, and its great fertility, as well as riches, induced him to attempt the conquest of Arabia, in order to fix there his royal seat, after his return from his Indian expedition. But, according to Strabo, he had another motive likewise to this hazardous undertaking: for, being informed, that the Arabs had only two divinities, Jupiter and Bacchus, whom they worshipped, because they supplied them with all the good things they enjoyed, he was likewise desirous, that they should esteem him as their third deity; and, in order to deserve this, he proposed first to conquer them, and then to leave them in the full possession of their ancient liberty and independency; which he believed would merit divine honours as much as the greatest benefaction. Full, therefore, of this scheme, he fitted out a powerful fleet, composed of ships built in Phœnicia, Cyprus, and Babylonia, to favour the operations of the land-forces. But death put an end to this, as well as all the other towering projects of that ambitious prince ^a.

The Arabs cut in pieces a body of troops sent against them by Antigonus.

Antigonus, after the reduction of Syria and Phœnicia, advanced into that part of Arabia bordering upon those countries, having entertained a notion, that the Arabs were not favourably disposed towards him. However, he did not formally invade them, but detached Aibeneus, one of his captains, with a body of four thousand foot, and six hundred horse, to ravage and lay waste the territories of the Nabathæans. That general marched to Petra without opposition, which finding in no posture of defence, the Nabathæans, then under no apprehension of an enemy, being gone to a neighbouring fair, and having left only their wives, children, sick and aged in Petra, with an inconsiderable garrison, he seized upon it, put to the sword, or took prisoners, all the soldiers found therein, and carried off a booty of five hundred talents of silver, together with a vast quantity of frankincense and myrrh. However, this advantage was owing rather to expedition and surprize, than the valour of his troops, he having traversed two thousand two hundred stadia in thrice twenty-four hours, and they not being apprised of his design; so that no dispositions could possibly be made by them for giving him a proper reception. But the Arabs, receiving intelligence of what had happened, left the fair, and, having assembled a considerable body of forces, pursued the Greeks with great celerity. They found them asleep about two hundred stadia from Petra, without any guards posted to apprise them of any impending danger, not imagining it possible for the Arabs to come up with them so soon. Whereupon they fell upon them, and destroyed the whole detachment, except fifty horse, that made their escape to Antigonus, and brought him the melancholy advice of the blow he had received ^b.

Demetrius undertakes a second expedition against them without success.

HOWEVER, the Nabathæans, dreading the resentment of Antigonus, sent a letter to him written in the Syriac (E) character, to complain of Aibeneus, and to excuse what had happened. That prince, finding it impossible to deal with men inhabiting a desert by pure force, dissembled his resentment, and disowned the orders he had given Aibeneus, telling their ambassadors, that he was well served for his unjust invasion of their country. This gave great satisfaction to the Arabs, though, in order to secure themselves against any unforeseen event, they erected watch-towers to give notice of an approaching enemy, and took care always to have ready a body of troops to repel any sudden incursion. Antigonus, finding them upon their guard, for some time continued in a state of friendship with them; but at last imagining, that a fair opportunity of revenging the late disgrace offered, he sent his son Demetrius, with a choice detachment of four thousand foot, and as many horse, to chastize them for it. But the watch-towers above-mentioned giving them timely notice of the enemy's approach, they threw a sufficient garrison into Petra, and made all the other necessary dispositions for their defence. However, Demetrius arrived before Petra, and immediately attacked it with great fury; but was repulsed, and obliged to draw off. The next day, when he began to renew the attack, an Arab from the walls spoke to him in the following terms: "King Demetrius, what would you have? "What has induced you to invade a people inhabiting the wilderness, where neither water, corn, wine, nor other things you cannot subsist without, are to be found? (E) It is evident from this curious passage, that the Nabathæans, or Ismaelites, used letters above three hundred years before the commencement of the christian æra. These letters probably were the same with those we see on several of the ancient Syriac coins, struck in the times of Alexander's successors, which resemble the Phœnician, if they were not that character. They likewise bear some resemblance to the most ancient Syriac character called the Estrangela, which the learned believe to be three hundred years more ancient than the birth of Christ. This passage, in conjunction with the above-mentioned coins, seems to confirm that notion. The probability of a great affinity betwixt the most an-tient Syriac and Arabic alphabets from hence likewise plainly appears; and that they both, as well as the Phœnician, were deduced from the ancient Hebrew or Assyrian letters, we have elsewhere observed. The present Arabic letters derive their origin from the same source. The alphabet of the Mendeans or Nabathæans, at present in use amongst the posterity of the old Assyrians and Chaldeans, given us by Dr. Hyde, is only a corruption of the old Syriac letters. In short, this passage, as we apprehend, may lead us, by a proper attention to it, to several curious discoveries, equally entertaining and useful (s).

You can never force us to change our sentiments, nor way of life, neither can you, for want of necessaries, stay long here: therefore we desire you to retire out of our country, as we have never injured you, to accept of some presents from us, and to prevail upon your father Antigonus to rank the Nabathæan Arabs amongst his friends." Demetrius, having received such presents as were agreed upon between him and their chief, and hostages for their future good behaviour, raised the siege, and marched with his army to the lake of Asphaltitis, where he encamped. Plutarch relates, that Demetrius's surprising intrepidity in the most imminent dangers so astonished the Arabs, that they not only suffered him to retire quietly out of their territories, but also to carry off with him an immense booty, and, among other things,

Antigonus was greatly dissatisfied with the ill success of this expedition, imagining, that the Arabs would grow more insolent upon it. But he appeared highly pleased with his son Demetrius, for discovering the lake Asphaltitis, which, it seems, till that time, had been unknown to the Greeks, especially as he imagined his revenue would be much increased by the bitumen brought from off that lake. He appointed, therefore, Hieronymus Cardianus the historian his treasurer for that part of the revenue, ordering him to build ships, and collect all the bitumen that could be got out of the lake. But the Arabs, being apprised of this, drew together a body of six thousand men, with which they attacked the people Cardianus employed, and cut them almost all off; which obliged Antigonus to lay aside the project he had formed. Mr. Sale says, he does not find any of Alexander's successors, either in Asia or Egypt, ever to have made any attempts upon the Arabs, which we own ourselves astonished at. As greatly are we surprised to find, that the passage he quotes on this occasion makes directly against him d.

As for the Romans, they never conquered any part of Arabia properly so called; though that the Arabs submitted to Lucullus, is asserted by Plutarch. The most they did was to make some tribes tributary to them, as Pompey did one commanded by Sampsiceramus or Sbams' alkerâm, who reigned at Hems or Emesa. His people were more civilized, and lived under a better form of government, than the other Arabs, as we learn from Strabo e.

THAT the Arabs frequently made dreadful incursions into Syria, whilst under the Romans, we have already observed from Strabo; and are now farther to observe, that these incursions sometimes brought upon them the Roman arms. Pompey, as we learn from Plutarch, obliged one Aretas, an Arab prince, whose dominions bordered upon Syria and Mesopotamia, to submit to him, and to receive a Roman garrison: and the same general likewise subdued the Arabs, who dwelt about mount Amanus, by his lieutenant Afranius. After which the king of the Arabs residing in Petra, who till now had made no account of the Romans, submitted himself by letter to him; but that Pompey ever possessed himself of that strong-hold, does not appear. Plutarch rather seems to insinuate, that he was recalled from thence, by the death of Mithridates, before he could make full proof of the sincerity of that prince's submission. And this is the more probable, because Gabinus, who succeeded soon after to the government of Syria, made preparations for an expedition against the Arabians, but was diverted from his design by Ptolemy's solicitation to be restored to his kingdom f.

Agbarus, or, according to others, Ariamnes, not far from the time we are now upon, an Arab emir or phylarch, misled and deluded Crassus to his own destruction. Not long after which event, the Arabs probably defended the Palmyrenians, when Antony sent a detachment of horse to ravage their city. For Appian tells us, that the body of troops defending them consisted of archers, who excelled in that way; which is one of the most distinguishing characteristics of the Arabs g.

BUT none of the Romans ever penetrated so far into Arabia as Ælius Gallus, or Ælius Gallus's Ælius Lartus, as he is called by Dio, in the reign of the emperor Augustus. That general, after traversing vast deserts, came within two days journey of the aromatic parts of Arabia. For the carrying on of this expedition, he built eighty biremes, besides several triremes, and a great number of smaller vessels, imagining, that a fleet of such ships would be of signal service to him. But, finding himself deceived in that expectation, he equipped another fleet consisting of a hundred and thirty transports, with which, after he had put on board all his forces, he sailed for Leucocome, a maritime city of the Nabathæans on the coast of the Red Sea. As this was an extremely dangerous navigation, on account of the many rocks and shelves, which are in that part of the Arabian gulf, and Syllæus, who had undertaken to be his guide, treacherously conducted him the worst way through it, he was fifteen days in his passage, and lost many of his ships. Had he marched his army by land, as was at first intended, he might have avoided this disaster; but Syllæus prevented the execution of that salutary design, informing Gallus, that there was no safe passage by land for his troops through the country of the Nabathæans, though nothing was more common than for merchants to travel through it in caravans almost as numerous as an army. Soon after his arrival at Leucocome, a strange distemper, that chiefly affected the mouth and thighs of the patient, made great havock in his army, which obliged him to remain inactive in that neighbourhood the remaining part of the summer, and the following winter. This distemper, according to Dio, first seized the head, where, if it settled, it proved mortal; but if the humour occasioning it retired into the thighs, the patient recovered. Early in the spring Gallus, moving out of his winter-quarters, advanced to the frontiers of Hira, where he met with a most kind reception from Al Hareth, or, as Strabo names him, Aretas, a near relation of Abd Wadd, or Obodas, king of the Nabathæans, his ally. After a short stay here, he resumed his march, and in thirty days having crossed a vast desert, he arrived upon the borders of Arrarena, a country inhabited by the Sce-nite Arabs, and governed by one Sabus. This region he likewise traversed in fifty days, and took post with all his forces at the city of Najrân, seated in a pleasant and fruitful country, whose king abandoned it upon his approach. Gallus, having taken this city by assault, continued his march southward, and arrived the sixth day at a river, where he was met by a numerous body of Arabs, who had assembled with a design to dispute his passage; but as they were only a raw and undisciplined multitude, armed with lances, bows and arrows, swords, slings, hatchets, &c. in an irregular manner, Gallus easily routed them, and cut ten thousand of them in pieces, with the loss of two men only. He then made himself master of several considerable places without opposition, and penetrated as far as Marisyabæ, a city of the Rhamanites, governed by a petty prince named Ilasarus, or Al Asar, which he besieged ineffectually, being obliged to drop that enterprize for want of water. In the mean time, finding his men carried off daily in great numbers, by various distempers proceeding from the heat of the climate, the insalubrity of the air, water, and herbs of the country, he thought it adviseable to march back into the country of the Nabathæans, and from thence pursue his route into Egypt. Accordingly, he set out on his march homeward, and, by the assistance of more faithful guides, reached the city of Negra, one of Obodas's maritime towns, by the road of Anagrana, Cbaalla, Maloiba, &c. in sixty days. Here he imbarqued his troops, and, crossing the Arabian gulf, landed at Myos Hormus, on the Egyptian side; from whence he led back the poor remains of his army to Alexandria. The bad success Gallus met with on this occasion ought to be attributed chiefly to the treachery of Syllæus, whose view, in the total destruction of the Roman army, seems to have been the acquisition of some of the Roman conquests for his master Obodas, who likewise concurred with his chief minister, by not supporting Gallus, as he had promised. Be that as it will, the Roman general discovered the perfidy of Syllæus before his return out of Arabia; but, for some political reasons, he thought proper then to dissemble his resentment. However, after his arrival in Egypt, he sent the traitor to Rome, where, for this, and other enormous crimes, he had his head struck off by the emperor's order; that thereby others might be deterred from the like villainous conduct for the future. We must not omit observing, that Gallus spent two years in this unfortunate expedition^f.

The Roman
 historians falsely assert Trajan to have conquered Arabia.

FROM this time to the reign of Trajan, we hear little of Arabia; but the eighth year of that reign was famous for the intire reduction of Arabia Petræa by Aulus Cornelius Palma, governor of Syria, according to Dio. Eusebius relates, that the inhabitants

- a inhabitants of Petra and Bostra computed their time from this year, in which their country was first annexed to the Roman empire. Nay, Arrian, Eutropius, Lucian, and Dio, intimate, that Trajan conquered Arabia Felix, which seems to be confirmed by some medals coined after the fourteenth year of his reign; and meditated the conquest of India. But all this was gross flattery, meriting not the least regard, as will appear from the reception the Hagarenes gave him, when he marched against them about six years after the period above-mentioned. This, which happened in the last year of Trajan, is a convincing proof, that he never was master of Arabia Petraea, much less Arabia Felix, notwithstanding the mean adulation of his coins, orators, and historians.
- b Trajan, receiving intelligence, that the Hagarenes had declared against him, marched from Ctesiphon into their territories with a powerful army, and laid siege to their capital city. As it was situated on the top of a high and steep mountain, surrounded with strong walls, seated in a barren country, and defended by a numerous garrison, Trajan could not reduce it, though he made a breach in the wall. The emperor narrowly escaped being killed in one of the attacks; for, having laid aside the ensigns of his dignity, that he might not be known, he headed his men in person: but the enemy knowing him, notwithstanding that disguise, by his grey hairs, and majestic air, aimed chiefly at him, wounded his horse, and killed a horseman by his side. Besides, as often as the Romans advanced to the attack, they were driven back by violent storms of wind, rain, and hail, and dreadful flashes of lightning. The apparitions of rainbows likewise dazzled and frightened them in an extraordinary manner. And at the same time they were in a strange manner infested in their camp by swarms of flies; so that Trajan was in the end obliged to raise the siege, and retire. As the metropolis of the Hagarenes, from some circumstances hinted at by Dio, must have been the same with the modern Errakim or Arrakeb, we cannot help thinking, that the Romans were never absolute masters of even Arabia Petraea, whatever homage they might have received from the Arabs of that country. Neither are their coins, an evidence of good authority in some points, to be relied on in the present case; as will more fully appear from an observation already made towards the close of the history of the Ethiopians.
- c ABOUT eighty years after, the emperor Severus, being greatly incensed at the Arabs bordering on Syria, for assisting Niger, laid siege to Ara their capital with a formidable army, and a vast train of military engines invented by Priseus, the most celebrated mechanic of his age. He pushed on the siege with incredible vigour, not being able to bear, that of all nations the Hagarenes only should stand out still against the Romans. Being repulsed in the first attack with great slaughter, he ordered a second to be made; when he might have carried the place, but chose rather to sound a retreat, hoping, by this means, to induce the Arabs to sue for peace; which he was determined not to grant, except they would discover their hidden treasures supposed to be consecrated to the Sun. But for a whole day they made not the least overture. In the mean time the ardor of his troops cooled to such a degree, that the Europeans refused to begin another assault, and the Syrians were repulsed in one that they made. This so chagrined the emperor, that, when one of his officers represented to him, that he would engage to storm the place with five hundred and fifty European soldiers, he replied, But where shall I find so many? God, says the historian, preserved the town by the backwardness of the emperor one day, and by that of his troops the next. He was, therefore, obliged to raise the siege, and retire, with great precipitation, into his own dominions.
- d FROM this time to the birth of Mohammed we find not many particulars of moment related of the Arabs in general, or of the Saracens, the most noted people of them, in particular, by the Greek and Latin historians. The Saracens, however, we are told, ravaged Mesopotamia in the time of the emperor Constantius, and joined the Persians against Julian. That prince, it seems, and some of his predecessors, had paid the Saracens a pension, that they might have a body of troops always on foot for the service of the Romans: but this he took into his head to discontinue; and when they sent deputies to complain of this treatment, Julian told them, that a warlike prince had steel, but no gold; which they resenting, went over to the Persian, and ever after continued faithful to him. Mavia, queen of the Saracens, sent a body of her troops to the assistance of the Romans against the Goths, who, after the defeat and death of Valens, by their vigorous sallies, forced those barbarians to retire from before Constantinople, which metropolis they had besieged. About the year of the christian æra 411. they committed great disorders on the frontiers of Egypt, Palestine, Phœnicia, and Syria; but soon retired of their own accord. In the reign of Theodosius, Alamundarus, or Al Mondar, with a numerous army, assisted the Persians against that prince; but the greatest part of his men, being seized with an unaccountable panic, threw themselves headlong into the Euphrates, where, to the number of an hundred thousand, they are said to have perished. A. D. 452. the Saracens, Nubians, and Blemmyes, broke into the Roman empire; but were overthrown by the troops of the emperor Marcian, and forced to sue for peace, which the emperor granted them upon terms highly advantageous to the empire. In the beginning of the sixth century, a prince of the Mondar family, who was a renowned warrior, did incredible damage to the Romans, as we learn from Procopius. He so harassed them for fifty years together, by ravaging all their territories from the borders of Egypt to the confines of Mesopotamia, killing vast numbers of their subjects, and exacting immense sums for the redemption of others taken prisoners, that, to use Procopius's expression, he brought them quite down upon their knees. He flew from Egypt to Mesopotamia like lightning, being so quick in his incursions, that the Roman troops scarce ever began their march to put a stop to his depredations, before he had brought his plunder home. He generally defeated the Romans, when he found himself obliged to come to an engagement with them. In one action he made a whole Roman corps prisoners, with their general Demostratus, the brother of Rufinus, and John the son of Lucas, for whose ransom he had an immense sum of money paid him. Being at the head of all the Saracens bordering upon the Persian dominions, and capable of making an irruption into which of the neighbouring Roman provinces he pleased, he was one of the most formidable enemies the Romans had. None of their generals, nor any of the Arab phylarchs in their interest, could ever make head against him. Justinian, in order to annoy him, vested Aretas, another Arab prince, with the regal dignity, thinking this would enable him to push on the war with greater vigour against Alamundarus, for so Procopius calls him. However, Al Mondar was victorious in every engagement with Aretas, either vanquishing him by downright force, or prevailing upon him to betray the Romans. In fine, this prince, with Azaretbes the Persian general, defeated the renowned Belisarius, and scattered terror where-ever he came. The dispute he had with Aretas, who pleaded the cause of the Romans, about a territory called Strata, our readers will find related in Procopius. But as the rapid conquests of the Saracens, and the principal transactions they were concerned in, happened after the death of Mohammed, we shall reserve what we have to say of that warlike nation, till we come to the modern history of Arabia.

Arabia famous for heresies, after the introduction of christianity.

THAT Arabia, after the introduction of christianity, was famous for heresies, has been already observed. The Hamyarites were infected with the Arian heresy in the reign of the emperor Constantius, as we learn from Theophilus Indus in Philostorgius. Some christians of this nation believed, that the soul died with the body, and was to be raised again with it at the last day. These Origen is said to have convinced. The heresies of Ebion, Beryllus, the Nazaræans, and Collyridians, were also broached, or at least propagated, among the Arabs. The Collyridians were so denominated from a sort of twisted cake called collyris, which they offered to the virgin Mary, whom they worshipped as God. Other sects likewise there were within the borders of Arabia, who took refuge there from the proscriptions of the imperial edicts; several of whose notions Mohammed incorporated with his religion, as will hereafter be shewn.

^a THE Jews, though an inconsiderable and despised people in other parts of the world, were very powerful in Arabia, whither they fled from the destruction of Jerusalem, as well as the great havock made amongst them by the emperor Haarian, and brought over several tribes to their religion. The Jews of Hamyar, we are told, not far from the time of Dbu Nowás above-mentioned, challenged some neighbouring christians to a public disputation, which was held sub dio three days, before the king and his nobility, and all the people. The disputants were Gregentius, bishop of Tephra or Dbasár for the christians, and Herbanus for the Jews. On the third day Herbanus, to end the dispute, demanded, that Jesus of Nazareth, if he were really living, and in heaven, and could hear the prayers of his worshippers, should appear from heaven in their sight, and they would then believe on him; the Jews crying out, with one voice, Shew us your Christ, alas, and we will become christians. Whereupon, after a terrible storm of thunder and lightning, Jesus Christ appeared in the air, surrounded with rays of glory, walking on a purple cloud, having a sword in his hand, and an inestimable diadem on his head; and spake these words over the heads of the assembly: Behold, I appear to you in your sight, I, who was crucified by your fathers. After which the cloud received him from their sight. The christians hereupon cried out, Lord, have mercy upon us; but the Jews were stricken blind, and recovered not, till they were all baptized ^m.

^c Dbu Nowás, as has been observed, was a Jew, and persecuted all, the christians particularly, who were not of his religion. He burnt three hundred and forty christians in the city of Najrán only. Not content with this, he sent an embassy to Ab Mondar, king of Hira, offering him large sums of money, if he would persecute the christians throughout his dominions. The patriarch of Alexandria pressing Elefbaas (E) the Najasbi, or king of Ethiopia, to revenge such inhuman cruelty, that prince crossed the streights of Bab-al-Manaab with a fleet of four hundred and twenty-three sail, and an army of an hundred and twenty thousand men, with which he made a descent in Yaman. With these forces he overthrew Dbu Nowás, seized upon his kingdom, and made St. Aretas's son governor of Najrán. The Abassines kept possession of this kingdom, till they were driven out by Seif the son of Dbu Yazon of the tribe of Hamyar, who was, however, himself slain by some of them that had been left behind. The war of the elephant we have already given our readers an account of; and therefore shall conclude our history of the ancient Arabs, or the time of ignorance, as it is called by the Mohammedans, with observing, that Abd al Motalleb, the grandfather of Mohammed, was prince or chief of the Koreish at the time this war happened; that Mohammed himself was born the very year the Abassines were overthrown in their expedition to Mecca; that on this year, A. D. 578. commenced the æra of the elephant, from which the Arabs computed their time for

Conclusion of the history of the ancient Arabs.

(E) According to some of the Syriac writers, Elefbaas or Elefbaan, whom they call Aidog, king of Ethiopia, undertook an expedition against one Dimian, king of the Hamyarites, for massacring some christian merchants, that were Romans, in their passage through Yaman into Ethiopia; which he did, to revenge the cruelties exercised on the Jews, of whose communion, it seems, he was a member, in the dominions of the Roman emperor. They add, that Elefbaas did not undertake this expedition out of a religious motive, but to revenge the injury his subjects might sustain in point of trade on this occasion. Before the Arab and Ethiopian armies engaged, Elefbaas, according to the same authors, vowed solemnly to embrace the christian religion, in case he was victorious. The armies then joining battle, Dimian was vanquished and slain, and Elefbaas or Aidog professed himself a christian, and placed a christian prince upon the throne of Hamyar. Upon the death of this king, the Jews, who were still very numerous there, found means to fix Dbu Nowás upon that throne, who, at their instigation, proved a bitter enemy to the christians. The particulars of his cruel behaviour towards them are set forth at large by Metaphrastes, Simeon Beth-Arsamensu, and other authors of good repute already mentioned (5).

(F) This was called the unjust and impious war, because the principal actions of it happened betwixt the Kais Ailan and the Koreish, two powerful Arabian tribes, in the sacred months above-mentioned. These sacred months were Moharram, Rajeb, Dulkaada, and Dulhaga. In them all acts of hostility amongst the jarring tribes, how violent soever their resentment might be, intirely ceased. They then laid aside all weapons of war, and conversed together in the most friendly manner. Nay, if an Arab met with the person that had killed his father or brother, he could not then offer any violence to him. The Hejra did not take place, till it was agreed upon in the khalifat of Omar, that the Arabs should suppose their time from thence (6).

(G) Several remarkable events supplied the Arabs with epochs before the Hejra, viz. the invasion and reduction of Yaman by the Abassines; the expulsion of the Amalekites, by the family of Jorham, from the territory of Mecca; the battle of Ebn Weyel; the wars called Al Bajus and Dakes; the inundation of Al Arem; the fire Derar, which appeared in a stony district of the kingdom of Yaman, &c. The people of Yaman, however, for the most part, supposed their time according to the reigns of their kings (7).

CHAP. [X].

The history of the empires of Nice and Trapezond, from their foundation, the former by Theodore Lascaris, and the latter by the Comneni, to their final abolition, the one by Michael Paleologus, the other by Mohammed the Great.

THESE are the two last empires we have left to mention on the other side ^b the Mediterranean, and before we repass into Europe. We have given them the last place, and have joined them in the same chapter, as they were of the modernest date, smallest extent, and shortest duration, of any of those we have had occasion to speak of, either in Asia or Africa, that are now extinct; and as they were both dismembered from the Greek empire about the same time, that is, soon after the taking of its great metropolis by the Latins, mentioned in a former volume^a. That of Nice was founded by Theodore Lascaris, and that of Trapezond by David and Alexius Comnenus, whilst Baldwin reigned at Constantinople. As for the Vandals, and their kingdom in Africa, it made so small and short a figure, and we know so little of its extent, and other particulars, except what we have so lately taken notice ^c of in their history, that we think we need not repeat it here; but refer our readers to a former chapter of this volume, p. 532—559, & seq.

The empire and emperors of Nice.

Theodore La-^a 1. THEODORUS Lascaris, son-in-law to the tyrant Alexius Angelus, having happily escaped out of Constantinople, and fled into Bithynia, was there received with such demonstrations of joy by the inhabitants, that he soon made himself Nice.

^a See vol. vi. p. 627. p. II.

- a master of Phrygia, Myfia, Lydia, and Ionis, from the Meander to the Black or Euxine Sea. These he erected into an empire, and fixed his imperial residence in the famous city of Nice, from which this new empire took its name^b. It was not long, however, before he saw himself invaded by two powerful enemies, his father-in-law, and Jathelines sultan of Iconium, his old friend and ally, whom he called to his assistance against the new emperor. They marched accordingly against him with an army of twenty thousand men, and laid siege to the city of Antioch, on the Meander, the then boundary of this new empire on that side. Lascares, though he could then muster but two thousand men, was yet forced to march to the relief of that place, lest its falling into their hands should open them a way to the heart of his dominions. They were surprised to find him come so suddenly, and with such a handful of men, against them; but such was his valour, and that of his troops, especially of eight hundred of his Italians, that he gave the enemy a signal overthrow: but his Greeks being somewhat intimidated at the sight of the superior enemy, the sultan, thinking that a proper time to renew the onset, fell suddenly upon them, and, having singled Lascares out, threw him off his horse at the first blow. Lascares soon recovered himself, unhorsed his competitor, struck off his head, and, fixing it on the point of a lance, threw the enemy into such a panic, that they betook themselves to flight. Alexius, the author of this war, was taken prisoner, and carried in triumph to Nice, where he ended his days in a monastery, where Lascares had confined him. The Turks were soon after glad to accept of such a peace as he was pleased to grant to them; and another being concluded between him and Henry the brother and successor of Baldwin, he was then at full leisure to secure his new-founded empire to himself and successors, which he did with vast success and bravery, both against the Turks and Latins, during the space of eighteen years^c.

Defeats Angelus and the Turks.

- At his death he left only a son, then an infant, and three daughters, the eldest of whom, named Irene, he had married to the brave John Ducas, surnamed Valaces, to whom he bequeathed his new monarchy; tho' he had two brothers, viz. Alexius and Angelus, whom it might be expected he would have entrusted with the care of his son and empire: but he seems to have been more intent in strengthening and enlarging the latter, than to secure it to his nearest kindred; and accordingly named his son-in-law his successor, as the most capable of answering his design; and such he really proved.

His death and successor.

2. John Ducas was accordingly crowned at Nice by Manuel the great patriarch, and proved no less brave and successful than his predecessor. We have formerly had occasion to mention his great success against the Turks, and especially the Latins, whom he defeated in several battles, and from whom he took a considerable number of places, which we shall forbear repeating here^d. He died after a glorious reign of thirty-three years, in the sixty-second of his age, after having extended his conquests, not only in Asia, but in Europe, and even almost to the gates of Constantinople; and was succeeded by his son,

3. Theodore Lascares; who, during his short reign, was likewise very successful against the Bulgarians, and the despot of Epirus, as we have formerly seen^e. One great oversight this prince was guilty of, was, the recalling the traitor Michael Pateologus, who was gone from him over to the Turks, and restoring him to his former dignity; for that gave him an opportunity of depriving his son of the empire, as we shall soon see. Theodore died in the third year of his reign, and was succeeded by his son,

4. John Lascares, then about nine years of age; for which reason his father committed him, and the care of the empire, to Arjenius the then patriarch of Nice, and to the famed Muzalo, a person indeed of mean extract, but of great merit and fidelity, and deservedly raised to the highest posts in the empire. For this, Muzalo incurred the envy of the nobles, who, notwithstanding the solemn oath which he had obliged them to take to the young prince, rushed with their swords drawn upon that brave minister, on the very day and place where the funeral obsequies of the deceased monarch were performed; and, in the midst of the divine service, dispatched him at the foot of the altar, to which he had fled for sanctuary. It is not improbable, a that the treacherous Paleologus had the greatest hand in the contriving and conducting of this assassination, as it was the most likely means to open him the way to the seizing on the imperial dignity, which he never must have so much as aimed at, whilst the young prince was under the care of so brave and worthy a guardian. However that be, Muzalo was no sooner dispatched out of his way, but the traitor caused himself to be chosen to succeed him in the guardianship of the young emperor, and to be declared protector of the empire, without the least notice or regard to the patriarch, who, tho' no consummate statesman, was yet a person of singular learning and merit.

and treason.
A. C. 1259.

A. C. 1261.

His new dignity was soon after signalized with a complete overthrow, which his b brother John gave to the despot of Epirus, who had then invaded the provinces of Thrace and Macedon. The news of this action no sooner reached Magnesia, the place where the new protector then resided, but he was saluted emperor by a number of his creatures, both of the nobility and populace. For this the worthy patriarch threatened to excommunicate him, and all his adherents; and Paleologus found no better expedient to ward off the blow, than by binding himself under a solemn oath to resign the empire to the young prince, as soon as he came to be of age. This having for the present satisfied the too credulous prelate, he was easily persuaded to crown him emperor. As we are no further concerned with any particulars of that usurper's reign, than as they relate to the Nicean empire, to which he now put c an end, we shall refer our readers to what has been said of them in a former volume f; and only add here, that having soon after, that is, in the second year of his reign, taken Constantinople from the Latins, he removed the seat of the empire from Nice to that antient metropolis, where he caused himself to be crowned afresh emperor of the east. The unfortunate young prince fell a sacrifice to that tyrant's ambition, who caused, not long after, his eyes to be put out, and himself to be proclaimed the sole lawful and rightful possessor of the empire. Arsenius, now convinced, though too late, of his fatal credulity, thundered out an excommunication against him, and all his adherents; but neither this, nor the great opposition which he met with from abroad, could wrest the empire from him, tho' it proved d a very troublesome and thorny one, as we have elsewhere shewn e. This was the end of the Nicean empire, about fifty-seven years after its foundation. As for Nice, the metropolis of it, though it was in a great measure divested of its grandeur by the removal of the court to Constantinople, yet it continued to be so considerable a city, that it passed once and again from the Greeks to the Turks, and back again, till it was at length taken by Orchanes in the manner as has been heretofore related h.

The empire of Trapezond.

The foundation of the empire of Trapezond.
A. C. 1204.

THIS monarchy, which was founded, as we lately hinted, much about the e same time with that of Nice, lasted much longer, and made a much more considerable figure in the world. It took its name from the famed city of Trapezond or Trapezus, which was now made the imperial seat of the Comneni, and metropolis of this their new empire (A). David and Alexius Comneni

f Before vol. vi. p. 632, & seq. p. 641, & seq.

* Ibid. p. 634, & seq. ex PACHYM. l. i. & ii. pass.

b Before, ibid.

(A) Trapezus or Trapezond, called also Trebizond, and by the Turks Tarabozan, was a Greek city in Pontus, founded by the antient Sinopians, and tributary to them, as we learn from Xenophon, who marched by it in his famous retreat, spoken of in a former volume (1). It is situate on the foot of a hill, which makes a kind of peninsula, on the Black or Euxine Sea, where it begins to turn towards the east. Its port is large and convenient, and the city itself well peopled, and surrounded with steep mountains (2).

It was formerly of such consideration, that the emperors of Constantinople always kept a deputy there; and, since its being brought under the Turks, it is become the residence of a begler-beigh. After the overthrow of Mithridates, who had taken it, the Romans restored it, as they did most of the Greek cities in Asia, to its former privileges and liberty (3).

But

^a neni (B), grandsons to the tyrant Andronicus, who had been lately put to such a cruel, yet deserved death by Isaac Angelus, as we have formerly seen¹, were the first founders of it. These, having the good fortune to escape out of Constantinople together, came and seized on the more eastern parts of Pontus, Galatia, and Cappadocia, and erected them into an empire; and Trapezond being then the strongest and most considerable city in their dominions, they made it the seat of their residence, and called their new empire by its name. It doth not indeed appear, that they immediately took upon them the imperial title; much less, that they were soon acknowledged as such. On the contrary, Vincent de Beauvais styles them only lords of Trapezond^k; but it is plain, that they soon arrived at a considerable height of power and interest, since the emperor Baldwin, about thirty-four years after their settling at Trapezond, sought their alliance and friendship, and was by them assisted in some considerable enterprizes against Vasaces emperor of Nice, who had invaded some of his dominions, as we hinted under the last article, and elsewhere^l. However, it is not improbable, that neither these of Trapezond, nor those of Nice, took upon them the title of emperors till some time after the foundation of their monarchies; perhaps, as some conjecture^m, not till the usurper Michael Paleologus had seized on that of Nice, and got himself crowned emperor at Constantinople; at which time the Comneni, either in contempt to him, or because they could not brook an inferior title to his, did likewise assume the imperial dignity. However that be, it is certain, that, after they had once assumed it, their successors maintained it with great success and bravery; and caused themselves to be acknowledged as such by foreign powers, as long as their empire lasted, that is, till it was subdued and put an end to by Mohammed the Great, who, like an irresistible inundation, drove all before him, as we shall see at the conclusion of this chapter.

THE Trapezuntines were of the Greek church, and after the foundation of this new empire they had a patriarch of their own; but, whether chosen by the emperor, or the clergy, can only be darkly guessed at. After their becoming subject to the Turks, the latter still chose their patriarchs, who were afterwards confirmed by the sultan. This was done every-where, it seems, throughout the Turkish conquests, in the same manner as it was practised under the christian emperors, that is, without paying any fine to the treasury. The clergy of Trapezond were the first who caused this dignity to be saddled with one of a thousand ducats; which by degrees came afterwards to extend to those of their other conquests. The occasion of it being somewhat remarkable, we shall give it our reader in the margin (C). As for other particulars of their religion, laws, customs, &c. there is the less necessity to dwell longer

But what rendered it still more famous, was, its being made and continued the imperial residence of the Comneni from the foundation of their empire we are now upon, to the taking it by Mohammed II. of which we shall speak in due place. The reader may see an account of its present situation, commerce, &c. in the volume last quoted.

Aristotle tells us of a kind of honey that was gathered off the box-trees in the neighbourhood of Trapezond, which was an almost infallible cure for the epilepsy; but adds, that if any person in health did venture to eat of it, it bereaved them of their senses (4): he doth not tell us indeed whether it was this very Trapezond we are speaking of, or some other; for there were more cities of that name, particularly one in Arcadia, said to have been founded by, and named from, Trapezus the son of Lycæon.

(B) The family of the Comneni was very antient and considerable. The reader may see a long account of it in the author quoted in the margin (5); but it became much more so after its having been honoured with the imperial diadem in the person of Isaac Comnenus, who was raised to that dignity against Michael Stratioticus, by the officers of the army, as we have formerly seen (6). Andronicus, the grandfather of these Comneni, was of that family, and uncle to Alexius Comnenus then upon the throne, but no more than twelve years of age: against him he raised a revolt, in which he caused himself and young Alexius to be saluted as co-partners, and took him as his colleague to the empire, but soon after caused him to be murdered; for which, and his other tyrannies and cruelties, he was put to a most shameful and dreadful death (7).

(C) The Trapezuntines were at that time under a patriarch named Mark, who was so ill beloved by his clergy, and by the nobles and people, that they agreed upon depriving him of his dignity, and to nominate unto it one Simeon, a countryman of theirs, then a monk or canon at the great church of Constantinople, a person of merit on several accounts, but especially for his extraordinary hospitality. To compass their design, they fell upon the fol-longer on them, considering that these two empires were only dismembered from the a grand one, and differed in nothing from it but in their change of government, or rather governors. As for their trade, considering the excellent situation of their metropolis, and of some other of their cities, of which we have formerly given an account in the Pontic history *, we need not doubt but the emperors encouraged it all they could; and the medals produced by Tournefort †, as well as the coins mentioned by Du Fresne ‡, leave us no room to doubt of the trade and opulence, both of their empire, and its metropolis, tho', since their falling into the hands of the Turks, they have fared like all the rest of their conquests, and greatly failed of their ancient commerce and splendor. It only remains, that we give an account of the Trapezontine monarchs from Alexius their founder to David their last emperor, and of their b different wars, by which they maintained themselves in their high dignity against so many powerful enemies, such as were, some time, the Latins and the Greeks, especially those of the new Nicean empire, and at other times the Turks, Saracens, Persians, &c. These would doubtless make a considerable figure in this history, had they been transmitted to us in an uninterrupted series; but the misfortune is, that the Byzantine historians, from whom we have all our chief intelligence, have only mentioned them occasionally, and as they were immediately linked with the affairs of the Constantinopolitan empire; so that we must be content with the series of those eleven emperors, and with such few particulars as we find recorded of them. We shall only add, that the duration of the Trapezontine empire was about two hundred c and fifty-seven or two hundred fifty-eight years, being founded in the year of Christ 1204. and subdued An. 1461. or 1462.

Emperors of Trapezond.

Alexius the Great.

11 ALEXIUS Comnenus, surnamed the Great, and his brother David, were the sons of Manuel, and grandsons of the tyrant Andronicus Comnenus. We have already spoken of the usurpation and tyranny, as well as the dismal end, of the latter. As for Manuel, he was the eldest son of Andronicus; but was so unlike his d father in his vices, that he was disinherited and imprisoned by him (D), and his next brother John appointed his successor; but, when he found the whole populace exasperated at it, he then tried in vain to appease them, by pretending, that he always designed the empire for Manuel, and promising to name him to it. Upon the death of Andronicus, and the restoration of Isaac Angelus, or rather soon after the taking of Constantinople by the Latins, Manuel's two sons, Alexius and his brother David, fled into Pontus, seized on Heraclea, and soon after made themselves masters of that lowing doughty expedient: they accused Mark of having introduced a new kind of simony, till then unheard of among them, that is, to have agreed to pay one thousand ducats into the sultan's treasury, as soon as he was confirmed in his dignity. The innocent patriarch in vain endeavoured to wipe off the foul accusation by the most solemn oaths; his enemies had bribed so many considerable persons, some of them ecclesiastics, to swear it against him, that he was adjudged guilty, and not only ipso facto deprived of his dignity, but also worthy of excommunication and banishment. This being done, they took one thousand ducats, and went with them to the sultan, and told him, that since Mark, a person odious to the clergy and laity, had promised him that sum upon his elevation to the patriarchate, they would now pay it to his highness, provided they might be permitted to raise their favourite monk to it.

The sultan, who knew nothing of such a promise, could not at first forbear smiling at the proposal, and hesitated some time whether he should accept of it; at length considering, that this would serve for a good precedent to oblige the future candidates to that dignity to the payment of the like sum, owned to them, that Mark had indeed promised it to him: But, continued he, and taking the money at the same time, since he is so obnoxious to you, c'en turn him out, and appoint whom you will in his place; which was done accordingly (8).

(D) Among other things, by which Manuel disobliged his father, one was, that he constantly refused to marry Agnes the daughter of Philip king of the Franks, and wife of Alexius the deposed emperor of Constantinople, though his father earnestly pressed him to it, and promised him, upon his complying, to make him partner in the empire. His refusal, which, our author says (9), he excused on account of such a marriage being contrary to the ecclesiastical laws, did so incense the tyrant, that at last he cast him into a prison, and appointed his next son to succeed him (10).

- a whole province, together with Paphlagonia, Colchis, Galatia, Cappadocia, with some others of less note; and Alexius fixed his imperial seat at Trapezond 9. He soon after made an alliance with Baldwin emperor of Constantinople, and assisted him against Theodore Lascaris, as we have already hinted. It doth not however appear, that he took the imperial title, most authors being of opinion, that it was either his grandson or great-grandson that first assumed it; and that he only took that of duke or lord of Trapezond, as he is called by an ancient author, who mentions him on account of his being used to furnish the sultan of Iconium with two hundred lances. He was succeeded by,
2. — Comnenus; and he by
- b. 3. — Comnenus (E); of whose name and father we know nothing but what was hinted in the last note.
4. John Comnenus; the first, as is generally supposed, that took upon him the title of emperor. We hinted, a little higher, the probable reason of his assuming it, viz. out of emulation against Michael Paleologus. To this we may add what a contemporary author, who was protonotary to the said Paleologus, says; viz. that John rather suffered himself to be complimented with it by the Greeks, out of spite and contempt to that usurper, who, by his submission to the pope, and uniting the Greek and Latin churches, had rendered himself odious to them. Another, who lived near the same time, hints much the same thing, when he says, that the province of Trapezond was antiently under the government of dukes, who were sent thither in that quality by the Constantinopolitan emperors; that one of those governors, having made himself absolute master there, took upon him the title of king; and that he that then reigned there, had assumed that of emperor. We do not find, however, that Michael made any opposition to this new-assumed title. The odium and other misfortunes he then laboured under, of which we took notice under the last article, rather obliged him to confirm it to him; at least he thought fit to court his friendship and alliance by offering him his daughter Eudocia Paleologina in marriage; which John readily accepted of, and went to Constantinople to espouse her: and it is probable enough, that his new title was then acknowledged and confirmed to him by his father-in-law. All that we know further of him is, that he was earnestly courted by pope Nicolas IV. to engage in the holy war about the year 1291. and that he died about four years after, and left two sons behind, by his wife Eudocia, viz. Alexius II. who succeeded him, and John his younger brother, whom that princess took with her, being then very young, to Constantinople, soon after the emperor's death.
5. Alexius II. was born 1282. and left, by his father's last will, under the guardianship of Andronicus Paleologus the elder. He married the daughter of an Iberian prince, tho' he had the offer of a much richer wife, which Andronicus Augustus had designed for him. He defeated the Genoese, and soon after entered into an alliance with them. He was succeeded by his son,
6. Basilus I. who was forced to fight his way through to gain his paternal inheritance. He was highly courted by pope John XXII. to go over to the church of Rome. His wife, or, as some think, his second, was Eudocia the natural daughter of Andronicus Paleologus the younger. He was succeeded by,
7. Basilus II. called also the younger, to distinguish him, as is supposed, from his father. He married Irene Paleologina, the daughter of Andronicus the younger;

(E) We have nothing recorded concerning these two, not even their names; only we are told, that John, the next in order, was the grandson, according to some, or the great-grandson (11), according to others, of the great Alexius. Among these the famed Ogerius, protonotary of Michael Paleologus, who wrote about the year 1279. calls the then reigning emperor, that is, the John we are now speaking of, the great-grandson of Alexius the Great; so that, according (12) to his account, there must have been two princes between these two last-named (13).

which shews, that he must be different from the former, who had married Eudocia,^a another of that monarch's daughters; for it was contrary to the canons of the Greek church to marry two sisters. Irene, however, was afterward set aside to make way for another woman of the same name, with whom the emperor was fallen deeply in love; which so exasperated his queen, that she soon after hatched both their ruins: him she caused to be killed by some private means, and her she sent with her children under a guard to Constantinople. She governed the empire for some time, during which she dispatched some ambassadors to her father, to desire him to send some proper person, to whom she might be lawfully married, and have children by, to succeed to the empire. The matter was no sooner known at Trapezond, than an insurrection was made against her; which ended in a civil war,^b in which Tzanychita, a Trapezuntine nobleman, who was head of one of the factions, was killed.^c What became of her, or how the matter was concluded, we are not told; only that Basil the emperor died in the year of Christ 1339^f. He left children both by his wife, and by his concubine; the latter of which were, as we hinted, sent with their mother to Constantinople. He was succeeded by a son of the former,

Alexius III. 9. Alexius III (F). and the famed princess Eudocia Comnena, seem, by all circumstances of time, place, &c. to have been brother and sister, though their father's name is not recorded by any historian; neither is it easy to guess, at what time the former began to reign. As to his sister, she was a lady of extraordinary beauty,^c and, after having been married sometime to a Turkish nobleman of great distinction, and having several children by him, as soon as she was a widow, she was courted and betrothed to Manuel the son of John, emperor of Constantinople, who brought her accordingly thither to consummate his marriage; but here that old monarch, though decrepit with age, gout, and other infirmities, fell so enamoured with her, that he married her himself about the year 1380^g. that is, towards the latter-end of his life and reign, at which time this Alexius was upon the throne of Trapezond. This last married, if we may believe Laonicus^h, some great lady of the Cantacuzenian family, who being already in love with a Trapezuntine nobleman, said to have^d been the keeper of the imperial wardrobe, she was reported to carry on a shameful intrigue with him. His eldest son was no sooner apprised of it, than he took an opportunity to dispatch her paramour, and then shut her up with the emperor in a room, with a design to have sent them both out of the world by the same way: he was, however, prevented by the people from committing that double parricide, and forced to flee into Spain. Alexius was so exasperated at his son, that he disinherited him, and named Alexander his younger son to succeed him; but John found means, by the help of some Spaniards and Genoese, to return to Trapezond; where he caused his father to be privately murdered, and afterwards to be magnificently interred in the cathedral of that metropolis, to avoid being suspected to have had^e a hand in his deathⁱ.

John II. 1449. 10. John II. called also Calo-Johannes, having thus dispatched his father, mounted the throne, but found it very difficult to keep himself upon it; for the Turks, by this time grown very powerful, fell foul upon him on all sides, so that he was forced to pay an annual tribute of three thousand ducats to Amurat, and afterwards to his son Mohammed II. to enjoy the quiet possession of it^k. At his death he left only one son, named Alexius, then but four years of age, who was afterwards carried captive with the rest of the family at the taking of Trapezond by Mohammed above-mentioned, and a daughter, named Catharina Comnena, who was by her uncle David given to Ajan Beigh, vulgarly called Usum Cazanes, in order to prevail upon that^f

(F) Some have imagined this last to have been the son of Basilus II. and have struck out the anonymous one, who stands the eighth in the list; but it is scarce credible, that he could be the son of that Basil, who died An. 1339. whereas Alexius was still alive A. a monarch to assist him against the continual irruptions which the Turks made against him ^k. This was, however, done with this condition, that she should not be obliged to change her religion. John had these two by the daughter of one of the kings of Spain, whom she married during his abode there ^l. Some will have her to have been David's own daughter ^m, the last emperor of Trapezond, but without any foundation; for Laonicus expressly calls her the daughter of John; and David himself, in his letter to Philip duke of Burgundy, says plainly enough, that she was the daughter of Calo-Johannes ⁿ.

11. David Comnenus, the third brother of John, and last emperor of Trapezond, David, the last emperor. seized on the crown, in wrong of his nephew, the young son of Alexis. He was

b a man of a savage and cowardly disposition ^o. He had married the princess Irene, of the Cantacuzen family, a lady highly celebrated for her greatness of soul, and constancy under adversities ^p. Against David, Mohammed II. surnamed the Great, who by that time had made himself master of Græcia, Rascia, and Servia, and of the city of Constantinople, declared war, under pretence, that he had assisted Usun Cazanes, king of Persia, and was become tributary to him. David had neither courage nor strength sufficient to oppose him; so that he marched directly against his capital, and laid close siege to it by sea and land. The siege had lasted little above a month, when David, having in vain implored the assistance of christian princes, particularly of Charles VII. king of France, agreed to deliver up this metropolis, and with it the whole empire, on condition, that his and his family's lives should be spared, and he permitted to carry with him all his children and treasures into Europe; and that, when there, he should have a sufficient revenue assigned to maintain him and them. Mohammed at first refused these offers with great indignation, not doubting to be soon master of that metropolis; but a second parley being desired, he in appearance accepted of them; but having once got the unfortunate emperor in his power, he treacherously caused him to be loaded with chains, and to be kept close prisoner. Being now master of the city, he seized on the emperor's wife (G), daughters, and upon the rest of his family, with as many of the nobility as he found in that metropolis, and caused them to be sent in triumph to Constantinople. Of the rest of the Trapezuntines he chose as many as he thought fit for his service, and ordered eight hundred promising youths to be brought up janisaries. The handsome females he distributed among his captains and favourites, and some of the finest amongst his own sons. He left in the city none but the meanest of the people, put a strong garrison of janisaries into the castle, another of common soldiers in the town, and made his admiral governor of both. The other cities of the empire submitted to the conqueror in a little while after; so that the whole was reduced to his obedience in few months, and he returned triumphant into Constantinople ^q.

c Soon after his arrival thither, he sent the emperor David, and his children, prisoners to Adrianople; and not long after, upon some motions made, or pretended to have been made, in their favour by the wife of Usun Cazanes, he caused them to be put to death. He strove to root out, as much as lay in his power, the whole Comnenian family; and none of them were spared, but George the youngest son of David, who turned Mohammedan, and one of his sisters, who became afterwards Mohammed's concubine ^r. Thus ended the Trapezuntine empire, in the year of Christ 1462. and in the 257th or 258th of its foundation ^s.

Description of Spain.

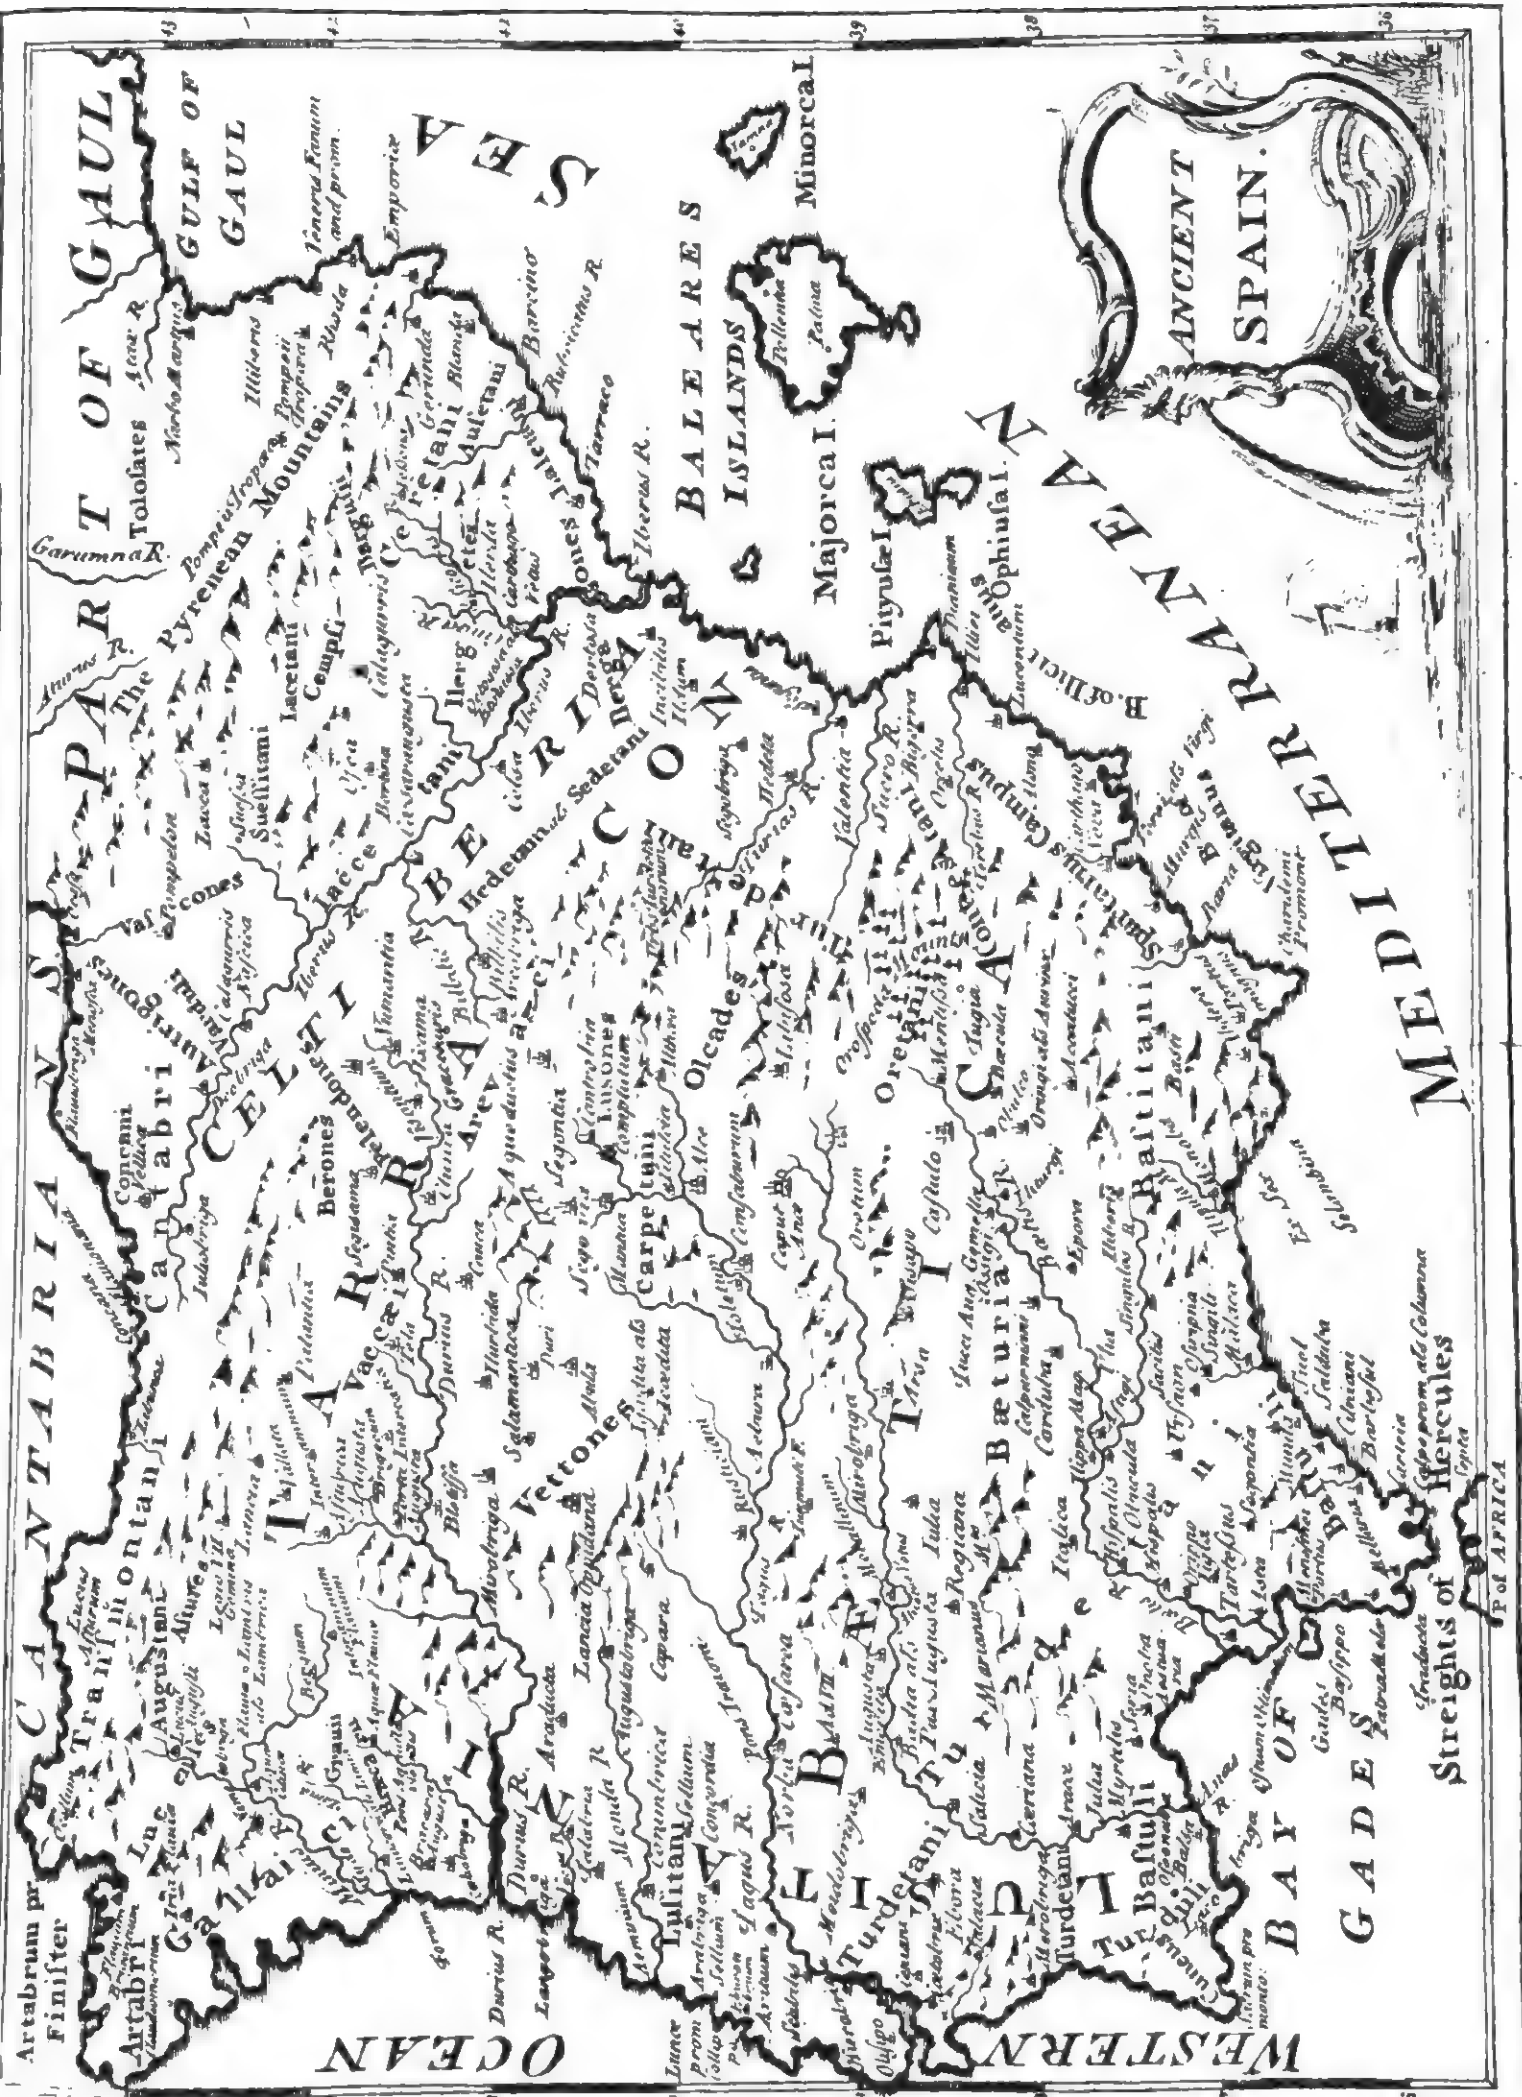

Limits and extent of Spain.

AS the only land contiguous to Spain was Gaul, from whence it was separated, on the N. by the Pyrenees, we may consider it as a peninsula. On the other sides we find it surrounded by the Mediterranean, the Sinus Gaditanus or bay of Cadiz, the Fretum Herculeum or straits of Gibraltar, the western ocean, and sea of Cantabria. It must have extended, from E. to W. near thirteen degrees, since Lisbon is 9°. 30'. W. of London, and cape de Bauger in Catalonia 3°. 15'. E. of that city; and from N. to S. about 9°. 40'. since cape de Ortegal, the northern extremity of modern Spain, is in 44°. 10'. N. lat. and the southermost point of Tariffa in 35°. 50'. N. lat. According to this determination, antient Spain, including Lusitania or Portugal, was about five hundred and ninety-four miles long, and five hundred and eighty broad. As the natural limits of antient and modern Spain are the same, they may be looked upon intirely as the same region. Some modern geographers have assigned this kingdom too large an extent, as our readers will find by consulting them.

Names of Spain.

THE generality of the Greek writers call Spain Ipsela Iberia, either from a colony of Iberians, a people bordering upon mount Caucasus, planted there, or from the Iberus, the Ebro of the moderns, one of the most noted rivers of this country. However, the antients who lived before Polybius, by Iberia understood only that part of Spain extending from the Pyrenees to Calpe, or the straits of Gibraltar, and terminated by the Mediterranean; the other part being unknown to, and consequently going under no name amongst, the Greeks and Romans. As the Iberus was by far the most considerable river of this tract, it might have received the denomination of Iberia from thence, as Egypt, according to some, did its name from the Nile, which Homer intimates to have been called Ægyptus. But, notwithstanding what is here advanced, we apprehend, that the true and proper Iberia was originally only that part of Spain called Celtiberia, from a body of Celts settling in it, bounded by the Iberus, the Pyrenees, and the Mediterranean; which if we admit, it is no wonder, that the Phœnicians gave it the name of Iberia. For the Hebrew עבר Eber, as well as the Chaldee, Syriac, or Phœnician עבר Ebra or Ibra, in the singular number, signifies a passage, and in the plural bounds or limits. The Phœnicians, therefore, might either have called the most considerable river of this tract, and one of its boundaries, Eber, Iber, Ebra, &c. and from thence styled the inhabitants of it Iberians; or have denominated the tract itself Iberia, from its situation, it having been generally considered by them as one of the remotest regions, or western limit, of the earth. Be that as it will, we can by no means think it probable, that any part of Spain was called Iberia, from a colony of Iberians settled there, since history does not in the least countenance such a notion. Festus Avienus places the Iberi upon the coast of the Atlantic ocean, to the west of the Iberus, a little river between the Batis and the Anas, the Rio Tinto, or Rio de Azecbe, of the a moderns. But his authority, with regard to the situation of the most antient Iberi, must give way to that of Polybius b:

It appears from Bochart and others, that the Phœnicians called Spain, at least whence called that part of it known to them, סְפַנְיָא Sphanja, or Spanja, from סַפְּן Saphan, ^{Spania or Hispania.} or Span, a rabbit, because it abounded with those animals. In support of this notion, it may be observed, that in many manuscripts of Curtius, Justin, Capella, Apuleius, Julius Capitolinus, Athenæus, &c. for Hispania is found Spania, as we learn from Casaubon and Salmasius. From the Phœnician Spanja, the Romans deduced their Spania or Hispania; which appellation, as well as Iberia, in common with the Greeks, they applied to the whole continent of Spain. That this country, or at least a considerable part of it, produced rabbits in vast abundance, may be evinced from the concurrent testimony of Varro, Strabo, Pliny, Ælian, and many other writers of good authority; but, that the Saphan of the Phœnicians answered to the rabbit, can by no means be allowed. However, as the former, in many particulars, bore a near resemblance to the latter, the Phœnicians, at their first arrival in Spain, might take them to be the same animal, and from thence impose upon this country a name, which has ever since prevailed. The antients sometimes, from its situation, denominated Spain likewise Hesperia, and Hesperia Ultima; but these, and other poetical appellations, as being applied to other countries, deserve little or no regard c.

c As Spain, before the Carthaginians made any conquests there, was inhabited by many cantons, governed by their own reguli, and independent on one another, it must have been originally divided into various petty kingdoms, the precise number of which it is impossible for us at this day to determine. What number of provinces the Carthaginians divided that part of Spain subject to them into, for want of sufficient light from antient history, we must likewise own ourselves incapable of ascertaining. As for the Romans, the first division they made of Spain, or rather that part of it they had reduced, was into Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior; and this, according to Livy, took place immediately after the conclusion of the second Punic war. However, for some political reasons, they thought proper to unite these two provinces, in the beginning of the Macedonian war; and again disjoined them in the consulate of Q. Ælius Pætus and M. Junius Pennus. This last disposition of Spain remained till the reign of Augustus, who altered it, by dividing Hispania Ulterior into two provinces, viz. Provincia Batica, and Lusitania, and affixing the name of Provincia Tarraconensis to Hispania Citerior. In some of the succeeding reigns we find Hispania Ulterior and Hispania Citerior again mentioned; notwithstanding which, that the division introduced by Augustus continued as long as the Romans had any footing in Spain, appears extremely probable, both from the antient geographers, and many antique inscriptions exhibited by Gruter and Reinesius. Upon this plan, therefore, we shall here beg leave to give our readers a geographical description of antient Spain d.

THE limits of (A) Lusitania not having been always the same, we cannot take upon us to define them. That it extended from the Tagus to the Cantabrian ocean, ^{Limits and extent of Lusitania.}

(A) Bochart says, that the country called Lusitania derived its name from לֹז Luz, an almond, because it produced vast quantities of that fruit, as he proves from various authors. But we think, unless our readers should take it to be of Celtic original, it ought to be deduced from לֹז and יִשְׂרָאֵל or יִשְׂרָאֵלִי Luz and Tani or Tana, an almond, and fig; for that Lusitania produced both those kinds of fruit, Bochart clearly evinces in the place referred to. It is plain, therefore, from hence, that the word Lusitania is not of Roman extraction (1).

(1) Bochart. Chan. lib. i. c. 35. Val. Schind. lex. pentaglot. in vocib.

or at least the Promontorium Celticum, is intimated by Strabo. That part of it situated betwixt the Anas and the Tagus went by the name of Celtica, or the country of the Celts, as has been observed by Isaac Vossius. After Augustus had made the disposition of Spain above-mentioned, the Anas bounded Lusitania on the south, and the Durius, or Douro of the moderns, on the north; so that the whole tract lying betwixt the Durius and the Cantabrian ocean was annexed to the Provincia Tarracoenfis. The interior limits of Lusitania, upon the frontiers of the Vettones and Carpetani, are fixed differently by different authors; which, as Cellarius intimates, may have been owing to a mistake adopted by some of those authors; viz. that the province of Lusitania corresponded exactly with the country of the Lusitani; whereas, according to Pliny, not only the Lusitani, but the Celtici, Turduli, Vettones, &c. were seated in that province. The Lusitani possessed the district bordering upon the Atlantic ocean, and stretching itself from the mouth of the Anas to the Promontorium Sacrum, now known by the name of Cape St. Vincent. As for the Celtici, whose true name was Mirobrigenfes, according to Pliny, their situation may be collected from what has been already observed. Some of the ancient geographers make the Turduli and Turdetani one nation, particularly Ptolemy and Strabo; though they seem to have been considered in a different light by Polybius. Be that as it will, the Turdetani were undoubtedly a powerful people, since they occupied a considerable part both of Lusitania and Betica, as appears from Strabo. The same may be said of the Vettones, who spread themselves over a large tract, terminated on the north by the Durius, and on the south by the Tagus. However, as the ancients differ with regard to the extent of territory every one of those nations or cantons possessed, it is probable, that their frontiers were not always the same. Some authors assert Vettonia, or the country of the Vettones, to have been a province distinct from Lusitania, and limited on the south by the Anas; and this notion seems to be countenanced by an inscription in Gruter. The principal cities of this province are the following:

- Olisipo. Olisipo, or Olisippo, called at present, by the English, Lisbon, and, by the Portuguese, Lisboa. It stands at the mouth of the Tagus, and was corruptly named, by some of the ancients, Ulyssippo; from whence some have imagined, that it was built by Ulysses; in his return home from the Trojan war. But this notion ought to be looked upon as a mere fiction, destitute of the least shadow of historical proof to support it. We cannot, therefore, but believe, that Olisipo, or Olisippo, which, from Pliny, the Itinerary, and Gruter, appears to have been the genuine proper name of this city, was originally formed from the two Phœnician words אליס אבו alis ubbo, or olis ippo, the pleasant bay. For, that the ancient Olisipo was seated on a bay, we learn from Mela; and that the bay, on which Lisbon stands, is extremely pleasant, all the moderns allow. Olisipo, or Lisbon, the capital of the present kingdoms of Portugal and Algarve, is in 39°. 10'. N. lat. and 9°. 30'. W. of London.
- Talabrica. Talabrica, or Talabriga, a city seated upon the Vacus, mentioned by Pliny, Antoninus, and Appian. The citizens of Talabriga, from their frequent violations of treaties concluded between them and the Romans, seem to have had an uncommon aversion to that people; which is the principal thing we find related of them.
- Langobriga. Langobriga (B), a town situated between the Vacus and the Durius, not far from the sea-coast. As both Pliny and Antoninus take particular notice of it, it must have been a place of some repute.
- Ara Ducla. Ara Ducla, or, according to Reinesius, Ara Traducla, a Roman town, standing to the W. of Langobriga. Our readers will find it in Ptolemy's list of the towns appertaining to Lusitania.

(B) The word Briga or Briga, in the old Spanish language, signified a city, as we learn from Resend. Therefore Cnobra, Arabra, Langobriga, Meidobriga, &c. are equivalent to the city of Ceto, the city of Ara, the city of Lango, the city of Meido, &c. Hence, probably, came the words Brigantes, Brigantii, Brigacum, Brigobanna, &c. all which are evidently of Celtic extraction (2).

(2) Laur. Andr. Resend. in antiquitat. Lusitan. l. iv. in Cetobriga.

- a Aminium, a city of this province, mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy, near the Aminium. northern bank of the Munda, a little to the S. of Talabriga ^k.
- Conimbrica*, a city seated on the opposite bank of the Munda. Out of the ruins Conimbrica of this place has arisen the modern Coimbra, one of the finest towns in Portugal, and celebrated all over the learned world, for the famous university which has so long flourished there ^l.
- Arabriga*, Sellum, and Concordia, betwixt Conimbrica and the Tagus, seem to have ^{Arabriga, Sellum, and Concordia.} been places of some note, though we have scarce any particulars relating to them handed down to us by the antient geographers ^m.
- Colippo*, a Roman municipium, between the Munda and the Tagus, upon the coast ^{Colippo.} of the Atlantic ocean. We find this town named, by an inscription in Gruter, COLIPRO; but, that the R there was originally a P, appears from the best manuscripts of Pliny, as well as another inscription. Not far from this city, in a south-western direction, stood Eburobritium, or, as, in our opinion, it ought to have been written, Eburobriga. As the stones, that preserved the above-mentioned inscriptions, were in the neighbourhood of Liria, some believe, that the ruins of the antient Colippo are to be sought for there ⁿ.
- Scalabis*, or Scalabiscus, as some think it called by Ptolemy, has been considered ^{Scalabis.} by Cellarius as the fifth Roman colony of Lusitania, surnamed Præsidium Julium. The Spanish writers almost unanimously agree, that the spot, on which this town stood, is at present occupied by Santerien, a Portuguese town about forty miles N. E. of Lisbon; though the Scalabiscus of Ptolemy had a situation assigned it to the N. of the Munda ^o.
- Aritium Prætorium* and Hierabriga, in the neighbourhood of Scalabis, are men- ^{Aritium Prætorium, and Hierabriga.} tioned by the Itinerary. The former place stood thirty-eight Roman miles from Olisipo, and the latter thirty P.
- Norba Cæsaria*, a town of repute during the government of the Romans in Spain, ^{Norba Cæsaria.} on the southern bank of the Tagus, near the famous stone bridge built over that river, and dedicated to Trajan. Pliny calls the inhabitants of this city Colonia Norbensis. Some Spanish authors believe Norba Cæsaria to have been contiguous to Trajan's bridge. But other writers of that nation, well versed in the antiquities of their country, maintain the contrary. The latter, in support of their opinion, affirm the city of Alcantara, seated on the spot adjoining to the noble structure above-mentioned, to have been built by the Saracens; but the former think it may have arisen out of the ruins of the antient Norba. Pliny and Ptolemy seem to favour the sentiment of those, who place Norba at some distance from the bridge; since they make that town, or, which is the same thing, the Colonia Norbensis, to have been situated in a territory to the south of the Tagus. Be that as it will, we are informed by an antient Roman inscription in Gruter, that the Roman municipia of Lusitania, by sums raised amongst themselves, finished the aforesaid bridge, in the reign of the emperor Trajan. The names of these municipia, or rather their inhabitants, have been preserved by a stone, belonging formerly either to the bridge or the town of Norba, viz. Iadita, Lancia Oppidana, Arabriga, Mirobriga, Lancia Transcudana, Colarnum, Meidubriga, Interamnia, &c. Some, if not all, of these municipia undoubtedly made a considerable figure, though we are supplied with very few particulars relating to them by the antient geographers and historians ^p.
- Bletisa* was situated near some of the above-mentioned municipia, on the southern bank of the Durius, as may be inferred from an inscription in Gruter. The modern name of Bletisa is Ledesma, according to Mariana, who supposes the antient and modern cities, going by those names, to have been the same. As to any farther particulars of this place, we are intirely in the dark ^q.
- Salmantica*, called at this day Salamanca, was in the neighbourhood of Bletisa, as ^{Salmantica.} appears from the above-mentioned inscription. It is at present famous all over the world, on account of the flourishing university founded there, which, for several ages, has been deemed the principal seat of literature in Spain ^r.

rita.

Augusta Emerita, the capital of this province in the Roman times, upon the Anas, ^a was built by a body of superannuated soldiers, to whom Augustus assigned a district in Lusitania; from whence this city deduced its name. This colony we find frequently mentioned by ancient Roman coins and inscriptions. Emerita at first appertained to the Turduli, according to Strabo; though afterwards it was ranked amongst the towns of the Vettones, as we learn from Prudentius. This may be easily accounted for, if we consider, that the Vettones, in process of time becoming more powerful than the Turduli, at length made themselves masters of their country. Our readers will find a more minute account of this city and colony in the authors here referred to ^r.

Ebora.

Ebora, called, by the Romans, Liberalitas Julia, was seated between the Tagus ^b and the Anas, though it approached nearer the latter than the former river. The same spot is at present occupied by Evora, where there has long flourished a famous university. This town was a Latin municipium, as appears from several ancient coins and inscriptions ^s.

Salacia.

Salacia, the Alacer do Sal of the moderns, stood some miles to the W. of Ebora. From some ancient inscriptions in Gruter it may be inferred, that this place was a Roman municipium ^t.

Pax Julia.

Pax Julia, the Beja of the moderns, a city in the southern part of the province, stood near the frontiers of the Turdetani, if it did not actually belong to that nation. It is taken notice of by Pliny, Ptolemy, and Antoninus. Near this place a vast number of Roman coins and inscriptions have been found within these few years. All the remaining tract to the south of this city, limited on the east, west, and south, by the Anas, the Atlantic ocean, and bay of Gades, from its figure, was called Cuneus by Pomponius Mela and Strabo. Myrtilis, Balsa, Ossonaba, and other places of this tract, deserve not any great regard. However, it may not be improper to observe, that, according to Resendius, Mortola, or Mertolo, a modern town upon the Anas, and Tanilla, or Tavira, a considerable city of Algarve, answer to the ancient Myrtilis and Balsa. As for Ossonaba, if we will believe the same author, it has for a long time lain in ruins, though some footsteps of it are still remaining, particularly in the walls of Faro, another town of Algarve upon the sea-coast. The Lacobriga of ^d Mela stood under the Promontorium Sacrum, known in these times by the name of Cape St. Vincent, upon a spot occupied at present by a village called Lagoa by the Portuguese, near the city of Lagos, where some remains of it are still to be seen ^u.

As the other towns of Lusitania, whose names only have been handed down to us by the ancient geographers, were either insignificant and obscure, or almost all traces of them have been lost, our readers will not expect any account or description of them. Neither is it reasonable, in a work of this nature, to take any notice of what merits not the least attention ^v.

Lusitania.

THE chief promontories of Lusitania were the Promontorium Sacrum, Promontorium Barbarium, and the Promontorium Magnum, or Olisiponense; to which some ^e add a fourth, called, by Pliny, Cuneus. The Promontorium Sacrum, or Cape St. Vincent, formed an angle projecting into the bay of Gades and the Atlantic ocean, which was termed the western extremity of the world by Strabo. The Promontorium Barbarium, at present Cape Spichel, lay to the south of Olisipo, though not very distant from the mouth of the Tagus. The Promontorium Magnum, or Olisiponense, styled, by some of the moderns, Cape de Rocca Sintra, projected into the Atlantic ocean near Olisipo, and was made by Pliny the common boundary of Earth, Sea, and Heaven. As for Pliny's Cuneus, it is supposed to be the promontory at this day known by the name of Cape St. Mary by Cellarius ^f.

Ports and
islands.

THE principal ports of this province were those of Olisipo, at present Lisbon, ^f and Hannibal. The situation of the former is so well known, as not to admit of a dispute; but that of the latter cannot be so easily ascertained. Mela, upon whose authority it intirely depends, places it near the Promontorium Sacrum; which is all that we can say of it. The only island taken notice of by the antients, on the coast of Lusitania, is the Londobris of Ptolemy, the Barlenga or Barlinges of the moderns ^g.

- a THE Mons Herminius of Hirtius, the modern Arminia, seems to have been the Mountains, only mountain of note in this country; of which we have nothing farther to say, than that, according to Cellarius, Medabriga or Meidabriga, stood at the foot of it^a.

THE most celebrated rivers of Lusitania were the Anas, the Tagus, and the Du-^{Rio}rius. The Anas is called at present the Guadiana, the Tagus the Tajo, and the Du-rius the Douro. To these may be added the Munda, which now goes under the name of the Mondego; and the Værus, now called the Voga. They all flow from E. to W. and empty themselves into the Atlantic ocean^a.

- We shall here only mention two of the natural curiosities of Lusitania: 1. The Curiolus.
b lead-mine near Meidabriga, from whence Pliny denominates the inhabitants of that place Plumbarius; which still exists. 2. The golden sand, or small particles of gold mixed with the sand, of the Tagus. This we find attested by Pomponius Mela, Ovid, Pliny, Silius Italicus, &c. and the truth of it seems confirmed by Resendius. For that famous antiquary assures us, that some of these golden particles were found intermixed with the sand of the Tagus in his time; that the laws of Portugal would not permit people to throw up the interior sand on the banks of the Tagus, with which these particles are supposed to be incorporated, lest the neighbouring fruitful fields should be thereby damaged; and that the kings of Portugal have a sceptre of the Tagus gold, than which no purer is to be found in the world^b.

- c THE second province of Hispania Ulterior, or further Spain, was Bætica, so called Bætica de- from the famed river Bætis, since Tartessus, and now Guadalquivir, or the great scribed river. We have already mentioned its limits on the west or Lusitanic side; it was bounded on the south by the Mediterranean, and the Sinus Gaditanus, or gulph of Cádiz; and on the north by the Cantabric sea, now the sea of Biscay. As to its limits towards the north-east, or province of Tarraco, they cannot be so well fixed, because they are rightly supposed to have been in a constant fluctuation, as each petty monarch had an opportunity to encroach upon his neighbour. Hence ancient authors place those on the sea-coast differently, viz. Ptolemy at Barra^c; Pliny somewhat higher, at Murgis^d; though both situated on the Sinus Virgilanus, a little d below now Carthage. The same may be said of the inland ones, which are likewise differently placed, either higher or lower from the province of Tarracon, as may be seen by the authors above-quoted. The Bætis above-mentioned divided this province into two parts; on the one side of which, towards the Anas, were situate the Turdetani (A), from whence the country was called Turdetania, but better known by the name of Baeturia. On the other side were situated the Bastuli, Bastitani, and Contestani, along the Mediterranean coasts. The reader will find, under the next note, all that can be found concerning these people (B). We forbear mentioning

(A) Some add, after Polybius, the Thuruli, as different from them. We have already spoken of both. They were (1) situate on the same side of the Bætis, but higher up; but as that author rather distinguishes them only with regard to their situation; and Ptolemy seems to intimate, that they were but one people (2); we see no reason for making two of them, any farther: than the distinction of higher and lower will go; especially as Strabo makes the two names to be indifferently given to them (3); and these are by some authors (4) affirmed to have been the antientest people in all Spain.

(B) Of the first of these we have already spoken. The Bastuli, supposed to be of Phœnician or Libyan extract, extended from the straits of Gibraltar, along the Mediterranean coast, till driven from thence by the *Moor*s, they fled into the mountainous part of Gallia, which they then called by their name Bastula. The Bastitani or Bastitani were seated higher up on the same coasts. The territories of both these made what since became the kingdom of Granada, in which there is a ridge of very high mountains, called, from the latter, the Bastetanian mountains. Mention is made also of their capital called Bastisana, a place of such strength, that king Ferdinand was six months besieging it, before he could take it from the *Moor*s (5).

The Contestani are by some placed in this province of Bætica, and by others in that of Tarracon. They were most likely seated between both. They are said by Ptolemy (6) to have been settled there by Iesta one of their kings, of whom we shall speak in the sequel, and called from him Contestani, as well as a city called Constantinum (7); but that king, though mentioned also by Manetho, is generally ranked among the dubious, if not fabulous.

a great number of others; of which we know little more than the names. The a reader may see them in Cellarius above-mentioned, and, if he cares to depend upon the Spanish authors for other situation, cities, and their particulars, he may consult those we have lately quoted both in the text and margin.

Roman colonies.

We come now to speak of the Roman colonies in this province; and of these we shall, for brevity's sake, single out only some of the most celebrated ones; viz. that of the Accitani, situate between the Bastuli and Bastitani, along the same shore. We find it mentioned by Pliny^c, and by some ancient inscriptions, under the name of COLONIA JULIA GEMELLA ACCITANA^d, whose citizens were called Gemellenfes, because that colony was made up of two legions, viz. the third and sixth, as appears by those inscriptions^e. It is supposed to be the present city of b Guadix in Granada, an ancient episcopal see, formerly called the Accitanus, from Acci, the name of that city (C). Those of Gades, Corduba, Astigi, and Hispal, were famed for their courts of judicature. The other four, whose situation is less known, together with their other municipal and free cities, in a much greater number than in any of the other two provinces, the reader may see in the author above-mentioned^f; all which confirm what Pliny says of this^g, that it excelled them by far; for so it did in richness, extent, number of cities and harbours, fertility of its soil, commodious situation for traffick, and many other particulars: and this may be one great reason, why the Romans cultivated and encouraged it more than they did the rest.

Their cities.

How few of those ancient cities this province had before the coming in of the Romans, is not difficult to guess, if we only consult the best ancient authors with any tolerable attention; though, if we were to trust to the Spanish writers, it must have not only abounded with them, but they must likewise have been vastly large, populous, and opulent, even before the coming of the Tyrians, Phenicians, and other nations, of whom we shall give an account in the sequel. And yet these are affirmed by the same authors, especially the Tyrians, to have built some fresh considerable ones, every one in the places where they settled themselves; for all which we have no better grounds, than for that of Ulippo and its pretended founder, of which we spoke under the first article of this chapter: but d when we come to examine things more closely, we find no such traces of this boasted number of cities. On the contrary it is plain, when the Turdetani had, at the instigation of Hannibal, assisted the brave Saguntines their neighbours against the Romans, we read but of one city they had, the name of which is not so much as recorded (D); and which these caused to be razed, and the inhabitants to be sold for slaves^h, as a determent to others from lending their assistance to any, whom they thought proper to war against. Ptolemy mentions but one sea-port town on the coast of the Bastitani, viz. that of Οὐρὴν Urce, since Vorgi, in the bay of that name, tho' we find some considerable ones on those coasts; such as Menobia, Abdera, Portus Magnus, Beria, and Murgis, and some others. On the islands it has likewise a e considerable number, which Pliny, in his Natural History, tells us, in his time amounted to an hundred and seventy-two. The greatest part of these being, in all appearance, and from the Roman names given them, either founded or enlarged by that nation, such as those of Asta Nebriſa, Ugia, and *Orippa*ⁱ, on the banks of the Batis, below Hispal, we have not time to dwell upon them, but shall content ourselves with a short mention of those of the greatest note. Among these is the famed city of Hispal, now Seville (E), situate on the river Batis above-mentioned, Hispal.

(C) The Spaniards pretend, that Torquatus, a disciple of James the apostle, was by him appointed the first bishop of it (8).

(D) This the Spaniards think to have been called Turvel, situate near the spring-head of the river Thurias or Durias, and to which they have given the ancient name of Turdeta.

(E) Some pretend, that it was founded and named by Hispal one of their fabulous kings, and the son of Hercules (9); others, that it was so called from the palus, or marsh, on which it was founded; or rather from the pali, or stakes, upon which the foundation of it was laid (10). That of Seville, or, as it was anciently written, Civilia, is thought to be only a corruption of Civitas Julia, as it is called in some ancient inscriptions (11). But, when or by whom it was founded, is not to be guessed at.

a and the metropolis of this province. It was formerly a great emporium, by means of that navigable river, which brought vast number of merchandizes up to this city, and thence quite up to Corduba. This city is styled by Pliny Colonia Romulensis, and by some antient inscriptions Colonia Romulea. We took notice above, that it was one of the four courts of judicature. The next city in rank to Hispal is Corduba, now Cordoua, no less famed for its rich mines, and fertile soil, or, as the poet calls it^k, aurifera terra, than the other was for its trade. It is situate on the banks of the same river, was called a patrician colony, and is said by Strabo to have been the work of Marcellus (F). Tartessus was once a famed antient city, pleasantly situate between the two mouths of the Bætis (G), which made a kind of island called, after the name of that city^l, Tartessida. This antient city is celebrated by some of the Latin poets, as situate on the farthest verge of the western shore^m; but, for the other particulars of it, we must refer our reader to the last note, as we must do, for the remainder of the cities of this province, to the authors so often cited already, and especially to the late and accurate Cellarius in the chapter above-quoted; and for Gades or Gadir, now Cadiz, to what we copiously said of it in a former volumeⁿ.

We come now to say something of the famous bays and ports of this province; the first of which, next to Gades above-mentioned, is that called Portus Menestæus, mentioned by Ptolemy and Strabo, who doth likewise place here the oracle of that name. The next is that of Besippo, the country of the famed Pomponius Mela, and some others, without the streight's mouth. Calpe, Carteia, Barbesul, Cilniana, Salduba, Suel, and Malaca, within the streight; and on the coasts of the Bastuli. Menoba, Selumbina, Abdera, and Portus Magnus, and likewise the famed promontory of Charidemus, all which are mentioned by Ptolemy, Strabo, Pliny, Mela, and placed by them on the Bastitanian coasts. Beyond the promontory last-mentioned are the cities of Baria or Barea, and Murgis, in the Virgitanian bay; the former of which is reckoned by Ptolemy, and the latter by Pliny, the last sea-port of the Bastitani, as we hinted a little higher. Those antient authors are, however, neither well agreed, nor easily reconciled, about the situation, names, and some other particulars relating to those cities. Thus, for instance, Calpe, which is by Strabo styled a famed antient Spanish sea-port, Pliny, Ptolemy, Mela, and others, only call a mountain: whence the learned Bochart and Casaubon have thought, that Calpe, in the former, was inserted, by the mistake of the transcriber, for Carteia, especially as no mention is made in the others of any city besides it in that bay. But this has been in a great measure answered, by some learned men, from the inscription

(F) Our author leaves us in the dark which of the Roman generals of that name he meant, so that the Spanish writers are much divided about it. Vasani, often quoted, thinks, that it was he who was contemporary with Cæsar and Pompey; because he finds no mention made of this city before him (12). But Nonius thinks it to be of much older date (13), since the same Strabo calls it Coloniæ primæ, or first colony which the Romans sent into this part of Spain. And it is mentioned by Silius Italicus in the second Punic war (14). As for the title of Colonia Patricia given to it, it is not only mentioned by Pliny, but by some antient inscriptions in Gruter, to which we refer (15); and this is further explained by what Strabo adds, that it was from the beginning inhabited by noble men of the Romans, and other nations (16).

(G) Strabo says, that the Bætis formerly emptied itself into the sea at two different places (17). One of them has been since stopped up. Mela mentions the city of Carteia in the same bay (18), which, he says, some falsely to have been the antient Tartessus. Hence authors are divided in their opinions, whether these were two distinct cities, or the same, with different names. We find nothing that can satisfy our readers on that head, antient authors often confounding these two names and that of Gades together, as the learned Bochart and others have justly observed.

As for the fabulous account of its having altered its name from Tartessus to that of Gades, on account of Hercules's setting up his two columns there (19), it is rightly rejected. We have given a truer account of the foundation of Gades in a former volume, to which we refer, to avoid repetition (20). As for Carteia, a late author endeavoured to prove it to be the present town of Rocadillo distant, about four miles from Gibraltar (21); but the point is far from being cleared by him, and too dark and prolix for us to dwell longer upon, in a work of this nature.

on a medal, with these letters, C. I. CALPE; that is, as they read it °, Colonia Julia a Calpe: and this they back with a passage out of N. Damascen v; who says, that Octavius overtook Cæsar near the city of Calpia, which is the same with Calpe; so that Strabo's text wants no amendment. Barbesul, Asta, and some others of the sea-ports above-named, appear likewise to have been considerable colonies, as well as a number of inland towns, in particular that of Munda, where Cæsar overcame the sons of Pompey; but, as we are obliged to study brevity, we shall refer the rest to the author last-quoted.

Bætis, &c.

Mountains.

RIVERS of any note there are not in this province, except the Bætis, often mentioned already, or, as it is sometimes written, Bates and Betis. It hath, according to Pliny a, its spring-head in the Tugiensian forest, so named from Tugia, a town b mentioned in the Itinerarium of Antoninus (H), in the province of Tarracon, at the foot of the Orespodan mountains. Others of lesser note are the Barbesula near the city or mount Calpe above-mentioned, the Saduca which seems to have divided the Bastuli from the Accitani, and some few others not worth dwelling upon. Mountains, of a considerable length and height, this province certainly abounds with. We find, however, but few mentioned by antient authors. Ptolemy takes only notice of two, viz. the Mariani and Hipylæ, the latter of which were scarcely known to any other antient writer. These, as they run along the territories of Hispal or Seville, were, we are told, called Illipæ; and, as they came nearer to Corduba, The-marini and Orthosdada: the former, which are by Pliny called Ariani (I), run c along the famed desert of the same name, now known by that of Sierra Morena, in the neighbourhood of the city of Castulo. The region of the Bastitani was likewise full of them, as we hinted in a former note; and all that needs be added, with relation to them all, is, that they abounded with metals and minerals of several kinds, particularly gold, quicksilver, copper, and lead, the greatest quantities of which appear, however, to have been dug out of those called Mariani, which the Romans improved to no small advantage, having every-where their procuratores rei metallicæ, or overseers of the mines. That of Calpe, mentioned a little higher, is neither famed for its height, mines, fertility, or on any account but that of its situation; and so no more need be said of it. d

Soil, climate, and produce.

THE goodness of the soil and air of Spain in general is too well known to need any mention here. This province was particularly remarkable for it, and we shall have occasion in the sequel to give further proofs of it from the healthiness and longevity of its inhabitants; and so little did they know of physick, that, if we may believe Possidonius, they used to lay their sick relations along the public streets and roads, to have the advice of such passengers as could give it to them. He adds, that their very women were so robust and healthy, that they knew not what it was to keep their bed after they were delivered; but used to go to their ordinary work, which was commonly agriculture, after they had taken proper care of themselves and the child. Their mountains, as well as valleys, afforded them plenty of corn e for men, and barley for their horses and cattle, the former of which they bred from the beginning in great quantities, and managed with great dexterity both at home and abroad, and especially in their warlike expeditions. The milk of their kine was, it seems, so very rich and fine, from the fragrant herbs they fed upon on those healthy mountains, that it could not be used either for food or drink, or even, as we are told by the above-mentioned author, to make cheese with, without some mixture of water. As for fruits of all kinds, they grow there in the greatest perfection; but these are topics so well known to every reader, that we need not dwell

- a longer upon them. As for mineral waters, they flow, in the greatest quantity, both hot and cold; and the kingdom of Granada is famed for them, and for their medicinal virtues; which need not to be wondered at, considering the vast ridges of mountains that are in it, and the variety of metals and minerals they abound with. Some of them rise so hot, as to exceed, we are told, even boiling water. The most famous of the warm kind are those of Hispal, Cordova, and Granada; to which they attribute the virtue of curing the most inveterate, and even the venereal, diseases; which is not altogether improbable, considering the quantity of sulphur, and other minerals, they are impregnated with, and the great perspiration which the heat of the climate gives to its inhabitants. There are two others of great fame here, viz.
- b that called Batio, from a small town near it; it springs, in a small rivulet, from the top of a very high rock, and falls, by two streams, into two lakes; and its waters are noted for curing all hæmorrhages, by washing. The other is near the town of Antiquaria, which is no less famed for dissolving the stone, and bringing it off by urine. We should be drawn into too great a length, were we to enter into so copious a subject as that of their artificial rarities; their stately buildings, such as bridges, churches, especially their palaces, whether those of the Gothic, or of the Roman fashion: but one thing we cannot forbear observing, that there are some yet standing almost in their pristine grandeur, especially in the kingdom of Granada, built by the Moors, in a style peculiar to them, and which has scarce any thing common with the other two, and yet seems to exceed them in taste and magnificence.
- c But as this country, as well as the several authors, who have written upon it, are so well known to us, we shall enlarge no further upon them.

Tarracon was the third province in Spain. It was, as we observed before, styled Tarracon ^{described.} by the Romans Hispania Citerior, or hither Spain, and distinguished, by the name of Tarraconensis, from the antient city of that name, which was then the capital of it, and the residence of the Roman præses, or governor. We have seen, under the two former articles, how hard it is to settle the limits of this province, with respect to those of Bætica and Lusitania, on account of their frequent fluctuation. On the three other sides they are easily fixed, it having the Mediterranean on the east, the ocean on the west, and the Cantabrian sea, and the Pyrenees, on the north, by which last it is divided from Gaul. Tarracon, being by far the largest of the three, had a much greater number of cities, and variety of nations, as well as, in all likelihood, of petty kingdoms and governments. It was divided into two parts by the famed river Iberus, now Ebro, which ran almost across the whole province, having its source on the north-west side of it, between the Cantabrian mountains; and, very near the sea of that name, and by a south-east course, emptying itself into the Mediterranean, about thirty miles below the city of Tarraco. Along the south-west side of that river were seated the Celtiberians, the antientest, and by far the most considerable, of all the nations of this province, if the others were not, indeed, so many distinct tribes descended from them, as we are apt to think they mostly were, from the greatest part of their names being of Celtic, rather than of any other extract. This canton was called from them Celtiberia, and reached from the mouth of the Iberus quite to the country of the Cantabri, on the opposite coasts. Along the course of it, on that side, were, among other people of less note, the Illærcæones, seated just within the mouth of it. Higher up are placed the Hedetani, ^{Other nations and cantons.} or Sedetani, Pelendones, Berones, and, last of all, the Cantabri. Nearer to Bætica, and on the borders of it, were, towards the Mediterranean, first, the Contestani, mentioned also under the last article; and, as you went forwards, across the country, towards the opposite shore, you found another tribe of the Turdæani, the Loætani, Lusones, Carpætani, Arevacæ, and Vaccæi; and these two last were severed from each other by the river Duero, which was the confine of Lusitania on that side; and, west of the Cantabri and Vaccæi, were, on the Cantabrian coast, the Transmontani and Artabri; and in this last was the Artabrum Celticum, called also Promontorium Nericum, now cape Finister. In the inland are placed the Astures, Augustani, Lucenses, and Gravii. On the western coast, between the cape above-mentioned and the Durius, were the Callaici, alias Callaci, whose country was called Callæcia, one tribe or canton of which were called Braccarii, and the country Bracara, and these were seated on the banks of the Durius; the others were distinguished by the name of Lucenses; and both were subdivided by Ptolemy into several tribes, such as a we shall speak of, upon another occasion, under the following note (A). All these are mentioned by ancient geographers, such as Ptolemy, Strabo, Mela, as seated, the former on the other side of the Iberus, and the latter on the higher side of the Tagus. On the other side of the Iberus, along the Mediterranean coasts, were seated the Lacetani and Ausetani, who were parted by the river Rubricatus, or, as Mela calls it, Lubricatus, now Lobragat, near the city of Barcelona. Along the Iberus were the Ilergetes, Jacetani, Suessitani, Vascones, Varduli, Antrigones, and Concani; and these were sited between the head of the Iberus and the Cantabrian sea. Nearer to the Pyrenean mountains, along that vast ridge, were the Ceretani, Indigetes, Cemsi, Lacetani, and some others of less note. Every one of them had its distinct b metropolis, from which they either took their name, or, which is perhaps more likely, to which they gave that of their own tribe, as may be seen by those we shall mention (B). We have already observed in general on this head, that those districts which end in tania, and the cities which end in briga, are of Celtic extract; and we shall add here, that this province abounds with such, more than the other two, as may be seen by the list of the people we have given below; for where their name terminated in tani the country of course ended in tania, as Ausetani and Ausetania.

Celtiberians,
fierceness.

It is not our design to speak particularly of every one of them, and much less c of their cities, many of which we know little else of, than their names (C). We may say of them in general, that they retained more of the ancient Celtic valour, customs, language, and, we may add, fierceness, than those of Betice, or even of Lusitania, though the Celtiberians of this last province are said to have been the bravest people in all Spain, as we shall have occasion to shew in the sequel. And the reason, probably, of it is, that they were neither so much under the dominion of the Romans, nor so conversant with them, as those in Betice; for the descendants of the Celts were every-where as famed for their tenaciousness of their ancient religion, laws, customs, language, &c. as the Romans were to propagate their own, where- d ever they conquered: and this was one constant cause, why the former chose rather to yield their territories to the latter, when they could defend them no longer against them, and to retire into more mountainous lands, where they could freely live by themselves, than to submit to their laws, and conform to their manners, as we shall have further occasion to shew in the sequel.

Roman colonies.

We find, however, the following colonies of note (for we shall omit the others, for brevity's sake) to have been in time planted amongst these Celtic settlements; viz. in Asturia, the famed Colonia Augusta. It is mentioned by Pliny and Ptolemy;

(A) This canton, which was since called Gallicia, and antiently Celtica, was, in all likelihood, either inhabited originally by the Celts, or was a colony of them sent from Gaul; for many such they were forced to send out of that kingdom into this and other countries, for want of room in their own, as we shall see, when we come to their history: the latter seems, however, the most probable, from the names by which they were distinguished, such as Calerini, Grovii, Limici, Quarquernei, and some others, which to us appear to be of Gaulish extract, and bear a visible analogy with some of those which we find in antient Gaul.

(B) Thus the Bracarii had Bracara, the Artabri Artabrum, the Astures Asturia, the Suessitani Suessa, the Lacetani Lacca, the Ilergetes Ilerda, and so of the rest, unless where the Romans, settling afterwards their colonies, did call those towns by new names, though the people still retained their old ones; especially we find some few of those places styled Julia and Augusta, as Julia Libyca in the canton of the Ceretani; Casæ Augusta among the Lacetani; Augusta Bracara, Porta Augusta, Augusti Lacus, in Gallicia, and the like.

Here, by the way, we must observe, that this last province was not called so from the Galli, as some have imagined, but from its antient metropolis, which was called Calle, situate in a pleasant valley upon the Durius, and near the mouth of it; and the port of it, being become a considerable one in time, was since named barely Porto and Puerto by the Spaniards, by the Dutch Port a Port, and by us Oporto. From these two, Porto and Calle, came the name of Portugal, or Portucalla. As for Calle, it must be owned, that it is not mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, &c. but we find it in the itinerarium, which places it on the road between Ulisipo or Lisbon and Augusta Bracara (1).

(C) Those, who are desirous to know more of these antient people, may consult, if they please, the Spanish writers we have often quoted in this chapter; though, for the most authentic account of them, we would rather refer them to the last-quoted and accurate Cellarius, who has wholly grounded his own on the testimony of antient authors, and rejected all the fabulous and uncertain trash, which those modern authors have intermingled in theirs upon more precarious, and sometimes upon no authority at all.

- a and in some antient medals, though differently placed*, and was a court of judicature, according to Pliny in the place last-quoted. It divided the Astures into Augustanos and Transmontanos, which confirms what we lately hinted, the former being, in all likelihood, of Roman extract, settled here, whilst the latter, of Celtic, removed over the ridge of mountains that parted them; for we find here also the seventh Roman legion, which was surnamed Gemina, settled between the Asturian sea and the capital of this district, called Asturia Augusta, now Astorga, a city still of some note (D). This country was also celebrated by the poets for the gold it produced. The next was that infamous one of Calaguris, distinguished by Pliny by the name of Nasica, justly execrated, by the Roman authors^w, for the
- b insurrection and dread catastrophe of Sertorius, mentioned in a former volume, and too black to be repeated afresh^r. The city was at first a municipal one, and in some inscriptions surnamed Julia (E), and then made a colony, with some others mentioned by Pliny^r, particularly those of Osca, Ilerda, and Turiasa. Calaguris, since Calaborta, was the head town of the Autrigones, seated indifferently by geographers on either side, but, by the most exact, on the other side the Iberus, as we hinted in the last note. Gracburis, or Graccuris, mentioned by Ptolemy among the chief cities of the Vascones, was, as we are told by Livy^z, built by Tit. Sempron. Gracchus, who took it from the Celtiberians, and called it by his name. Its situation is uncertain, only the Itinerarium places it on the road to Cesar Augusta, at sixty-four miles distance from it in the road to Tarraco. It is in some antient inscriptions styled Municipium Graccuris. Some christian champions, who suffered here for the faith in those early times, are in some martyrologies called the Gracburian, and in others the Ilerdan martyrs, from the vicinity, probably, of those two places. The last we shall name is the famed town of the Vascai, called Intercata, celebrated by antient authors, for a single combat, which was fought, at the siege of that city, between Scipio Æmilianus and a bold Spanish tribune, in which the latter was killed; and the former had no sooner escaped one danger, than he exposed himself to a greater, and was the first that scaled the walls of that place^s. We come now to speak of some of the most celebrated cities of this province, at the head of which
- d we may justly place the metropolis of it,

Tarraco, now Tarragon, situate on the Mediterranean coast, between the rivers Iberus, or Ebro, and the Rubricatus, now Lobregat. It was a colony planted there by the two Scipio's, Publ. and Cornel. with a juridical court; and was the capital of Hispania Romana (F), not so much on account of the excellency of its harbour, as Strabo observes, as for its being commodiously situated for all those, who travelled

(D) Ptolemy indeed makes the Astures to have been of Libyan extract, and to have come over with the Carthaginians, and settled in this part of Gallaecia. The city was called Astorga, from its being situate on the banks of a river of that name, which flows into the Durius; and the Romans, having seized on it, and the adjacent territories, called it Augusta Asturica (1). Some derive the names, both of the river and of the city, from Astir Menmon's coachman, who came thither with other Trojans, and planted a colony here (3); but this we look upon as fabulous.

As for the seventh legion above-mentioned, we find it called in Ptolemy legio septima Germanica; but as there is no mention of any such, either in other authors, or in any antient inscriptions, but often of legio septima gemina (4), it is rightly supposed, that it is in that author a mere error of the copyist, who mistook it for Germanica.

(E) It is inscribed, in some Augustan coins, MVN. CALAG. IVL. that is, Municipium Calaguris, Julia; and, in one of Tiberius's, M. C. L. C. CELERE, C. RECTO II VIR. that is, Municipium Calaguris Julia, Cais Celero, Cais Recto, Duumviris.

As there were two cities of that name, viz. this of Nasica, and another surnamed Fibularensis, some authors have placed them differently on the sides of the Iberus; but Peter de Marca and Cellarius, whom we chuse to follow, place the former on the other side of that river. As for the latter, which was at some distance from it, and inferior to it in point of privilege and opulence (5), it was only remarkable for a manufacture of what the Romans called fibula, a kind of buckles or buttons to fasten their garments with; and was distinguished by that name, on that account.

(F) It is placed by antient geographers in the region or kingdom of the Cossietani, or Cossuani, situate velled into this kingdom, whether by sea or land ^b. But Spanish authors, though ^a they grant those two Roman generals to have planted a colony there, will by no means allow, that they founded the city, but fetch its origin and etymon much higher: we have given two of them in the last note. However that be, this city has been all along very famous, having been, since, the metropolis of the kingdom of Arragon, an archiepiscopal see, and famed for a council or two held there; the first by John the then metropolitan, and his twelve bishops, in the year of Christ 516. in which it was, amongst other things, enacted, that the celebration of the Sunday should begin on Saturday evening. Hence that custom hath, it seems, spread itself almost all over Spain, to leave off all kind of work from that time ^c. In another held under Berengarius, primate of the same place, 1180. it was ordained, that ^b the dates of all public writings should be computed from the year of Christ, which before were wont to be reckoned from the reigns of the Frankish monarchs ^d. Below Tarraco was the famed city of Saguntus, or Saguntum, on the same coast, of which having spoken amply in the beginning of this volume, and of its dreadful catastrophe, we shall refer our reader to it ^e. Valentia, another antient city a little below Saguntum, was the capital of the Edetani. It is situate on the mouth of the river Tburias, about three miles from the sea, and was antiently styled Colonia Julia, and founded by Junius Brutus, whilst he was consul in Spain ^f, and given to his army (G). It was afterwards destroyed, with Herennius and his accomplices, by Pompey, and rebuilt by Julius Cæsar. It hath retained its antient dignity and grandeur, was once the metropolis of the kingdom, as it is still of the province of that name, an archiepiscopal see, and one of the most considerable cities of Spain. The people of this city were formerly as much celebrated for their valour and honesty, by Tully, as they are now, by their own authors, for their superstition and bigotry ^g.

Before we leave this part of Spain, we must not omit the famous city of Complutum, now Alcala de Henarez, so called from the river Henarez, on whose banks it is situate, in a pleasant plain; and, as that river falls into the great Tagus, the cities here along are easily furnished with all kinds of provisions and merchandizes. Complutum has now no bishoprick, but only a collegiate church, and is a considerable university, having been greatly endowed by the celebrated cardinal Ximenes, then archbishop of Toledo; under whose auspices, care, and immense charges, the first polyglot bible was compiled and printed in this city, and is from thence called the Complutensian polyglot (H). Westward of, and between, Camplutum, and the antient city of Toletum, now Toledo, and on the same river Tagus, was situate the Mantua of between the two rivers above-mentioned. It appears from antient medals to have been a very flourishing city, especially in Augustus's time; and is called by one Colonia victrix, by another Colonia victrix togata Tarraco; and in a third are found these words, GENIO COL. I. V. TARRAC. that is, Genio Colonia Victricis Togata Tarraconensis. There are still, it seems, quantities of such antient coins frequently dug up about the neighbourhood of it; which inclines one to think, it was formerly much larger than it is now, tho' it is at present very spacious, opulent, and considerable (6).

Those, who make Tubal to have been the people of Spain, pretend, that he founded this city, to be a kind of safeguard for his flocks and shepherds, of which he had vast numbers; and that both he and this place had the name of Tarraco given them, that is, the gatherer up of shepherds (7). Others will have it to have been built by Hercules, and to have been called Acon; whence the compound word Terra-acon was insensibly contracted into Tarracon (8).

(G) The followers of Berosus affirm this city to have been built by Romus the son of Tesla, one of their antient, if not fabulous kings; and to have been called by his own name Roma; and that the Romans, having since taken and enlarged it, gave it the name of Valentia instead of it (9).

(H) This glorious work, the first of that kind, was performed by men of the greatest learning, invited thither by that cardinal at a vast charge. It was a considerable time in compiling, and about four years in printing, that is, from 1514. to 1517. but the whole was not published till 1520. when it came recommended with a bull of pope Leo X. in six volumes, including the lexicon. It was printed in four languages, viz. the Hebrew, Chaldee, Greek, and Latin. The Hebrew was as correct as it could possibly be done, according to the original; but the Septuagint, Chaldee, and Vulgate Latin, were corrected in such a vast number of places, and from such a prodigious number of manuscripts, as were procured from all parts at no small expence, in order to render those three versions more conformable to a of Ptolemy, near which spot is supposed the town of Madrid, the now metropolis of all Spain, to have been since built (I); but of this, and many others, both on the sea-coasts, and in the continent, we shall forbear saying any thing further, they being so well known to almost every reader. We have already had occasion to mention some of the most considerable rivers, mountains, and promontories, in the course of this article; the rest, that are of any note, together with such natural rarities that may be worth observing, the reader will find in the following note (K), and in the map annexed.

As for the city, we have, at the beginning of this volume, mentioned its being plundered by the Carthaginians, and taken by the Romans^d. It was since erected into a bishoprick, under the title of Episcopus Gaditanus^e. The next is the so much celebrated, and so hard to find, island Erythia.

the original, that it, by degrees, dwindled into dislike; but both, however, this merit with the learned, that it served for a model to those which were since published in other kingdoms; among which that of London is justly esteemed, in all respects, the most useful and exact, though not enriched with such a variety of costly ornaments as that of Mr. Le Jay, printed at Paris (10).

(I) Hence we find it called by some Mantua Carpetana, by others Madritum and Madrit; but commonly now Madrid (11).

(K) Besides the cities above-mentioned, we should take notice of a very famed one, namely, new Carthage; but as we have had occasion to speak of it in a former volume, we shall refer our readers to it (12). Segobriga, alias Segobrica, was, as we are told, the capital of the Celtiberi (13), concerning whose situation authors, even Spanish, differ so much, that we can hardly say any thing about it. Some think there were two of that name, one in this province of Tarracon, and the other at the foot of the Castellan mountains; but the former, which is the most considerable, the authors above-quoted place in the neighbourhood of the ancient Numancia, mentioned, not only by them, but by the Itinerary, which places it between Uxama and Turiso, near the river Durius. This last was, it seems, so excellently fortified by nature, that it neither had nor needed either walls, towers, or other fortifications, being seated on the top of a steep mountain, and sheltered by much higher hills on three of its sides, being only accessible on the fourth, which opened to a plain, but by such narrow defiles, as could be easily guarded by a handful of men. Great wonders are told of this place by the authors under-quoted (14); for it would swell this note too much, were we to descend to particulars. It was, however, quite destroyed by the two Scipio's; but, since we find it mentioned by those ancient authors, and by the Itinerary, we need not doubt but it was rebuilt by some of their successors. We have already given a full account of the Numantine war, and the sad catastrophe of that famed city; and shall refer our readers to it (15), to avoid repetitions; and for the same reason we shall forbear mentioning any more of those ancient cities, whose names, and further particulars, have been sufficiently taken notice of in the course of the Roman and Carthaginian history; for those of later date belong not to this, but to the modern part of this work.

Mountains of note, besides those already mentioned, are the Pyrenæes, which divide Spain from Gaul by a continued ridge of vast height and depth, and reaches from sea to sea. They are supposed to have been so called, from a fire which spread itself over the surface of them, and burnt with such fierceness during several days, that it even melted the metals within their bowels, as we shall see in the sequel. The Ithubedan hills were another ridge, which crossed one part of this province, and at the foot of which were the heads of several famed rivers, such as those of the Tagus and Ausa, which flowed westward toward the ocean, on one side; and of the Suero and Thurias, which ran eastward into the Mediterranean on the other. The Orospeidan ridge seems to have separated this province in part from Bætica. They were also called Mariani Montes, and now Serra Modena. We spoke of them under the last article. A great many more this province abounded with, for a further account of which, we must refer our readers to the ancient and modern authors, largely quoted, as likewise for those mines, minerals, mineral waters, and other curiosities, they and the neighbouring vallies produced, the bare mention of which would carry us far beyond our design.

the same with it: and others have thought, that it was either sunk into the sea, or a was to be sought for among the rocks. We have, however, ventured, in a former chapter of this volume, to offer a conjecture concerning its situation; and shall refer our readers to it^a. No less difficult has been the search after those ten famed islands, called by the Greeks Cassiterides, from whence the Phanicians, the first discoverers of them, did fetch such vast quantities of tin. We should not have mentioned them here, the learned Camden having fully shewn, that they are our islands of Scilly, had not some of the antients, as Strabo and Ptolemy^b, placed them on the Spanish coasts, somewhat beyond the Promontorium Celticum or Artabrum, or Cape Finister; and others somewhere on the western ocean, about the upper coasts of Lusitania P. But as there could never be found any such islands on those coasts, they have been supposed to have undergone the same fate with that of Erythia lately mentioned. However, as we shall have occasion to resume them, when we come to speak of the British islands^c, we shall say no more of them here, but pass to those which are more considerable, and better known to us; and these are the Baleares, or Gymnesia, as they are called by the antients.

Baleares.

THESE were distinguished into Major and Minor, or, as Mela expresses it, Majores and Minores. Their bigness, situation, and other particulars, are so well known to every reader, that it were superfluous to dwell upon them. All that we need to say of them here, is, in what state they were in those antient times. In the former, now Majorca, Ptolemy and Strabo place the two cities of Palma and Pollentia, the one on the east, the other on the west; and these are by Strabo, Pliny, and Mela, styled Coloniae. In the latter, now Minorca, they place likewise two cities, viz. Jamno and Mago; which were, however, no more than castles or forts, if Mela's judgment, who was of that country, is to be preferred to the others. But as they seem to have been both built near the mouths of two convenient harbours, which are in this island, it is hardly to be doubted but these soon grew into considerable sea-ports, especially that of Mago, which became since a celebrated one, under the name of Maon. These two islands were, on account of their situation and harbours, styled Fortunatae, and stand at about thirty miles distance from each other. They were at first possessed by the Phanicians, who held them till Q. Metellus brought them under the Roman yoke, for which he got the surname of Balea-ricus^d. As to the etymon of Baleares, most authors derive it from the Greek βάλλω, signifies to throw with a sling, because the inhabitants of them were particularly famed for their skill in it^e: yet, as the Carthaginians had these islands before any other, Bochart thinks they did give them that name, which is compounded of two Punic words, Baal and Jarab, which amount to the same sense, and signify a slinging-master, or a man expert at throwing, &c. Their other name of Gymnesia, or Gymnasia, is, according to the antient authors above-quoted, of Greek extract, and was given them on account of their inhabitants going naked in summer.

FURTHER, towards the streights, over-against the cape Dianium, now Denia, are the two islands called Pityusa by the antients, from the vast quantities of pine-trees which they produced^f; the one of which, by far the larger of the two, tho' smaller than that of Minorca, was named Ebusus, now Ivica; the other, Ophiusa, now Formentera. They are both mentioned by Strabo, Ptolemy, and Pliny; and Mela adds, that the former was not only very fertile, but that it bred no kind of poisonous, nor even wild creatures, and that, if any were brought thither, they could not live in it^g, though the island abounded with pasture-ground^h, and with great variety of fruits, particularly a kind of figs, for which it was famed: some have even added sugar-canesⁱ, which, it is said, they boiled into sugar, and made a traffick of; but this Cellarius has shewn to be a mistake, and that it means no other, than the dried figs above-mentioned^j. The other, by far the smallest, is thought by some to have been the same with that which the Latins called Colubraria; but the author last-quoted hath plainly proved, from the testimonies of Pliny and Mela, that they were two different islands; and that the latter was at a much greater

- a distance from that of Ebusus, than the former ; and both of them are so small and inconsiderable, that we need say no more of them. As for Ebusus, it was the name, both of the island, and of the city in it, though the latter was more commonly called Ebusium ; for we find, in ancient inscriptions of Gruter, Ordo Ebusii, and Rp. or Respublica Ebusii ; and are further told, that it was a colony of the *Pbani-sians*¹. The last island worth mentioning was called Capraria, and now Cabrera, probably from the number of goats it bred, as the Colubraria seems to have been from its great quantity of adders. It stands on the south of Majorca, and is chiefly noted for being fatal to mariners. All these islands, and a great number of others mentioned by ancient writers, now not to be found, and supposed to have been since sunk into the sea, did belong to this province of Tarracon, and underwent the same fate of passing from the Carthaginian to the Roman yoke. We shall conclude this section with observing from *Pliny*², that this province was divided into seven conventus, or provincial assemblies, whose names the reader will find in the margin (L). It had seventy-nine towns, twelve colonies, twelve Roman, and eighteen Latian cities, and an hundred and thirty-five stipendiaria or garrisons in the Roman pay, and one confederate.

antient Spaniards.*

- c THERE is no doubt to be made, that, where-ever Spain was inhabited by the descendants of the Celtes, thither they brought their old religion, government, &c. What these were, we have given an account of in a former volume^a ; and shall speak still more largely upon, in the next chapter of the ancient Gauls, the undoubted and immediate descendants of the ancient Celtic stock ; for we must necessarily suppose, and so, indeed, we find, a great affinity between them in all these particulars, as they all sprang from the same origin. But, as the Gauls are better known to us than the Spaniards, we shall refer the greatest part of what we have to say on these different heads, till we come to their history : for, could we even admit what the generality of Spanish writers affirm after Berosus, that Tubal, the fifth son of Japhet, came and peopled Spain so soon as an hundred and forty-three years after the flood, Gomer, his eldest brother, and the father of the Celtes, must have been as soon in possession of Gaul ; and both must, of course, be supposed to have brought the same religion, laws, government, &c. namely, that which they received from their grandfather Noah : and how tenacious both these, and other nations of the same Celtic descent, were of their own religion and laws, will be easily seen by the sequel, especially in the histories of the ancient Gauls and Germans. All that we shall say further of their religion here, is, that it was, in all these countries, the same as that of the old patriarchs : they worshipped one supreme Being, not in temples, as the Greeks and Romans, but in groves consecrated to him. They believed a future state of rewards and punishments, suitable to their behaviour in this. They offered victims to him, and celebrated some festivals in honour of him ; and, in most things, observed a great simplicity in all their religious rites, during a long series of ages, till, by intermingling with other nations, they degenerated into several of their superstitions, especially into their various ways of divination, of which we shall give a fuller account in the next chapter. One bloody and inhuman custom they gave, indeed, into very early, in common with most ancient nations, viz. that of human sacrifices ; the origin of which having endeavoured voured to account for in a former volume, we shall refer our readers to it, to avoid a prolixity ^b.

BUT, as this country came to be invaded by such variety of other nations, such as the Egyptians, who are said to have introduced all the heathenish superstition of their country, the Tyrians, Phœnicians, Carthaginians, and a multitude of others, who settled amongst them, as we shall see in a subsequent section, it is natural to think, that every one brought their own religion and customs with them; and what these were, must be seen in the history we have given of each of those nations in the course of this work; for it were endless to repeat it here. It is plain, such a mixture of different nations must bring, not only a vast variety of religious laws and customs, but produce some alterations in each of them, as they mutually borrowed ^b some doctrines and notions, rites and fashions, from one another, as suited their taste or circumstances. Superstition has no bounds, and persons, either out of wantonness, or impatience, will be easily induced to hunt after a variety of deities, and superstitious ceremonies. This, we find, was the case of the Israelites, though restrained from it under such severe penalties: how much more will it be so, where every one is left at his own liberty? However, after the coming of the lordly Romans, whose constant policy it was, to introduce every-where their gods, religion, laws, &c. either by fair or foul means, we need not doubt, but those, that fell under their dominion, were obliged to submit to this change. The inundation likewise of the northern nations, such as the Suevi, Goths, and Vandals, must likewise ^c have introduced such changes, as may be better imagined than expressed. We shall have occasion to speak of them in their several histories here ensuing; only thus much may be said here, that, though they had embraced christianity, yet they were all of them infected with the Arian heresy. This did not, however, slacken their zeal against the heathenish idolatry and superstition, which had been introduced there by the Egyptians, Carthaginians, Romans, and other nations, whose temples, altars, statues, &c. they destroyed where-ever they came, obliging all, that came under their power, to embrace their religion; but both Sueves and Goths did at length exchange their Arianism for the orthodox faith, the former, under the reign of their king Ariamirus alias Theodimirus, and the latter under Reccaredus, who ^d made open profession of it upon his accession to the crown. Their example was followed by the nobles, bishops, and clergy; and their confession of faith was presented to the famed council of Toledo, where some further regulations were made, for the preservation of orthodoxy, and for introducing a general conformity of worship. This great change was so much the more remarkable, considering the tenaciousness of those nations for their old religion, as it was brought about without persecution, or any other violent means. Upon the whole, it must be owned, that the Goths did make many excellent laws and regulations, for the better government in church and state. We shall speak of them, in their history, in a subsequent chapter; and shall only mention here a famed liturgy peculiar to them, known by ^e several names, such as, officium Gothicum, Toletanum, and Mozarabicum (A), and supposed by most authors to have been compiled by Isidore, then bishop of Hispal or Sevil. This liturgy was confirmed by the Toletan council above-mentioned, tho' the pope did not suffer them to enjoy it many years, before he obliged them to exchange it for the Roman, not without a long and strenuous opposition from the Goths, especially those of Catalonia, who sent a number of deputies to the council of Mantua, to expostulate against such a forced innovation. Some extraordinary particulars we are told with relation to this successful deputation, which, as they display the unfair intrigues, and arbitrary sway, of the Romish court, as well as the superstitious practices of those times, we shall give to our readers in the margin ^f (B).

(A) So called from the name of Mozarabes, which they then gave to those christians, who were under the subjection of the Saracens.

(B) The merit of these two liturgies, we are told, was to be decided by single combat; in which one champion was to fight for the Gothic, and the other for the Roman. They did so; and the latter lost the battle; but, the Roman party raising some fresh chicane about it, it was again agreed to be tried by fire. Accordingly both books were flung into the flames, from which the Gothic was preserved, and the other burnt. But such was the prevalence

- a It is probable, that, though the first inhabitants of Spain were under one monarchical government, upon their first settling in it, as well as those of Gaul, Germany, and other European nations; yet, as they came to increase in number, and enlarge their territories, they split themselves into a multiplicity of petty kingdoms and commonwealths. This was the case of the Gauls and Germans, when Cæsar first came amongst them, as we shall shew in due time; and much more so may we suppose it to have been so here, considering the great variety of nations that came and settled amongst them, of which we shall give a fuller account in a subsequent section of this chapter; for it is more reasonable to suppose, that most, if not all of them brought and settled their own laws and form of government, than that they should submit to that of the antient inhabitants, especially as many of the former came thither rather as conquerors, than colonies; from all which must necessarily result, not only a vast variety, but likewise a constant fluctuation of them, as they passed from one dominion to another, especially when they came under that of the Carthaginians, Romans, Goths, and Vandals (C). After the expulsion of the Carthaginians by the Scipio's, of which we have given an account in a former chapter of this volume, Spain was governed by consuls, proconsuls, prætors, proprætors, and præsides, from that very time down to the reign of Tiberius, if not lower; for we find L. Piso prætor of the hither Spain in his time; and a rescript of Adrian directed to the consul of Bætica. The præsides are mentioned likewise in subsequent reigns; but that title was of a more general signification, and applied to the governors of every inferior province. However, it continued under the government of forty-six emperors, from Augustus, who is said to have finished the conquest of it, to Honorius, in whose reign the Romans were expelled by the Vandals, Alans, and Suevi. Under these emperors, who governed the empire after their own arbitrary will, Spain was divided into two provinces; but soon after reduced into one, though under several governors, or legati and tribuni^a. About the reign of Dioclesian and Maximinian, it began to be governed by comites, or counts; and, if any of these were forced to be absent from their jurisdiction, they left the care of it to substitutes, who were called vicarii. And lastly, in the time of the Goths, those provinces, that were subject to the Romans, were set under government of duces and præfecti. Under the Goths they were governed by nineteen kings, during the space of two hundred years, that prevalence of the pope's party, as it was managed by his then legate, that the synod of Leon decided almost in favour of the latter. The Gothic, however, was far from being wholly set aside. It was retained by several congregations, and by seven churches of Toledo, during a considerable number of years. Neither did it lose its credit by being disused, since even the famed cardinal Ximenes erected a chapel in the city, in which the divine worship was to be performed according to the Gothic or Mozarabic liturgy; but in the end means were found to get it condemned, and wholly set aside, and with it the old character, in which it was writ (1).

This character was not, however, the old famed Runic, of which we shall have occasion to speak in the German history, as has been affirmed by several authors; but the old Gothic, in which most, if not all books, especially church ones, were written at that time in Spain, and elsewhere; and was near the same with the old Roman, but of a coarser mould; and was particularly used in all the Visigothic dominions.

(C) How they were governed under the two former, may be seen by their history in the three last volumes; and how by the latter, in some of the subsequent chapters, as well as in the sequel of this. One thing we must, however, observe here, with respect to the Romans, that it was their constant policy, in their conquered dominions, to distinguish between those, that, through fear, or necessity, had either sought their friendship and protection, or willingly submitted to them; and those, who were subdued by force of arms. The former of these they permitted to preserve their laws, and form of government; and only obliged them to pay a certain tribute, and to send a number of auxiliary forces, and perhaps to quarter a number of their troops; but the others they forced to submit wholly to the Roman laws and government, as we shall have further occasion to shew in the next chapter; though, by the way, it must be observed, with respect to the former, that if they gave the least umbrage to their pretended protectors, they seldom failed of being stripped of their privileges, and of being reduced to the slavish state of the latter. This proved the case of the Spaniards, who were forced, by degrees, to submit, not only to the Roman yoke, but to their religion, customs, &c. and even to their language (2).

We find, however, in some antient authors, the names of several petty kings of Spain, both in the times of the Carthaginians and Romans, who governed in their several little kingdoms, and lived in peace with, and acknowledged them both, or paid some tribute, perhaps, to them; such as Mandonius, whom Livy calls king of the Hergetes, Amulius king of the Lacetani, Andabal mentioned by Polybius, and some others; but to these the Romans only give the title of reguli.

is, from Albanaric, who began his reign in the year of Christ 369. to Leovigild, a an. 569. The Suevi reigned in Galicia, according to Isidorus, an hundred and seventy-seven years, that is, from Hermeric, A. C. 408. to Andeca, who was defeated and dethroned by Leovigild above-mentioned, and brought that kingdom under his subjection A. C. 581. In this list of Suevian kings there is a chain of their names for an hundred years, from Remismund, who infected that kingdom with Arianism, A. C. 464. to Theodimirus, who embraced the orthodox faith, the historians not having thought them worthy to be recorded. The others are ten in number, including Reccaredus above-mentioned. Lastly, the united kingdoms of Goths and Suevi, which began at Reccaredus the successor of Leovigild, and first orthodox king of the Goths, A. C. 568. lasted an hundred and twenty-seven years, that is, to A. C. 713. when the Moors put an end to the kingdom, in the third year of Roderic their seventeenth and last king. Of all these, and their different nations, we shall speak in the sequel, every one in their order. As for those of Leo, Castile, Aragon, Navarre, and Portugal, they will be spoken of in the modern history.

Laws.

WHAT laws the antient Spaniards originally had, or what new ones were imposed upon them by their conquerors, we are left to guess at. We are, indeed, told, that Hercules, upon his coming thither, did give them a body of them, such as he had brought from his own country, whether Egypt, Tyre, or Greece; but what they were, we are wholly in the dark about. If we may, however, offer a conjecture c from what we read about their neighbours the Gauls, who had a multiplicity of governments, some monarchical, some aristocratic, and some even democratic, and, of the former, some limited, some despotic, we may reasonably conclude, that every one of them had their own laws, and such as best suited to their genius, interest, and the safety of the whole; but these do not appear to have extended farther, than to the preservation of each of their particular forms of governments: for, in other cases, each of them had their grand council, to deliberate, enact, explain, and decide, according to the present emergency, as they thought for the good of the community. By these all controversies between man and man, town and town, district and district, were adjudged; and their power was such, that d even their kings, where they had not made themselves wholly absolute, of which we scarce meet with any instance, were obliged to submit to their decision, save only, that in all cases, where the plaintiff was not satisfied with it, he had liberty to challenge his adversary, and to determine the affair by single combat. The same was likewise done between city and city, district and district, who appointed one or more champions to appear for them, and the cause was always adjudged to the conquering side; for it was a constant maxim amongst all the descendants of the Celts, that providence always interposed in such cases, and that, where-ever the victory fell, there was the surest right.

Valour and discipline.

IN the art of war, and military discipline, we shall hereafter have occasion to e shew, that the Gauls, Germans, and other nations of Celtic extract, were very deficient, trusting too much to their strength and bravery, and despising all other arts, and even defensive weapons, as beneath a man of true courage; but, in this respect, the Spaniards, though no less brave and stout, had much the advantage of them, which must be chiefly owing to their being so early and so frequently visited, intermixed, and subdued, by other warlike nations, from whom they received fresh and constant improvements: whereas the Gauls, and other northern nations, being scarcely known till after the coming in of the Romans, and having no other wars to wage, except what they did amongst themselves, one petty kingdom or commonwealth against another, they were quite ignorant of martial discipline; and even f their weapons were so clumsily made, and so miserably tempered, that they often became useless, before half the action was over. In a word, their way of fighting was so artless and rude, that, in many instances, it gave a double advantage to the enemy, as we shall shew in the sequel. The Spaniards, on the contrary, had, by their continual wars with such a variety of polite nations, made themselves masters of, and placed their chief confidence in, their expertness in every branch of the martial trade. Diodorus Siculus tells us*, that the Celtiberians had such an excellent way of tempering the steel, with which they made their weapons, that no shield or

- a helmet could resist them (D); and that they used them with equal dexterity, both on horseback and foot, and alternately, if occasion required. He likewise commends them much for their extraordinary nimbleness in giving or avoiding of blows; and adds, that they used likewise the same defensive weapons that other nations did, such as the shield, &c. And this is the reason why the Romans were so long subduing them, and spent more years in the conquest of this country, than Cæsar did weeks; if we may believe him, in the reduction of Gaul. In the former they were forced to proceed, as it were, inch by inch, against a stout and warlike nation, that knew how to take every advantage of ground, situation, disposition, &c. in the other, every battle gained by Cæsar, and these by his own confession, were easily obtained
- b through this want of skill, opened to him a way through whole provinces, who were glad to submit to him on any tolerable terms. What increases the wonder, is, that, at the coming in of the Romans, the Spaniards had sustained such long and dreadful wars, especially just before, against the Carthaginians; that one might have expected them to have been quite exhausted of their strength; and much more likely would they have been so by those, which they were now engaged in, in a new one, against a more potent and numerous enemy; and yet it is plain, they held out against them near, if not quite, two hundred years, before they were entirely subdued; nor were they then wholly so, since we find there was a constant necessity to keep a numerous army, and a watchful eye over them; and even quite to disarm whole provinces, to keep them under a tyranny, which many thousands of them thinking shameful and insupportable, preferred a voluntary death to such a slavish state; so dreadfully abject did it appear to that fierce and warlike nation, says Livy, to live without arms: and indeed what Valerius Maximus says of the Celtiberians, or Spaniards, was common to all the Celtic nation, and their descendants, That they esteemed nothing so glorious, as to die with their sword in hand, and in defence of their liberty. We shall see many pregnant instances of this noble spirit in some subsequent chapters. Even by the confession of some of their own authors, the victories, which they gained over them, did often cost them so dear, that they deserved nothing less than such a pompous name; and many a triumph
- d they have celebrated over them, which, had it had its due, would have been turned into a doleful mourning for a bloody and signal defeat. Thus much we think is incumbent on an impartial author to say, in justice to any brave conquered people, though it be much more common now-a-days to see them treated with the same contempt and disregard by modern writers, as they were wont to be by their lordly conquerors. We shall conclude this article with a judicious remark, which has been long since made, with respect to this conquest of Spain, that though the Roman conquerors were always eager of taking the surname of those nations they subdued, such as Asiaticus, Africanus, Germanicus, &c. yet none of them, not even Augustus Cæsar, who is complimented by Livy with having put the finishing stroke to it, nor any of his successors, though most of them ambitious enough of such high titles, ever took that of Hispanicus, Ibericus, or any other that this country was called by. Q. Cæcil. Metellus was the only one, who aimed at it, and would fain have obtained that of Celtibericus, but could not. This seems to argue the Romans to have been so conscious of the vast deal of blood and treasure, which it had cost them, more than any other, that they could see no reason for bestowing any such honours upon them; and for which there might not have been the least pretence, had the Spaniards been united into one common interest, instead of being divided into so many governments, and under so many heads; for this, after all, will be found the main cause of their falling under the Roman yoke.
- e How soon arts and sciences began to flourish in Spain, can only be guessed at. That they have an excellent genius for them, is evident from the great number of excellent men it has produced, of which we shall mention only three of the most illustrious; viz. the famed Stoic philosopher Seneca, who was a native of Corduba; the learned orator Quintilian, and the great cosmographer Pomponius Mela, often quoted thro' this work: and though we find other European nations very slow and late in cultivating them, such as the Gauls, Germans, and others, who affected a singular contempt for them, as unsuitable to, and unworthy of, their martial genius; yet, considering the vast concourse of foreign nations into this kingdom, their excellent situation for trade and commerce, the great quantities and variety of metals which it afforded, it is very reasonable to suppose they must have begun to encourage them much earlier than any of their neighbours; and that whatever natural reluctance, such as was common to all people of Celtic extract, they may have had against them, necessity must have forced them to overcome it, in their own defence and preservation. We shall say nothing here of those trades and manufactures, for which they have since rendered themselves famous for some ages, till they again relapsed into their antient pride and indolence, out of which they were but lately roused up again. ^b But, with respect to their antient ones, though we have not much of them upon record, it seems almost impossible they could have subsisted without them, considering the continued invasions they were exposed to, and the many enemies they were forced to make head against. Even learning, and the liberal arts, if we may believe Strabo, began early to flourish here ^h; for he tells us, that the Turdetani, a people of Bætica, were become very famous for them, and were possessed of a vast number of volumes of great antiquity, and bodies of laws writ in verse, and other pieces of poetry of above six thousand years standing; which last, however exaggerated, doth at least shew, that there was some foundation for their pretence of having been early encouragers of several kinds of it: and this is further confirmed by several other antient authors, particularly one of their own nation ⁱ, but more manifestly by what Pliny tells us ^k of one Lartius Licinius, a private person, who made no culy to give an immense sum (E) for a book of Pliny II's commentaries.

Their language, the old Celtic.

We make no difficulty to affirm, that the original language of Spain was the old Celtic, of which we have given some account in a former volume ^l, and shall have occasion to speak further of in the next chapter; for, whether we suppose, with the generality of Spanish authors, that Tubal came thither by sea, and peopled that country, or, as we have elsewhere hinted, that the Celtes, or descendants of Gomer his eldest brother, spread themselves thither by gradual migrations, the case will be much the same in this particular, because, on the supposition of the former hypothesis, Tubal and Gomer parting so soon after the flood, their language must have been the same; that is, the Tubalians, or, as they are called by others, Cetubales, and the Gomerians, must have carried the same language into those countries where they settled, whether we call it by the name of the one, or of the other; with this difference only, that it must have been much purer, and nearer that of the antediluvian patriarchs, whether that was the Hebrew, or any other; concerning which we shall not here repeat what we said on the subject at the entrance of this work ^m. But as that Berosian account is now, by most learned men, (except the Spaniards, who are fond of their own antiquity, beyond other nations) rejected as fabulous, we have ventured here, and elsewhere, to ascribe the first peopling of Spain to the Celtes, or descendants of Gomer. And what confirms this hypothesis, is, that their antient language, as it is still preserved in some parts of Spain, appears to be the same with that which is spoken by our Welsh, who are descended from Gomer, and retain still their paternal name of Gomerai, and call their own language Gomraeg, as we have shewed in their history, quoted a little higher. We likewise there took notice of the vast affinity there is between it and the antient Hebrew, insomuch that to those, who are masters of both, they plainly appear to be only dialects of the same tongue; or, to speak, perhaps, more properly, the Celtic, or language of the descendants of Gomer, is a dialect of the Hebrew, or language of Noah. And hence the modern Spanish, as it is now spoken throughout that country, will afford us a new proof of what we have advanced on this head. Many learned men have observed, that it retains a great number of names, words, and, we might add, idioms too, which to them plainly appeared to be of Hebrew extract, but have been at a loss how to account for it. It is absurd to suppose, that they

a were brought thither by the Jews, who fled from their country, whilst Nabuchadnezzar was laying it waste; and came and settled there, as some have imagined; for that nation is rather famed for losing their tongue, than preserving it, much less for propagating it in any country they come to. This made Aldrete to think those words to be of Arabic, and not of Hebrew extract, and to be of no longer date, than the coming in of the Moors. Had that learned author had recourse to the old language, which is still kept in some parts of Biscay, Navarre, and Catalonia, he would have found such a vast number of them, as would have convinced him, that they must be a great many centuries older than the coming in of the Moors: and, had he known any thing of the affinity there is between the Hebrew b and the Celtic, he would have easily concluded, that all those words and idioms in the modern Spanish, must have come from the latter, and not from the former; which would have removed all the difficulty, without having recourse to the Arabic. What seems to have misled him into this notion, is, that there is likewise a great conformity between this last language and the Celtic: hence that surprising number of words and idioms common to the High Dutch and Arabic, which has puzzled so many critics, and cannot be otherwise accounted for, than by supposing them to be of Celtic original, which, like the old Arabic, was, as we hinted a little higher, a dialect, or, as some chuse rather to suppose it, both the Hebrew, and they, were dialects of the original tongue. If we allow then the Celts to have been either c the first, or even some of the first inhabitants of Spain, there will be the less wonder there should be still found, in the modern language of that country, such primitive words, notwithstanding the length of time, and various changes, it may have undergone, since it is no more than what may be observed, not only in the High and Low Dutch, and other northern languages, but even in the French, the farthest removed, and strangeliest altered, from the old Gaulish, or Celtic. We may add, that the modern Spanish preserves more of the masculine grandeur, beauty, and energy, of the old Celtic, than any other in Europe. The same may be said of the Spanish nation, with respect to the antient Celtic grandeur and majesty; and we may safely add of their pride, and singular contempt for, not only trade, d commerce, manufactures, and the like, but even for agriculture, which they looked upon as below their dignity, and martial genius; and therefore turned them over, as much as they could, to their slaves, as we shall shew, when we come to speak of the Gauls in the next chapter.

BUT whatever the original language of Spain may have been at first, it must have suffered great changes under those different nations, by whom this country was subdued, and of whom we shall give a further account in the sequel: but the greatest of all was under the Romans; for these made it their constant business to introduce theirs into every country that fell under their hands; at first, by founding schools, and even universities, where youth might, with the Latin tongue and character, be taught the arts and sciences, which was no small inducement to inspire them with a fondness for it; and, where that failed, then more forcible means were used, so that in time almost the whole kingdom came to speak it as their mother-tongue, only those few tribes of the antient inhabitants, who, perhaps, like our Welsh here, fled into such mountainous countries, where they could not be conquered, and retained their original one. The Latin continued no longer there, than to the coming in of the Goths and Vandals, under whom it began by degrees to dwindle from its purity, as it did in Gaul, Italy, and other parts, where those barbarous nations, as they were called, got any dominion, and to adopt their barbarisms, and to decline into the state, in which we see it now. And here it must be observed, f with respect to the Spanish, that it has suffered the least corruption, and retains more of the antient Latin, of any in Europe. This makes us think, that it did not receive any considerable alteration under the Moors; otherwise it must have deviated much more from it, than it actually doth: besides, it is not likely, whatever Aldrete might infer from his fancied words and idioms of Arabic extract, and of which we have given a more probable origin, that Spaniards, fond as they ever were of their old ways, would have adopted any thing from a nation, which could not but be hateful to them, as invaders and conquerors; and much more so, on account of their religion.

Their writing.

FROM what we lately quoted out of Strabo, it is plain, the antient Spaniards must have admitted writing amongst them many ages before either the Gauls, Germans, or any others of Celtic extract; since these, as shall be shewn in due place, made it a religious maxim to commit nothing to writing, either of their history, learning, or religion, but contented themselves with preserving them in proper poems, which their druids and bards learned by heart, and transmitted in the same way to their disciples. But it is more than probable, that the former were, in some measure, forced to it by some of those many nations, under whose dominion they passed from time to time, such especially as the Phœnicians, Cartaginians, the Greeks, and the Romans: but, which of those different characters was first adopted, or became most in vogue, we cannot pretend to say; only that, from the coming of the Romans, their letters, as well as language, drove out all the rest, and was in use till their expulsion, when the old Gothic, of which we gave an account at the beginning of this section, took place. This last, though far inferior to the Roman in beauty, and more tiring to the eyes, continued in such vogue throughout Europe, from the coming of the Goths, downwards, that all church divinity, and law-books, were written, and (even long after the invention of printing, and reviving of the old Roman) were printed in it. We have seen there why, and how, it was at length condemned and set aside.

An odd way of computing time in Spain.

It will not be amiss here to take notice of an odd way, which the Spaniards of old had of computing of time, and which was peculiar to that nation. It took its rise in the reign of Cæsar Augustus, prevailed all over Spain, and was not abolished till after the middle of the thirteenth century; that is, first, in Aragon, by Peter IV. A. D. 1358. in Castile, by king John, an. 1383. and, in Portugal, by John I. an. 1415. This way was, to reckon the years by æras, or rather from the æra, as they called it, without any other explanation, instead of computing from the creation, flood, birth of Christ, or any other remarkable epoch; and this was used, not only in their profane, but, what is still more surprising, in their ecclesiastic records. So that it has puzzled the learned not a little, at first, to fix the point of time of this æra, and to find out a tolerable etymon for that word thus used. It is not worth troubling our readers with their various conjectures upon it; for nothing but conjecture has as yet been offered, and some of them, too, forced and far fetched. It shall suffice to say here, that they are all agreed on one point, viz. that the æra did commence in Augustus's time, some add, that it was instituted in honour of him; but they differ about the number of years which it preceded the birth of Christ. Some reckon it but barely twenty-six years, and think those highly mistaken, who give it any more. Others think it began on the year, in which that prince ordered the world to be taxed, as the evangelist words it; and that it was called æra from the as, or copper coin which was exacted by that decree^b. Some carry it higher, to fifty-two years before Christ, which was, according to them, the year in which Julius Cæsar was killed, and Augustus succeeded him: the rightest of them, in our opinion, are those, who deduct the first four years out of that emperor's reign, because, as he was then but one of the triumvirs, it is not likely the Spaniards should have begun so soon to compliment him with this new computation; and consequently think, that it did not take place till the fifth year of his triumvirship, when that country, together with Gaul, and some other provinces, fell to his lot; and that was forty-eight years before the birth of Christ. As for the original of the word, those that do not like that we mentioned above, which is that of Isidore bishop of Seville^d, will be less pleased with some others, which Spanish critics have fetched still farther. That of Vaseus, who thinks that æra was a mark stamped on the coin, to shew the value of it; and that of Resendius, who affirms that æra was nothing else but a term to signify a computation, or computed number; would appear most probable to us, if they were backed with any good authority^e.

Education.

THE education of their children in antient days chiefly consisted in training them up to martial deeds, using them to such food and exercises, as tended to make them strong and robust, active and nimble; in inspiring them with a love of liberty, and a contempt of death. These principles were so strongly inculcated into them from their infancy, and so carefully riveted in them both by precept and

- a example, as they grew up, as well as by the hopes of a glorious future life to the bold and brave, and of misery and ignominy to the base and cowardly, that the whole nation seemed unanimously to prefer death before slavery, and looked upon it as the most glorious of all blessings to die fighting in defence of their country. Even their women, by being obliged to train up their children in this martial way, contracted such a habit of bravery, that they seldom or never failed of shewing some signal examples of it to them, as often as an opportunity offered itself. But we shall defer speaking more particularly on this head, till the next chapter, where we shall single out several instances of this native valour, in these and other Celtic nations, even in those of the softer sex, and tender years.
- b We have already observed, that this country was not only excellently situate for Commerce, trade and commerce, but abounded with such commodities, especially silver, as invited all the trading nations of Europe, Asia, and Africa, to come thither for them, to settle among them, and even to subdue them; insomuch that scarce any kingdom under heaven ever passed through so many different dominions as this. Egyptians, Phenicians, Tyrians, Carthaginians, Greeks, Romans, Gauls, Germans, Goths, Vandals, Moors, and many others, have had their particular settlements in it; and the greatest part of them, if not all, have held it, or at least some considerable share of it, under their subjection, promoted the trade and navigation of it, and founded great and opulent cities, and contributed towards the enriching of it.
- c What condition the country was in, before those strange nations came into it, we dare not say, though, if we were to believe one half of what the Spanish historians have written on this head, it must have been in a more flourishing condition than any other; since we are told by them, that, even before the coming of Hercules, it had a great number of rich and stately towns and cities, and these of great antiquity too^f: and this seems in some measure confirmed by antient writers, such as Strabo, Justin, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela, and others; and indeed, if they really had such a succession as we are going to give in the next section, of long-lived and opulent monarchs, from Tubal the grandson of Noah to Geryon, whom that hero overcame, there would be no room to doubt of the truth of such antient cities having been built before his time. But the misfortune is, that there is no other authority for those reigns, than that of Berosus, who, as we shall shew in the sequel, is justly looked upon now as a fabulous author, and that what the Greek and Roman authors mentioned above have said of the pretended antiquity of those cities, and their founders, was in all likelihood taken upon trust from the Spaniards themselves, who appear plainly enough to have been as fond of indulging this passion for antiquity, as ever the Greeks, or any other of their neighbours; but of this we must leave every reader to judge for himself.
- To close up the character of the antient Spaniards, they possessed all the virtues of the old Celtic nation, and inherited fewer of their vices, than any others of their descendants; they were brave, noble, and magnanimous, and hospitable to a high degree, and so famed for their faithfulness, that, even after their being conquered by the Romans, several of those emperors made no difficulty of preferring them to other people, to be their life-guard. They were sober, frugal, patient under hardships, jealous of their honour, and, till a few centuries past, rather desirous, as much as they could, to preserve their own territories, than to go in search of new ones abroad. As for the vices they had in common with all others of Celtic extract, and of which we shall speak more fully in the subsequent chapters, those of pride, cruelty, superstition, and laziness, are justly laid to their charge, as well as to that of the Gauls, Germans, and others^g; but it doth not appear, that they imitated them in their sumptuous banquets, much less in their excessive fondness for strong liquors; on the contrary, they are famed for their aversion to them, by which they preserved themselves from such bloody quarrels, as were the natural consequence of those drunken revels, which we find to have been so indulged among their neighbours, and were commonly attended with the worst effects.

The origin, antiquity, and chronology, of the antient Spaniards.

Spain, its first inhabitants.

WE have, in several parts of this work^a, proceeded on the most probable a hypothesis, founded on the testimony of the best and most antient authors, that the Celtes, the descendants of Gomer the eldest son of Japhet^b, were the first that peopled Europe, at least as far as the Danube and Rhine, and even beyond. Whether this was done by gradual migrations from the place of their dispersion after the flood, or by colonies brought thither by sea, will, we think, be more properly inquired into in the next chapter, where we shall speak of the Gauls the immediate descendants of those Celtes, and where we shall shew, from the best antient testimonies, that these were, from the earliest times, found settled in every part of it, and even in this of Spain, notwithstanding its being surrounded on three sides b by the sea, and on the other by the Pyrenees, before any nation that intermingled afterwards among them, of whom we have given an account in the first section of this chapter, and shall have further occasion to speak at the entrance of the next^c. According to this hypothesis, it will be impossible to guess, about what time either this, or any other country of Europe, were peopled by them, or which of them claims the preference in point of antientness before the rest, or even to assert any thing of this country before the coming of Hercules into it.

Berosian list of

Tubal, or Thubal.

BUT the Spaniards, ever fond of their own antiquity, beyond any other nation, having once adopted fabulous Berosus, have fetched their origin from another spring, namely, from Tubal, the fifth son of Japhet^d, whom that author affirms to have come into, and reigned in Spain from the year of the flood 143. to 258. and from whom they pretend to derive a regular series of long-winded monarchs, down to the three Geryons, who were killed by the Egyptian Hercules, to say nothing of a much longer one, which they likewise draw from this last hero, and some other new-comers from Libya, down to the time in which they allow the Celtes to have made their first entrance into Spain, viz. in the year of the flood 1350; so that, according to these authors, Spain had been a monarchy, and had lasted, one thousand two hundred and twenty-six years before the coming of the Celtes into it^e. This account, how fabulous soever, not only with regard to Tubal's reign, and of his pretended successor, but likewise, in some measure, with regard to those of Hercules, as it is not only adopted by all the Spanish authors in general, but likewise by all the followers of Berosus, we shall be obliged, before we go further, to give our readers a compendious sketch of it, especially as we have all along in this work given an account of the fabulous, as well as the more certain, part of the history of each nation; and shall do the same in those that follow, especially in that of our own.

1. Tubal, having received his grandfather's blessing, came, according to these historians, and settled in some part of Spain (A), in the 134th year of the flood, and reigned

(A) This Berosian fable they think sufficiently backed by what we read in Josephus (1), who makes Tubal, or Thubal, at he is called, to have peopled Spain; and by St. Jerome's comment on the prophets Isaiah and Ezekiel, where he understands by Tubal either Italy or Spain; but this, at most, will only prove, that some of that patriarch's posterity came and peopled this country, or perhaps came and settled in some part of it; but not, that he came thither himself, and founded a monarchy in it; which has been sufficiently exploded in some former part of this work (2), and by the generality of authors, who have confuted the fabulous founder of that notion (3).

However, these partial ones, who have adopted it, have built many other conjectural schemes upon it; such as the place where he landed, settled, &c. the system of religion, laws, &c. he left with them, and the like; inasmuch that they affirm, that his descendants did strictly adhere to the precepts given

- a reigned there to the year 258; during which interval Noab, called, by profane authors, Janus, came thither, and built two cities, the one of which he called, from his own name, Noela in Galicia, and the other Noega in Asturia, and which, to this day, retains still that of Navia.
2. Iberus, the son of Tubal, who began his reign in the year of the flood 258. Iberus reigned thirty-seven years, that is, to the year 295. From him our authors pretend, that the river Iberus, from which Spain was called Iberia, had its name. We have elsewhere given a much more probable etymon of these two names ^f. He was succeeded by his son,
3. Idubeda, by some called Juballa, and Jubalda, who reigned sixty-four years, Idubeda gave name to the famed Idubedan mountains, peopled the province of Briga, now Riola, and called it by that name from,
4. Brigo, his son and successor (B), who reigned fifty-two years, and left the Brigo kingdom to his son,
5. Tagus, who reigned thirty years, gave name to the river Tagus, and was succeeded by his son,
6. Batus, from whom the river Betis, and the province of Batia, Batica, formerly Turdetania, and since Andalusia, had their names. He is said to have been surnamed Turdetanus, on account of his introducing, as well as encouraging, learning.
- c 7. Geryon, an African, or Libyan, of a gigantic stature, and a bloody tyrant, Geryon who began his reign in the year of the flood 514. and reigned, according to some, twenty-five, and thirty-four years, according to others ^g. Against him came Osiris, or, as he is called by others, Dionysius king of Egypt, with a powerful army, defeated and killed the tyrant (C), and divided his kingdom between his three sons, commonly called the three Geryons, after having first exacted a strict promise from them, that they would reign amicably, and abstain from those plunders, ravages, and cruelties, for which he had so justly punished their father.
8. THREE Geryons, said to have been all of one birth, and the last of the Geryonic race, reigned with such surprising concord, that they are thought to have given birth to the fable that represents them with a threefold body. These being supposed to have had a hand in the death of Osiris, in revenge of that of their father, Hercules, his son, brought a great army from Egypt, first gave them a to Noab by God, and preserved themselves free from idolatry, polytheism, and all heathenish superstition, till Hercules brought those plagues from Egypt, and infected Spain with them. But of this we shall have a fairer occasion to speak in the next chapter, where we shall enter into a more exact detail of the religion of the Celts and Gauls.

(B) From him the Briones, or Brigones, situate along the long ridge of Idubedan mountains, are affirmed, by the Navarrese historians, to have been named, as well as the city of Cantabria, antiently, according to them, Cantabriga; whilst the Castellani derive both from the Galli Bracati, who came and settled there.

The word Briga, which had the same signification in Spain, and in the cities Cantabriga and Alcidobriga, which the antient Gallie Dun or Dunum, in the names Lugdunum, Noviodunum, and the German Burgh, in Friburg, Ausburgh, &c. is likewise affirmed to have had its origin from him. But the word Brig or Brie, from which Briga and Brica differ only in termination, is certainly of Celtic extraction, as we shall see in the next chapter. Several other things are said likewise of this king, without any foundation, which the reader may see in the Spanish authors lately quoted.

(C) This Geryon was also called Deabus; and is surnamed, by the Greeks, Chryso, on account of the vast wealth which he had gotten by his plunders and robberies. He is said to have brought over a number of wild or Scenite Arabs, and to have been the founder of the city of Girona (4). Diodorus Siculus makes him the son of Chrysaor, or the golden sword, the son of Medusa. From his defeat is supposed to have sprung the fable of Hercules's overcoming him, and carrying his oxen away, spoken of in a former volume (5). Justin, indeed, makes mention of him, and of his vast herds of cattle (6); but Strabo and Pliny look upon the whole as mere fable (7); and Arrian further affirms (8), that there never was such a king as Geryon in Spain. Aristotle says, that Hercules (whom even some Spanish authors affirm to have been, not the Egyptian, but the Greek one, and son of Jupiter by (9) Alcmena) had been enticed over into Spain by the richness of its inhabitants: whence a law is pretended to have been enacted amongst them, forbidding the use or possession of silver, which was still in force some time after the coming thither of the Carthaginians (10). Something like this law was likewise among some of the antient Gauls, of which we shall speak in the next chapter.

total overthrow, and then overcame and slew them, one after another, in single combat. It is said, that the columns between the Carpean and Abylean mountains were set up in memory of this exploit. They had reigned, according to our authors, near forty years, when they received this overthrow, and were buried in the isle of Caliz^b. Hercules, who did not come so much to conquer that kingdom, as to deliver the world from tyrants and robbers, had no sooner overcome the three Geryons, than he made ready to pass into Italy, and left the government of Spain to his son,

Hispal. 9. Hispal (D), who built the city of that name, now called Seville, which was afterwards rebuilt and beautified by Cesar: and from Hispal began a new succession of Spanish kings. He is said to have reigned seventeen years, and to have left his kingdom to his son, Hispan. 10. Hispan, or Hispanus, from whom the country took its name, which it hath preserved ever since. He began his reign in the year of the flood 607. and reigned thirty-one years, and is affirmed to have been a noble and magnificent prince (E), and to have made the city of Caliz his chief residenceⁱ.

Hercules. Hercules, hearing of his son Hispan's death, returned into Spain, and reigned there from the year of the flood 639. to 658. Being grown very old, he bequeathed the Spanish kingdom to Hesperus, one of his captains and companions; and died, and was buried at Gades, Caliz, where that stately monument was erected to him, which we mentioned in a late note, and which became in high veneration, not only among the Spaniards, but was resorted to by most nations of Europe, Asia, and Afric (F).

Hesperus. 11. Hesperus, from whom both Spain and Italy were called Hesperia, but the former, by way of distinction, Hesperia Magna, and his brother Atlas, surnamed Italus, had accompanied Hercules in all his excursions and conquests. Upon the death of that hero, Hesperus caused himself to be proclaimed his successor, as by his will and appointment. Atlas, who is supposed to have been left in Italy, upon the return of the other two in Spain, came thither also himself, and drove him out of his kingdom, in the year of the flood 669. after he had reigned there eleven years.

Atlas. 12. Atlas, after he had reigned ten years in Spain, is said to have returned into Italy, in order to drive his brother thence also; for it seems that fugitive prince was fled thither, and was so well received there, as to give him new cause of jealousy. Upon his departure he left the kingdom to his son,

Orus. 13. Orus, or Sicorus (G), who reigned forty-five years. He gave his name to the river Sicoris, now Segre, which falls into the Iberus, or Ebro; and was succeeded by his son,

Sicanus. 14. Sicanus, who had followed him from Italy into Spain; a prince said to have been liberal and magnanimous. He gave name to the river Anas, now Ana; reigned

(D) In this expedition it is pretended that our Egyptian hero introduced the idolatry and superstition of his country; to which another author adds the bloody rite of offering up human victims (11).

He had likewise two favourite companions with him, the one named Zacynthus, and the other Baleon; the former of whom gave his name to the famed city of Zacynthum, since Saguntum (12); and the other to the Balearic islands, now Majorca and Minorca (13).

Another ancient author, who was a Spaniard by birth, adds, that the Tyrians built a stately temple to this Hercules, which became famous, both for its antiquity and vast treasures (14).

(E) To him some ancient authors have falsely ascribed, among other sumptuous works, the aqueduct of Segovia, which was done by the emperor Trajan, and the Pharus or famed tower of Cornunus, a maritime city in Galicia, which was erected in Augustus's time (15).

(F) It is hardly worth the while to trouble our readers with the various sentiments of the learned concerning this famed hero; whether he was the Egyptian, Phœnician, or Grecian Hercules: especially as we have had occasion to speak of him in some former parts of this work, to which we must here refer our readers (16), as well as to what we shall have further occasion to speak of him in the next chapter.

(G) From this, and the two following princes names, Sicanus and Sicleus, it is supposed, that their proper names were Orus, Anus, and Eleus; and that the Sic was a titular prænomén: and this is further proved by Anus giving his name to the river Ana, and Eleus to that of Eles (17).

a thirty-two years, during which he is said to have carried his successful arms into Italy, and Sicily, which was from him called Sicania, as it had been before, Tinacria, and since, Sicily, from his successor,

15. Sicleus succeeded his father, and reigned forty-four years, during which he Sicleus is said to have passed over into Italy, and performed very great feats, and to have assisted Iafus, the grandson of Atlas, by Eleëtra his daughter, who was then at high wars with Dardanus, about the succession to certain states in that country. In this prince's reign the Deucalian flood is said to have happened, and that Moses was then likewise performing his wonders before the hardened king of Egypt.

16. Sicleus was succeeded by his son Lufus, who had accompanied him in his Lufus wars in Italy. He is said to have been a brave prince, but vastly addicted to the heathenish superstitions that then prevailed. Some attribute the peopling of Lusitania, now Portugal, to him, from whom it was called by that name; others, to another Lufus, a chieftain and companion of Bacchus. We can affirm nothing certain about either. Lufus reigned thirty years, and was succeeded by,

17. Ulus, or Sic-Ulus, whom some make the son of Lufus, others of Atlas. He Ulus was so warlike a prince, kept such vast armies and fleets, that he was called the son of Neptune. He passed over into Italy, to assist those Spanish colonies, that had been settled there by Atlas, repressed their enemies there, peopled some countries in the neighbourhood of Rome, built some cities, and particularly the famed castle of Alfino; thence he passed into Sicily, to assist those Spanish colonies, which his predecessors had fixed there, and who, it seems, were sadly harassed by the other inhabitants of that island, which, from his great feats there, he called by his own name. He reigned about sixty years, and was succeeded, by what means can scarcely be guessed¹, by,

18. Tesla, an African, or Libyan, to whom, however, the Spanish historians give Tesla the character of a good and wise prince. Some of them affirm, that it was in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, that a colony of Greeks, from the island of Zacynthus, now Jasanto, came into Spain by sea; and, with his permission, settled in that part of it, which they called by the name of their native place, though they became afterwards better known by those of Saguntini and Saguntines. Here then is a new and different account of the foundation of that famed city and people, of whose valour and sad catastrophe we have spoken at large at the beginning of this volume¹; and this, if right, destroys what we mentioned a little higher concerning the origin, which is given them by other authors. Nothing can be advanced on either side but conjecture. As for Tesla, after a long reign of seventy-four years, he was succeeded by his son,

19. Romus, who reigned thirty-three years, and is supposed to have founded the Romus city of Rome, in the province of Tarragona, since called Valentia, from the Romans calling that city afterwards by this name, and enlarging and beautifying it, and making it the metropolis of it (H). In this prince's reign the Phanicians are said to have made their first entrance into Spain; and about the same time also the famed Greek Bacchus comes chieftain Iacchus, or Bacchus, surnamed Liber Pater, with a considerable army, not into Spain. so much with a design to conquer that country, as to spread his fame and colonies on this, as he had done on the other, side of the world, where he is said to have carried his conquests as far as the Indies. As he travelled through Andalusia, he built the famed city Nebrisa, in the province of Batica, since called Veneria, and now Lebrina, the native place of the learned Antony Nebriffensis, often quoted in this chapter; who says, on this head, that Lufus the son of Bacchus gave name to Lusitania, and that this expedition happened two hundred years before the destruction of Troy. Romus was succeeded by,

20. Palatuus, the supposed founder of the city of Palentia, or Palantia. This Palatuus prince had reigned about eighteen or nineteen years in great tranquillity, when a

(H) Others will have it, the people of that province built this famed city, and called it by that name, in honour of Romus; and that the Greeks called it Rome, and the Latins Valentia, as names of the same import in each language (18).

Cæus defeated. famous warrior, named Licinius Cæus, raised a war against him, and deprived him, ^a according to some, of part, and, according to others, of his whole kingdom, and forced him to wander about from country to country, whilst he reigned uncontroubled, and encouraged all kinds of arts and handicraft trades, which, till then, had been much neglected in that country (I). At length Palæus found means to recover his kingdom from him, after he had possessed it thirty-six years; and gave him a total overthrow near mount Cæus, now Montcayo, so called from him, after this overthrow. Some pretend, that he was slain upon it; others, that he retired into Italy: however that be, Palæus reigned seventy years, and was succeeded by,

Erythræus. 21. Erythræus, in whose reign is placed the founding of the famed city of Carthage, of which we shall say no more here, having given an ample account of it in ^b a former volume ^m. He is said to have given name to the famed island of Erythræa, or Erythia, as it is called by Mela ⁿ and Pliny ^o, an island, which has been sought far and near ^p. We have endeavoured, at the beginning of this volume, to give the best account of its situation, to which we shall refer our readers ^q. Erythræus was the last of the line of Tesla, in which the monarchy had lasted two hundred and forty-five years, according to some; or an hundred and twenty-three, according to others ^r, including the forty-six years of Licinius's usurpation. He was succeeded by,

Gargoras. 22. Gargoras, surnamed Mellicola, because, as Justin hath it, he found out the use of honey, and cultivating of bees. He was a Spaniard by birth, a wise prince, ^c and a great promoter of industry. In his reign the famed city of Troy having been destroyed by the Greeks, of which, as well as its long siege, an account has been given in a former volume ^s, many of those warriors, who either did not care, or were hindered, by contrary winds, from returning into their own country, came and settled in Spain, and built cities in several parts of it, and, amongst them, those which the reader will find in the margin (K). To Gargoras succeeded, if we may believe Justin ^t,

Habis, his excellent reign. 23. Habis, his grandson, by a daughter, and a bastard, but in all other respects an extraordinary prince, whether we consider the many and surprising dangers he was obliged to go through, and from which he was delivered, as it were, by as ^d many miracles, or the beauty and talents of his person, or the many and signal benefits which the Spanish nation received from him during his reign, to which he was, such was his apparent merit, nominated by his grandfather in his life. The Spaniards at that time were still so very rude and uncivilized, that they knew nothing of the use of bread, or of cultivating the earth. It was he, it seems, that first taught them to plough their land with oxen, to sow and reap corn, to grind, knead, and bake it into bread. He likewise gave them many excellent laws, obliged them to live in towns, and appointed them seven courts of judicature in seven cities of his kingdom. Our author adds, that, after his death, his kingdom continued in his posterity during several centuries; but we must not thence suppose, that either he or ^e they, or indeed any of his predecessors, were masters of the whole country, but only of some considerable part, as we hinted a little higher, in speaking of their government. How long this last king reigned, who succeeded him, &c. what other

(I) Some authors are so fond of raising the fame of this usurper, that they make him the first, who set about discovering the iron mines in Spain, and set up the fabrication of that metal. He might, perhaps, have given greater encouragement to this manufacture than any of his predecessors; but that they should have been such strangers in Spain to the working of so necessary a metal, is altogether improbable.

(K) Tencer, the son of Telamon, one of the first that came into Spain, settled in that part where the new Carthage was built, since called Carthagena, if he was not the founder of it. From thence he passed into Galicia, and gave name to that canton (19). He is likewise said to have built the city of Salmantica, now Salamanca, in memory of his own native country; though Stephen of Byzantium, who calls it Elmantica, says nothing of his founding it. Amphilochus, a companion of Tencer, is said to have built that of Amphiloque, since called Agua Caldas, or hot waters, and now Orense in Galicia. Diomedes built Tydo on the banks of the Minus, now Minna, in memory of his father Tydeus. a other kings reigned in other parts of Spain, and many other things relating to the ancient history of it, we are wholly left in the dark about, down to the coming of the Carthaginians, no ancient historian having left us any thing about it. Only this chasm is filled up, by some fabulous authors of theirs, with such stuff, as smells as rank of the fable, as what we have here in England from our own monkish books; we shall mention one or two of them, by way of sample:

IN the year after the flood 1250. that is, thirty-four years after the beginning of Flabis's reign, began, according to these authors, such an extraordinary drought, A long and great drought. that it did not rain in all Spain during the space of twenty-six years, insomuch that all the rivers of it, except the Bætis and the Iberus, were dried up, and the country become almost a desert, for want of inhabitants. If such a long and universal drought had really happened, it would rather be a wonder, that there were either man or beast alive in most parts of that vast country. They tell us, indeed, that about the same time a certain people, whom they call Almonides, came and settled in it; but, if so, is it not very strange, that no ancient author should have taken the least notice of it? for which reason the learned author, often quoted in this chapter, justly rejects both as fabulous. Fifty-seven years after, Homer, or, as his right name was, Melesigenes, travelled through Spain and Italy. This was before he lost his sight; and he, according to Herodotus, flourished an hundred and sixty-eight years after the Trojan war.

c ABOUT forty-two years after, the Celtes, or Gauls, are said to have come first into Spain, and, about twenty-years after, the Rhodians. Of the first it is affirmed, that they fought for some time with the Spaniards, or Iberians, as they were then called, about their settlements; but agreed at length upon a peace, and mutual friendship; so that they, from that time, became so blended with each other, by intermarrying, and living together, that they became as one people, under the name of Celtiberians. From which account we would observe by-the-by, that this could only be one of those colonies, which the Celtes in Gaul sent into the country: for more than one or two they sent from thence hither, as well as into other parts of Europe, as often as they were streightened for want of room, as we shall see in the next chapter. It is, therefore, very probable, that these colonies, coming into Spain, after a few battles or skirmishes, being found, by the inhabitants, to be originally of the same stock, having the same, or near the same language, religion, and customs, were readily admitted and blended with them. The Rhodians, who came thither by sea, landed at the foot of the Pyrenean mountains, and built there a city, to which they gave their name. It was a bishop's see till the time of the Goths, but is now reduced to a heap of ruins. About ten years after, happened that great fire, which spread itself all over that vast ridge of mountains called the Pyrenees, and, from thence, Incendium Pyreneum, or, as others will have it, more properly, that those mountains were thence called Pyrenean. This fire, we are told, was at first kindled by some shepherds, and burnt with such fierceness for many days, that it spread itself almost over that whole ridge. As for what they add, that the intenseness of the heat melted the silver in the mines, and made it boil up, and run down in rivulets along those hills, it is justly looked upon as fabulous by Posidonius, and by Strabo after him.

It must be owned, however, that Spain must have yielded extraordinary quantities of that metal, if what we read in Aristotle be not greatly exaggerated, that the Phœnicians, who are supposed to have come thither about the 1500th year of the flood, exchanged their naval commodities for such an immense weight of it, that their ships could neither contain, nor sustain its load, though they used it for

Tuda. Some other places and colonies these, and a few more, gave name to; as Astur to Asturias, Ulysses to Ulyssipona, now Lisbon, where he built also a temple to Pallas. Strabo (20) calls this city Ulixispolis, or city of Ulysses. Mnestheus built and peopled the port, that bore his name, on the coasts of Andalusia, near the city of Gades, or Calix; in which last, the Andalusians say, was a stately temple, built by the same warrior, which became in time famous, and much resorted to, for its oracle, from all the three parts of the world.

ballast, and made their anchors, and other iron implements, of silver ^c (L). These ^a are supposed to have likewise settled in Spain, and to have built several other cities, especially in Bætica, and to have had the mastery of the sea the space of forty-one years, after which they went and settled in the Balearic islands.

Other nations that governed
in Spain.

BESIDES the Tyrians, Egyptians, and Phœnicians, already mentioned, who obtained footing and dominion in this country, Eusebius mentions ^d several other nations, who did the same before the coming in of the Carthaginians, such as the Egyptians a second time, who held the dominion of the sea thirty-five years, and built some cities, especially Tarracona, which they so called from Tarraco their leader. The Milesians are likewise affirmed, by the same author, to have held some government there the space of twenty-nine years. Next, the Carians, forty-eight years, from whom Pto- lemy affirms the Caristi in Spain to be descended. The Lesbians succeeded them, ^b who built several cities, and governed, according to the same Eusebius, sixty-eight years. Then the Phocians, in the sixteenth year of Tarquinius Priscus, and held the government forty-eight years; and from thence went and settled on the south part of Gaul, and built the city of Marseilles, of which we shall have occasion to speak In the next chapter. Lastly, Nebuchadnezzar, after the destruction of Jerusalem, and conquest of Judæa, is affirmed by Josephus and Strabo to have reigned nine years in Spain^e, at the end of which it is said that he abandoned it to the Cartha- ginians; though it is likely, that, as the Spanish writers affirm, a great part of that vast host, which he had brought with him, settled there, and built cities and castles, which they called by their own, or some Chaldee names, by which they may be still traced up to their original ^f; but upon the whole it seems probable, that most, if not all, of these nations, contented themselves with maritime parts, for the sake of commerce, and the command of the sea, and penetrated but a little way into the inlands, whilst these might enjoy their own laws and government, and be glad to trade and barter with them, and so be less solicitous who were masters of the sea-coasts, and parts adjacent, so they could but enjoy the benefit of their commerce, and the produce of their own lands, in peace and quietness. If any of these strangers were enticed, by the pleasantness and fruitfulness of the country, to settle amongst the ancient inhabitants, whether this was done by permission and consent, ^d or by force of arms, yet it could not be long before they became so blended with each other, that nothing remained of their origin, but the names they gave to those places, which they either built, or lived in. As for the Celtiberi, mentioned a little higher, they increased so fast in that pleasant and healthy country, that they were forced to have recourse to their old method of sending colonies abroad. Some of them settled in Lusitania, where they founded several cities, and called them by Celtic names (M); and from these colonies the Lusitanians had that of Celtiberi given to them: hence Diodorus Siculus says, that of all the Celtiberians the Lusitanian were the stoutest ^g. Another colony of them went into Lætica, where they likewise left several cities, and other monuments of their settlement. The goodness of the climate, however, joined to their laborious exercises, and plain way of living, which made them so stout and long-lived, may be justly esteemed one of the main causes of their multiplying so fast, and being obliged to send abroad such frequent colonies, a further proof of which we have in the long reigns of some of their monarchs formerly mentioned; and we shall close this section with one more, in the person of the famed Arganthonius king of the Tartessii, who is said to have reigned at Gades, SECT. IV.

Of the conquest of Spain by the Carthaginians and Romans, to the coming in of the Goths, and other northern nations.

- b THIS remainder of the Spanish history we give here in a separate section, not as designing to treat of it in that ample manner that it would deserve, were it detached from the body of this work, for that were a deviation from our original plan, and on the one hand draw us into superfluous repetitions, their conquest by the Carthaginians and Romans having been fully treated of in the history of those two nations; and, on the other, oblige us to anticipate those of the Gauls, Goths, Vandals, &c. who conquered, or settled in, any part of this country, and which will, therefore, more properly belong to their several histories in the subsequent chapters. Our motives, therefore, for separating this part from that which we gave in the last section, are, first, to distinguish the true from the fabulous, or
- c the certain from the uncertain: of this latter kind; at least, we look upon to be all that has been said in the last section, though, for the reasons mentioned at the beginning of it, we are forced to insert it in such a work as this; and, secondly, because in the remaining part of this volume, still to be spoken of, we shall proceed in a more succinct method, to avoid all such needless repetitions, or anticipations, and content ourselves with giving our readers a kind of chronological summary of those conquests, and refer our readers for those, which have already been spoken of in this work, to the volumes and pages, where they are to be seen at full length; and, for the rest, to the remaining chapters of this volume, where they will be more amply related.

- d THEIR conquest by the Carthaginians was, if we may believe Justin and Orosius, occasioned by the Tyrians. These, having founded the city of Gades, and built a temple to Hercules, were so infested by the jealous Spaniards, that they were forced to send to Carthage for help; which being readily granted, Meseus was sent with a fleet to their assistance, who suppressed their enemies, and enlarged their territories, by the reduction of several considerable places along that coast^m. The richness of the country soon invited them to pursue their conquests, and the vast treasures, both in gold and silver, with which that country then abounded, could not but be a strong temptation to themⁿ, as they were engaged in such a bloody and expensive war with the Romans. This was accordingly performed with great suc-
- e cess, at first, by their great general Hamilcar Barca, and afterwards by his sons Asdrubal and Hannibal, the latter of whom he took with him thither, when but nine years old, that he might inspire him with greater hatred against the Romans, and with a more eager desire to complete the reduction of this opulent country, to the subjection of Carthage. The success which these generals met with, both against the Spaniards, and against the Romans, whom they had courted to their assistance^o, has been so fully spoken of both in the Roman history^p, and in that of the

Carthaginians^a, that we shall need only to refer our readers to those places here ^a cited in the margin. Asdrubal likewise, another of their generals, who was left there to command during Hamilcar's return to Carthage, was no less successful there, and obliged the Romans to come to a treaty with him, of which the reader will find an account in a former volume^r, and which he inviolately kept with them whilst he lived; but his death, which happened soon after^t, and his being succeeded by young Hannibal, put an end to it: and that enterprising hero, tho' then but twenty-six years of age, began the war afresh, and laid siege to the famed city of Saguntum. We have given already a full account of that siege, and the sad catastrophe of its brave inhabitants, and shall refer our readers to it^l. But Hannibal having undertaken his fatal expedition into Italy^u, the Carthaginian affairs began ^b to decline apace, and their forces to receive many consecutive overthrows here, both by sea and land^v, especially under Asdrubal the son of Gisco, who, being defeated by Scipio, was forced to retire to Gades^x; where, being again defeated at sea, and, to complete his misfortunes, betrayed by Masinissa, he was reduced to such a desperate state, that, in revenge, he committed such horrid cruelties, as rendered him and his nation odious to the Spaniards and Romans^y. All this while the two Scipios not only gained ground against them by these frequent defeats, but by some signal instances of their politeness rendered themselves amiable to the Spaniards, as his enemies were become hateful to them^z. At length two decisive battles, which he won over them, were attended with the retaking of Saguntum, which had been ^c rebuilt by Hannibal. Here he caused the Turdetani, who were found there, to be all sold for slaves, for having joined Hannibal against that faithful city^a. We shall not repeat here the circumstances of the death of those two generals; which was like to have quite altered the posture of affairs, had not the brave Marcus recovered that great loss by a bold and desperate act, and with the few troops, which he could gather up, after the loss of those two battles, surprised and burnt the Carthaginian camp, which occasioned, in the confusion that then reigned, the deaths of thirty-seven thousand of them, besides near two thousand more, who were taken prisoners by him^b. He was succeeded by young Scipio, who, though at that time but twenty-four years of age, had been unanimously chosen proconsul of Spain, ^d and came thither with a reinforcement of ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse. His wonderful success there, the immense spoil he got at the taking of New Carthage, his singular behaviour and continence towards a beautiful female captive, and his generous refusal of the vast ransom, which her parents offered to him, gained him the affections of the Spaniards to such a degree, that they looked upon him as a demigod, and began every-where to revolt from the Carthaginians^c. Their generals made several vain efforts to stop the progress of this young hero, and were as often defeated by him^d; as were also Mandonius and Indibilis, who had revolted from him^e: at length, having thus far reduced the Carthaginians, he resolved on a descent into Africa, to oblige them to abandon Spain. The success of this expedition being foreign to this Spanish history, except that he actually forced them out of this country, and brought it under the Roman yoke, we shall refer our readers to those places, where a full account is given of both^f.

Strip of its mines and treasures.

THE Romans being thus become masters of this rich and noble country, or at least of a considerable part of it, by the expulsion of the Carthaginians, one of their first cares was, to seize on all its valuable mines, especially those of silver and gold^g, and to strip it of its immense wealth; and how considerable this was, may be guessed by the sketch we shall give in the next note (A), of the prodigious quantities which their

(A) Thus we are told (1), that Scipio above-mentioned, upon his return to Rome, carried with him fourteen thousand three hundred and forty-two pounds of silver, besides an immense quantity of coin,

(1) Livy, decad. 4. lib. i. ii. & iii.

a their prætors, even by the confession of their own authors, carried out of it, and brought into the public, as well as into their own treasury : but as it would be impossible to enter into a detail of all those transactions that happened during their Roman bondage, without repeating all that has been said in their history, in the foregoing volumes, we must in this, as well as in the subsequent chapters, refer our readers to what has been already said there ; and only add here one or two remarkable events, which have not yet been taken notice of, or but lightly touched upon. One of them is the grand embassy, which the Celtes and Spaniards sent out of this country to Alexander the Great, to congratulate him upon his vast successes, to beg his amity, and that he would send proper persons to adjust some differences that were amongst them, that is, in all likelihood, between some of their petty kings. This embassy, it seems, was highly pleasing to that conqueror, who heard of those nations for the first time, and, having granted their request, sent them very honourably home. Orosius tells us, that the head of this embassy was called Maurinus.¹

Embassy to Alexander.

THE next is that noble push which was made by the Celtiberians in Lusitania, to suppress the Roman tyranny, and, if possible, to drive them further, if not quite out of Spain. What their success might have been, had not their leader Virgatus, whom Florus calls a shepherd, and Orosius a banditto, been dispatched by the treachery of Servilius Cæpio, who hired that general's guards to assassinate him, may be easily guessed by the dispatch he had made in crossing the Durius, Iberus, and Tagus, seizing on Gallicia, and some other provinces, and putting all the Roman colonies to fire and sword ; but his untimely death put an end to all farther opposition, it being found then so dangerous to head an army against so powerful and treacherous a nation as the Romans shewed themselves on this occasion². How those two brave brothers, Mandonius and Indibilis, tared, for daring to oppose them some time after, need not be here repeated³, any more than the dreadful catastrophe of *Numantia*⁴, *Saguntum*⁵, and some other cities and people, for daring to defend their country against them. By these cruel and treacherous means these Roman invaders so far suppressed that noble love of liberty, for which this nation was justly famed, that very few attempts were afterwards made for regaining it ; and those did prove so unsuccessful, or, to speak more properly, were so severely punished, that it quite deterred them from even betraying the least hope or desire after their ancient freedom, till at length they were quite forced to submit to all their coin, cloaths, corn, arms, and other valuable things. L. Lentulus is said to have brought away a still much larger treasure, viz. forty-four thousand pounds of silver, and two thousand five hundred and fifty of gold, besides the money which he divided among his soldiery. L. Manlius brought with him twelve hundred pounds of silver, and about thirty of gold. Corn. Lentulus, after having governed the hither Spain two years, brought away one thousand five hundred and fifteen pounds of gold ; and of silver two thousand, besides thirty-four thousand five hundred and fifty denarii in ready coin ; whilst his colleague brought from further Spain fifty thousand pounds of silver.

What is still more surprising, is, that these immense sums, amounting in all to one hundred and eleven thousand five hundred and forty-two pounds weight of silver, four thousand and ninety-five of gold, besides coin, and other things of value, were brought away within the short space of nine years ; for just so much time elapsed between the first and the last of these Roman prætors (1) ; and just after they had been as severely fleeced, in all likelihood, by their other friends the Carthaginians. These few instances shall suffice to shew, how rich this country must then have been, and what an immense treasure it yielded to their conquerors ; for though these last never slackened their hands, but kept still on bringing fresh supplies from thence, yet we do not find, that it was at all exhausted. On the contrary, it was this prodigious richness of the country that invited the northern nations many centuries after to come and seize upon, and drive the Romans out of it, as we shall see in some subsequent chapters.

We are, indeed, told by Strabo, that when the Carthaginians first came thither, they found silver in such amazing plenty, that their utensils, and even managers, were made of it (2) ; inasmuch that Poſidonius said of this country, that Pluto, the god of riches, had his residence in the bowels of it (3). And Pliny mentions several rich mines of silver dug there by the Carthaginians, one of which, called Bebel, from the finder of it, yielded Hannibal three hundred pounds of silver per day (4). In a word, most ancient authors have celebrated this country for its richness to such a degree, that it hath only exposed it the more to the invasion of foreigners far and near.

laws, customs, and religion; and, in a word, to be wholly romanized after their own arbitrary will. However, it is plain, that further Spain was not quite subdued till the fourth consulate of Marius, A. U. 652. nor the Celliberians till five years after, two years after Dolabella had triumphed over the Lusitanians°. The rest is said to have been conquered by Augustus, as we have formerly hinted.

We shall conclude this chapter with a list of the Spanish prætors, as far as Livy has gone with them, and afterwards of the emperors, under whose government Spain continued from Augustus to Honorius, in the beginning of whose reign the Romans were driven out of it by the northern nations, whose history will follow in due time; by which means the reader will easily come at the remainder of the Spanish bondage under both, without our being forced to repeat what has been already said in the Roman history, or anticipating upon what more properly belongs to those of the Goths, Vandals, &c. hereafter; but as we shall but barely mention those Spanish prætors and emperors, without entering into any further particulars of their reigns, we shall give the list of them in the following note (B), and so pass over to the Gauls. But, before we leave Spain, we beg leave to add, that tho' the Romans carried off such immense quantities of gold and silver out of it, as was hinted in the last note, they still left enough behind in it to maintain their numerous armies and colonies, to build great cities, castles, forts, and particularly schools, and academies, for all kind of learning and exercises; to which we may add many other stately edifices, which were there reared by their prætors, consuls, and especially by their emperors; all which served either to allure the Spaniards to the Roman yoke, or to deter them from shaking it off.

The antient state of the Gauls, to their conquest by Julius Cæsar, and from thence to the irruption of the Franks.

S E C T. I.

The origin of the Gauls, and extent of their country.

^a THE Gauls were certainly descended from the Celtes or Gomerians, as has been fully shewn in some former volumes^a, or, to speak more properly, were the same people, under a different and more modern name, given them, in all probability, by some of their neighbours, whilst they still retained their primitive one of Gomerai, or descendants of Gomer, as those still do, who retain their antient language in its purity, especially the northern Welsh. Other names they were known by, such as they either seem to have assumed upon some particular occasions, or such as other nations thought fit to give them; of all which the reader may see a specimen in the following note (A). The name therefore of Gaul, Galli, and Gallia, is not only a foreign one, but of a recenter date, as are likewise those other appellatives, by which ^b Julius Cæsar^b, and other antient authors, distinguish one part of their country from another. Such are those, for instance, of Cisalpine or Citerior, Transalpine or Uterior, and Subalpine, which was situate at the foot of the Alps^c. The inhabitants however were formerly better known by the name of Celtes^d, and the country, in the whole, by that of Celto Gallia^e, of which name we have given, in a former volume^f, the best etymon we could find. Cæsar afterwards distinguished the whole country under the three following names, viz. Belgia, Aquitania, and Gallia Propria, or that which, according to him, was chiefly inhabited by the Celtes or Gauls (B). This last was further

(A) Of the first kind we may reasonably reckon all those, which are of Celtic extraction; such as those of Celte and Gaul, which signify brave and warlike, Armoric, maritim, and the like. Even that of Belga, which signifies fierce and quarrelsome, might have been given to that canton by their brethren and neighbours, on account of their retaining their original fierceness, from which the rest had polished themselves by their commerce and intercourse with other nations; those of Cis, Trans, and Subalpine, from their situation on either side of the Alps; that of Celto-Scythians from their being neighbours to, and intermixed with, that nation; that of Celtiberians to those that were seated on the other side the Pyrenees.

As they spread themselves, by degrees, farther and wider from each other, and their original tongue split itself into a great number of dialects, their appellatives became so numerous, and so vastly different from it, that it is with great difficulty they can be traced to their fountain-head. We shal' therefore venture no farther, than upon such ones as carry a kind of certainty of their extract, and refer such of our readers, who are curious of such etymons, to the authors quoted in the margin (1). He may likewise read that vast variety of names in Strabo, Pro- temy, Mela, Cæsar's commentaries, Diodorus Siculus; and other antient authors.

(B) His words are these (1): "The whole country of Gaul is divided into three parts, the first of which is inhabited by the Belge, the second by the Aquians, and the third by those whom we call Gauls, but, in their own tongue, are called Celtes. All these have their language, manners, and customs different." The meaning of which words is generally taken to be, that he speaks here of those parts, which remained as yet unconquered by the Romans, and which retained still their antient language and customs; whereas those which were already subdued, had altered both by that time, to such a degree, as to appear to him different from the rest; such was, for instance, that part, which was called Togata, from their having taken up the Roman dress, and, in all likelihood, several other of their customs, and, by their intercourse with them, might have very much altered their dialect from the rest.

One thing is very remarkable, that Cæsar makes this province, which he likewise calls Cisalpine, to begin at the foot of the Alps, and to have extended itself along the Po, as far as the Adriatic sea, and further distinguished into Comata, whose inhabitants wore long hair; Brachata, from a their wearing breeches; and Togata, from the Roman toga being worn there. We shall endeavour to settle the limits of each of these in the following paragraph, and refer our readers, for the other names by which it was occasionally distinguished; such as that of Armorica, from its lying along the sea-coasts; of Aquitania, from its abundance of water; Cis and Transpadana, and some others; to the account given of them at the entrance of the Roman history above quoted. All that needs be added here is, that the words Celte and Gaul, signifying, in the antient language, brave and warlike, that of Belga, fierce or quarrelsome, that of Armoric, maritime; these names were, in all probability, given them by other nations. As for those of Cimmerians, Cimbrians, Cumbrians, and the like, they are plainly a corruption of their original one of Gomerians or Gomerai, as those of Galatians and Cello-Galatians were of Cello-Gaul. b

As for the Galatia or Cello-Græcia of Asia Minor, in which these European Gauls were settled by Nicomedes, who had called them thither to his assistance, we shall, as much as we can, refer our readers to what has been said of them in some preceding volumes, to avoid unnecessary repetitions. All that need be added here is, that this province had Cappadocia on the east; Bithynia on the west; Pamphylia on the south; and the Euxine on the north. Here St. Paul founded a church, to which he directed that epistle, which is still known by the name of the epistle to the Galatians, and was written to reduce them from those Jewish observances, to which some false teachers of the circumcision had debauched them, and to confirm them in the true gospel liberty, which had been preached to them. We know little else of these Galatians, besides what has been said in the two volumes last quoted, except that we read in the second book of the Maccabees of a signal overthrow, which the Jews gave them in the province of Babylon, where these, with a small army of eight thousand men, defeated and killed an hundred and twenty thousand of the former. The text says nothing further concerning this signal victory, nor about the time in which it happened; so that we are left in the dark, whether it speaks there of the Galatians settled in the province we are speaking of, or, which is more probable, of the Gauls themselves, who had by this time, if not long before, spread themselves all over Asia; for it must be observed here, that the name of Galatai was indifferently given, especially by Greek authors, to the one and to the other. But to return to the antient Gaul: c

We have already shewn in the history of the antient Celtes, that they were possessed of the greatest part of Europe. There is scarce a province, or even a corner of it, in which they have not left some evident monument of themselves, either in the names of cities and towns, cantons and provinces, or of their rivers, lakes, mountains, promontories, and such-like. In every part of it, where either the Phœnicians, Carthaginians, or Romans, sent their invading bands, there they are affirmed by antient writers to have found the Celtes or Gauls already settled*: not that they do expressly mention them by those two names, for we have just observed on what account they had several other appellatives given them, but yet such as plainly appear, from the conformity of their language, religion, customs, &c. to have meant one and the same nation. However, we will not venture to say, that they were all of the same Celtic extract, that inhabited those parts of Europe, either towards the sea-side, such as Spain, Portugal, and the French coasts, along the Mediterranean, or towards the north-east, where they seem to have been so blended with the Scythians and Sarmatians, that it is next to impossible to assert their boundaries on that side. All that we pretend to conclude from those antient writers, who have written most clearly and knowingly on this head, is, that the Celtes or Gauls plainly appear to have been f

the Rubicon (3); whereas Strabo, who quotes his commentaries (4), and Diodorus Siculus (5), plainly intimate, that the Gauls or Celtes inhabited all those parts from the Alps to the Pyrenees; and we shall shew by-and-by, that they extended even beyond the latter, and possessed the greatest part of Spain and Portugal.

However, the most that can be inferred from the passage quoted out of Cæsar, is, that he found Gaul so divided at his coming thither; and that, by this time, their language, manners, &c. were grown very different, though originally one and the same, as they were originally one and the same people.

- a the first, that peopled and possessed themselves of, or claimed a dominion over them. After the general dispersion, that followed the flood, other nations might probably come afterwards, some by sea, others by land, and have been permitted to settle amongst them, there being more want of inhabitants than of room in those early days, and in regions so remote from the place of their first migrations, as we have formerly hinted at the beginning of this universal history, and elsewhere ¹.

- THE greatest difficulty, as we hinted in the last chapter, is to prove the Gauls, ^{Gauls in Spain and Portugal.} or Celtes rather, to have been settled in Spain and Portugal before any other nation; first, because they were here called by the name of Iberians, or, at most, Celtiberians, from which some are apt to conclude the former to have been the name of the first inhabitants of that part, and the latter to have been given to the Celtes, who came over the Pyrenees, and settled amongst them. And, secondly, because Varro ^m mentions no less than five different nations, that were found there, when the Romans first invaded that country. These were, according to him, the Iberians, Persians (C), Phœnicians, Celtes, and Carthaginians (D). As to the first, we have formerly shewn, that the word Iberian signified, in the antient Celtic, any people, country, or place, that was situate over, or on the other side of, a sea, river, ridge of mountains, and the like ⁿ; so that these might be naturally called Iberians, on account of their situation over the Pyrenees, by those that lived on this side; and Celtiberians, to distinguish them from those nations they were blended and intermixed with there. As to what is objected out of Varro, we have had occasion to hint, in the history of antient Spain, that neither the Tyrian or Phœnician colonies, nor those of the Carthaginians, came thither till a long time after the Celtes or Gauls had been settled there, and peopled a great part of that country. All this seems self-evident, first, from the consentient testimony of antient authors, the greatest part of whom expressly affirm it ^o, and make these inhabitants to be of the same extract with those, that filled the hither parts of Europe, to all whom they give the same common name of Celtes and Gauls, and sometimes the more antient one of Cymmerians and Cymbrians ^p. And, secondly, from those traces and monuments they have left in almost every canton and province of that country; such as the names of seas, rivers, mountains, cities, and the like, all ^d which are manifestly of Celtic extraction.

Italy cannot be supposed to have been long unpossessed by them, if they were not ^{In Italy,} the first peoplers of it, concerning which we shall refer our readers to what has been said on that head in some former volumes ^q. It was indeed too fair a spot not to invite such a warlike and populous nation thither, had it been ever so well peopled beforehand; but, we think, we have made it at least very probable, that they came thither sooner than any other; for if the Humbri or Umbri really were, as they are affirmed by many authors to have been ^r, the aborigines or antientest people of Italy, and they were descended from the Celtes (E), as their name, and other concurring cir-

(C) As it doth not appear from any antient author, that the Persians sent any colonies into this country, it is somewhat difficult to guess, who these were, whom our author mentions with the other four. If we may be permitted to offer our conjecture, the name being of Celtic extract, and signifying severed or divided, it is not unreasonable to suppose, that it was given to some tribe or canton of this nation, on account of their rupture or difference from the rest, either in their customs, laws, and such-like, or for retaining their old ones, whilst these had altered theirs, in complaisance to the other nations they were intermixed with.

(D) We are not without some collateral proofs of this. The Phœnicians, as distinct from the Carthaginians, were the antient Tyrians (6); and these are known to have sent a colony, and to have built a famous temple to Hercules, in the isle of Gades, and to have founded several considerable cities in Spain (7). And as to the Carthaginians, who were nearest neighbours to it, we have seen likewise, in a former volume, how early they invaded and settled in it (8).

(E) Pliny derives their name from the Greek ὄμβρος, which signifies a shower; because they had been dislodged from their country by a flood, occasioned by violent showers (9). But this etymon is far-fetched and forced, unless we will admit, that it carried the memory of their escaping the universal deluge with it; in which case it must be supposed, that they came early into those parts, and set up some monuments of their deliverance there. But as to the name of Umbrians or Humbrians, it seems rather a softening of the original one of Gomerians or Cymbrians.

circumstances, seem plainly to intimate^a, then it will scarcely be doubted, that they must have entered and peopled that country very early, when we recollect what dreadful devastations the Hetrurians made among them, and how many hundreds of their towns and cities they destroyed in that invasion, which they made upon them, and for the further particulars of which, we refer our readers to a former volume^c.

WE shall shortly come to speak of the Germans, and other northern nations, as well as of the isles of Great Britain, Ireland, Ice-land, and others less considerable, all which do plainly appear to have been first discovered and peopled by the Gauls or Celtes. As for the Germans, they were so like the Celtes in their language, religion, and customs, except, as Strabo observes^b, their retaining some of their original fierceness, which was doubtless owing to their vicinity and intermixture with the Scythians and Sarmatians, that they seem to have been one and the same nation; and this our author thinks to be the occasion of their being called Germans (F). We shall find a much properer etymon for that name in the sequel. What made us mention it here, was as a proof, that Germany was part of the Celtic or Gaulish territories, at least as far as the Rhine^w, if not as far as the Danube^x, though, as we have already observed, all that inhabited the countries between these two great rivers, were very much intermixed with the Scythians, Sarmatians, and other northern (G) nations. All that needs be added here is, that the Helveti, Rætii, Norici, and Pannonians, of whom we have given an account in a former volume^y, are sometimes called Celtes, and sometimes Gauls, indifferently; and that their troops were still distinguished by the name of Celtic and Gaulish legions in Aurelian's time^z, as were also those that lived along the foot of, or upon, the Alps themselves.

UPON the whole then it appears evidently, that the antient Gauls or Celtes were possessed of the far greatest part of Europe; that the Mediterranean on the south, the Atlantic ocean on the west, the British and northern on the north-west, were the boundaries of their country; and that they extended towards the north as far as Scandinavia, Polonia, and Muscovy; though these three nations, as well as those that lived betwixt the Rhine and Danube, were intermixed with a multitude of other people, of the greatest part of whom we know but little, except their names. And thus much may suffice for the extent and limits of antient Gaul. How they came afterwards to be reduced within that narrow compass, in which we find them when the Romans first invaded them, may be easily gathered from what has been already said in the Roman history, and will further appear in the sequel of this.

How they came first into Europe.

IN the mean time it will not be improper, before we come to fix them according to that epocha, to inquire, how this antient nation came at first to spread itself, as we have shewn they did, all over Europe; that is, whether they advanced by gradual steps from the place of their first dispersion, which we formerly fixed in Phrygia^a; or whether they came thither by sea, and, landing at first on some of the Italic or Mediterranean shores, dilated themselves from thence as far and wide as we find they did. Either hypothesis has its difficulties. If that of Berosus and his followers could be credited, that Gomer's sons settled themselves in several parts of Spain and Italy so early as an hundred and forty-two years after the flood, the gradual migrations will hardly be thought quick enough to have extended themselves to such vast tracts of ground in so short a time; and it will be more natural to suppose, that they sailed thither from Lesser Asia. But then it will be equally difficult to imagine, how they could, in the short space of an hundred and forty-two years, become such expert mariners, as this supposes them to have been; and, if we allow them a longer space for making themselves so far masters of navigation, they may be as reasonably

(F) The word Germanus was that by which the Romans distinguished brothers by the same father and mother from those which were only by the one or the other, whom they termed uterini or consanguinei. And though the etymon itself be certainly false with respect to the Germans, yet it shews the great affinity, which that author observed between them and the Gauls.

(G) Such were the Saxons, Franks, Sicambri, Burgundi, Quadi, Goths, Huns, Rastarna, the Ræti, Norici, Pannonians, Mærians, Thracians, and many more, whose names and situation the reader will find in the several maps at the head of this history; and for the description and particulars of which we refer him to the general index at the end of this volume.

a thought to have expanded themselves thus far by such gradual migrations, as either want of room, curiosity, or desire of change, may be supposed to have led them to. That they began betimes to navigate, or to coast at least, not only the Mediterranean, Atlantic, and other seas, but even on the main ocean, we shall presently have occasion to shew, when we come to speak of their arts, commerce, &c. But it is scarcely to be believed, all things considered, that their rude skill in this art could bring them thither so soon as the others could get thither by land. However, since some ancient authors have affirmed, that the first inhabitants of Spain came thither by sea, some say from Asia, and others from Africa, the most reasonable opinion seems to be that, which allows these to have indeed come thither from those parts, b and to have settled in those countries, though not till some considerable time after they had been discovered and peopled by those, who came thither by land, and by gradual migrations. And this will further account, both for that great variety of names, dialects and customs, which such an intermixture must, of necessity, be supposed to produce, and for the loss of that whole country in process of time, when the Gauls were partly driven out of it, and the rest subdued by their conquerors, as we have seen in the last chapter. The boundaries of Gaul fireightened.

THE same fate having attended them, not only in Italy, but likewise on this side of the Alps, where the provinces of Noricum, Helvetia, Rætia, and that whole tract, which lies between those mountains and the lake of Geneva, were taken from them, c as we have seen in the Roman history ^b, the whole Gaulish extent came then to reach no farther than from that lake to the Pyrenees, having still the Mediterranean on the south, the Rhine on the north, and the British chanel on the west; for, by this time, the British and other islands were detached from the inlands, and lived under princes of their own, though, in matters of religion, they still kept a kind of conformity with, if not rather a kind of jurisdiction over them, as we shall see under the next article. This was the state of Gaul, and these its limits, when Julius Caesar first came into it, as we have seen in a former volume, where we likewise took notice of several other changes, which were made in their boundaries, and new divisions of their provinces and districts by the conquering Romans, particularly by Augustus, and d to which we beg leave to refer our readers, to avoid repetitions and prolixity ^c.

FOR the same reason we think it superfluous to say any thing here of its natural or artificial rarities, or to spend any longer time in describing a country so near, and so well known to us. We have described its ancient state in a former volume ^d, and there given an account of its most considerable rivers, lakes, mountains, &c. We have there likewise taken notice of the fertility of the country, and how early it had begun to be cultivated and improved, even as far back as the times of Mercury, who is affirmed by a learned modern, and not without some substantial proofs, to have reigned in Gaul, when it was in its full extent, and, by his wholesome laws, and indefatigable pains to promote its trade and commerce into foreign countries, to e have raised the Gaulish nation to a surprising height of power and glory ^e. This reign hath indeed been very much suspected by some other authors, who have written since ^f, as fabulous and imaginary; but we do not think it as yet confuted by any thing that has been offered either against it, or in favour of the Ctesian history, which, we hope, we have, notwithstanding all its many and learned advocates, sufficiently confuted in our Affyrian history ^g. But, waving that intricate and controverted point, it is generally allowed, that this country was in as flourishing a condition, when the Romans first invaded it, as any in Europe, and their lands, commerce, arts, &c. cultivated and improved by its industrious inhabitants, in a manner altogether answerable to its excellent situation and climate (H), as we shall have further occasion to shew f in the sequel. Its fertility, &c.

(H) The ancient Celtes indeed, and those Gauls, who were intermixed with the Scythians, did still observe their old custom of living in tents and wag-gons, or at most in huts, built just to last them one year, after which they removed into fresh quarters; and as they lived chiefly on the fruits of the earth, and the milk of their cattle, they either wholly neglected agriculture, and all property in lands, or, at most, built themselves a little house or cottage big enough for their family, in the midst of as much ground, as they thought fit to cultivate for that year. The Germani and Suevi are observed

HOWEVER, it must be observed here, that these improvements were of much a later date than their first settlements; and that, if we except Spain, Italy, and the southern parts of France, the rest of their territories were too cold and discouraging to a nation that chiefly delighted in war, hunting, and such-like exercises, and at a time when agriculture was, as it were, in its infancy; and it is most probable, that the fruitfulness of the warmer climates first put the northern inhabitants upon endeavouring to supply by art the defects of their soil and climate; for even in the times of the Roman emperors, we do not find, that they had either vines, olives, or any other fruit or grain, except corn^a; and most authors, who have written on this subject, seem to attribute it wholly to the extreme cold to which they were exposed. It is indeed very likely, that those authors, being used to warmer climates, have somewhat exaggerated the coldness of these, which experience shews are nothing so severe as they have represented themⁱ; but it is, at the same time, far from improbable, that they are become much warmer than they were in those antient times, partly by destroying a vast number of forests, which stagnated the air, and intercepted the warmth of the sun; by the draining many standing waters, and marshy grounds; by cherishing it with warm manure, and other such improvements, which are obvious to every naturalist. The Romans themselves seem to have been sensible of this change, though they attributed it to some favourable alteration in the position of the earth, pretended to have been even foretold by that famous Greek astronomer Hipparchus^k. But however that be, it is plain, that these countries are so far from being so constantly covered with ice and snow, and their great rivers from being always so hard frozen, as to serve them, instead of bridges, for crossing whole armies over them in their winter excursions, that we look upon it now as a kind of wonder, whenever any of them chance to be frozen at any such rate.

by Julius Caesar to have followed the same custom in his days; who adds, that it was one of the chief tasks of their yearly magistrates to assign them such lands, according to the exigence of their families; and, as soon as the year was over, they removed into some other country (10).

Hence came the name and use of cantons: every tribe had a canton assigned to it, which was governed by its own magistrates, who were chosen from among them. This custom, being derived from the antient Celtes, had, it plainly appears, spread itself all over Europe, and beyond (11). The Romans called those cantons pagi, which took up more or less ground, according to the largeness of the tribe; and, as soon as it was parcelled out among their families, each of them built a cot in the centre of his own ground; so that there were not any two to be seen contiguous to one another (12).

Even when they came to live in cities, as the Gauls did as soon as any others in Europe, if we except perhaps Italy and Spain, they neither walled nor fortified them, alleging, that such strong places served only to abate of the courage and fierceness of its inhabitants, and often proved the occasion of their being brought into slavery (13). Whenever therefore they found themselves invaded, they all marched out under their leaders, and engaged the enemy in open field, or, if they found themselves unequal to the fight, they retired into either woods, marshes, or other places of difficult access, as we shall see in the sequel.

The religion of the Gauls.

Their religion derived from the antient Celtes.

WE have already given an account of the religion of the antient Celtes in a former volume^a; and as the Gauls were descended from them, as we have shewn under the last article, it is not to be doubted but it was continued and propagated amongst them, in the same manner and form as they received it from them, till their intercourse with other nations, or perhaps rather their subjection to them, gave birth to those changes and intermixtures, which it afterwards underwent. To come therefore at a tolerable notion of true Gaulish religion, we should seek it amongst those Gauls, who were least conversant with other people, and had least a occasion or necessity of receiving or adopting any thing from them ; instead of having recourse to that of the Greeks and Romans, from whom whatever they might, in process of time, borrow, that might cause a kind of resemblance between them, yet originally they differed as much, not only in this, but in almost all other respects; as black from white. Much worse have they succeeded in this point, who have transformed the Gaulish deities into Greek and Roman ones, and spent a deal of time and pains to no purpose, to prove them to have been such^b ; whereas we hope, in the sequel, to give our readers indubitable arguments of their being of Celtic extraction. For the same reason we must be very wary how we depend too much on those few ancient authors, whether Greeks or Romans, who have occasionally spoken of them (A). These few scraps they have left us of Gaulish religion, sufficiently shew; that they knew little of it ; and that, even in those points in which they do not clash against one another (B), they have betrayed such a fondness and partiality for their own, as if they had looked upon it as the mother, and the other as the offspring of it. Upon which account Josephus makes no scruple to affirm^c, that all that the best of these had written of the Gauls, was without any foundation; and owing to an itch of saying such things of them, as no man had ever said before, or indeed could say. And, in fact, it could hardly be otherwise, considering that the Gauls made it a constant rule never to commit any thing to writing, according to a settled maxim amongst them, that it was more glorious to perform noble deeds, than to speak and write well^d. Besides, had they laid more open to their neighbours than they really did (C), yet could these have received no great intelligence concerning their religion; since their druids or bards made it a main part of their policy to conceal it, at least the most considerable points of it, even from their own laity, as we shall shew in the sequel.

It will appear still more unreasonable to suppose, that the Gauls received any part of their religion from either the Greeks or Romans, if we consider, besides what

(A) The most considerable of these are, Julius Cæsar, Diodorus Siculus, Pomponius Mela, Strabo, and Pliny, and they have written of it in such a loose, and yet concise a manner, that all their fragments put together would hardly amount to three or four pages; and, if these pages were to be reduced to their just value, would lose one half of their bulk (1); whether it be, that these authors have but just copied one another, or only designed to say the same things.

(B) According to those quoted in the last note, both the religion and customs of the Gauls are drawn in such colours, as would incline one to suspect them of innate partiality, or rather hatred, to that brave nation. Diodorus, among the rest, makes no scruple to tell us, that their ferocity was in nothing more remarkable than in their religious rites, in which, says he (2), nothing could be more impious, than the victims, which they offered, nor more inhuman, than the manner in which they offered them. And, if we may believe Procopius (3), it seems as if this barbarous custom had been still in vogue some centuries after their embracing christianity.

A modern writer however has been at the pains to quote other authorities, to disculpate them from a great deal of this pretended inhumanity (4), and to prove, that they were famed for their virtue and morality. It is well, if both sides have not exaggerated in their turns. But, at the worst, the Gauls do not appear to have much outdone those other nations, who cry out so bitterly against them, in these execrable customs of offering human victims to their gods, of murdering some captives in their auguries, and such-like. On the contrary, we have shewed in some former parts of this work (5), that not only the ancient Egyptians, Canaanites, &c. but even the Romans, Carthaginians, and others, made a common practice of them; and thus far their religions bore a resemblance, whichsoever of them were the inventors of these bloody ceremonies, concerning which we have nothing to add to what we have said in the volumes above-quoted.

(C) Josephus (6) tells us accordingly, that their country was, in some measure, inaccessible, because nature had fortified them on all sides with a kind of impenetrable ramparts, such as were the Alps, the Pyrenees, the ocean, and Mediterranean, the Rhine, &c. and with strength and courage to defend their frontiers.

It is no less improbable, that their religion was brought in amongst them, either over any of these then inaccessible mountains, seas, or rivers; because, on the one hand, the nations that antiently inhabited over the Pyrenees, Alps, and on the other side the Rhine, Danube, &c. were, as we have shewn, of the same Celtic extract with the Gauls, and had received the same religion, laws, and customs, with them from their ancestors; so that we must, of course, suppose, that it was settled and practised amongst them some ages before they either thought of making excursions out of their own territories, or others, among whom they had, by their conquests, colonies, and warlike exploits, injected an universal dread, took it into their heads to invade them. On the contrary, it appears from some authors, that even the Romans did not make any attempt on them till about four hundred years after they were known to be sufficiently fixed in their religion, government, and discipline (7).

has been hinted at the end of the last note, that their gods and goddesses, and their very names, plainly appear to be of Celtic extract, and exactly answering some eminent part of their character (D), not as gods and goddesses, but as heroes and heroines, famed for some peculiar excellency, and as such deified, if we may be allowed the expression, by the courtesy of their descendants; whereas the Greeks and Romans did not adopt, much less challenge them for their own, till many ages after, that is, as a learned author seems rightly to suppose^a, not till the former had been ordered by the oracle of Dodona to adopt the deities of the barbarians^f; and the latter made it a standing law not to invade any nations, till they had previously implored the favour of their gods, and promised to build them temples, and establish their worship amongst them.

WHETHER the Gauls, or antient Celtes rather, were the first introducers of these hypotheses, or whether they adopted them in imitation of other antient nations, is a knot too hard for us to untie. However, it is plain they antiently adored a supreme Being under the name of Esfus, which seems only a corruption of the old Celtic word Dheuw, from which the Greeks probably borrowed their Θεός and Ζεύς, and the Romans their Deus. This notion was religiously preserved by their druids; and if they, for worldly ends, or perhaps to please the people, whose impetuous desire after this novelty they could not resist, suffered the worship and images of these gods to be introduced amongst them, yet they never looked upon them as any other than inferior deities, whatever the laity might be indulged to do in process of time; but the worship of the true God was still carefully kept up, and the oak esteemed the symbol of the Deity, as fire was among the Perfes, of whom we have given an account in a former volume^g. To frame therefore a right notion of the religion of this, or any other nation, we must not judge of it by the corruptions introduced into it by a mad populace, and winked at by the priests and philosophers, but as it was believed and professed by those, who had the care of it. And in this case we shall perhaps find the most material difference between that of the Gauls and that of the Greeks and Romans, even in those points in which they seem most to agree, we mean, the worship of the same gods, with respect to the different characters which they gave, and ideas they entertained of them, the latter seeming calculated to sooth the most inordinate passions, and authorize the worst of crimes, and the former rather quite opposite to it; and this is what the modern author last quoted has taken no small pains to shew in two main instances, viz. from the contrary notions which these entertained of their gods, and from the moral doctrines of their druids. It is indeed no hard matter to imagine how the religion and precepts of Noah (and these were free enough from all idolatry, and the superstitious trash, which crept in afterwards among his descendants) should be preserved for a considerable time in the family of Japheth, upon which that patriarch had pronounced and intailed a peculiar blessing^h; but we cannot be so sanguine in favour of those druids, as to believe with that author, that they preserved them so pure among themselves during such a series of ages, as he seems to suppose. If they did, they were guilty of a very shameful remissness and condescension to the laity, in suffering them to run themselves into such vile idolatries, horrid superstition, detestable rites, and corruption of principles and morals, as they must be owned to have done, in spite of all false glosses, that have been used to palliate their degeneracy, or the supposition of their having been too much misrepresented by Greek and Latin authors. We have, on the contrary, shewn in a former volumeⁱ, that the antient Celtes, even in the times of their primitive simplicity of life, and when they were as yet freest from luxury and other corruptions, had yet adopted many inhuman ceremonies into their worship, auguries, &c. Even the Scythians, a younger branch of Japheth's family, who lived still in a much greater simplicity, and were more unmixed, and had less intercourse, with other nations, did yet even exceed the Celtes in the barbarity of their religion and customs^k; and it will evidently appear from what follows, that the Gauls, Germans, and other northern people, did not only copy after, but even outdo them in it; so that tho'

(D) This our reader will be best able to judge of, by turning to the fourth section, under the note (L), to which we refer, to avoid needless repetitions.

- a they must be allowed, for reasons hinted more than once, to have been little known to, and, in great measure, designedly misrepresented by, those authors who have written of them, yet they cannot, without manifest partiality, be disculpated from the charge of having had many bloody and inhuman rites, many absurd and unsocial principles, as well as corruption of morals, in common with other nations, tho' not in the same degree with them. Let therefore the private doctrines of their druids have been what they would, and they be supposed ever so averse and opposite to the general practice of the people, nothing can be said for their countenancing, if not encouraging, those abominable ceremonies, such as their offering up of human victims to their gods by way of expiation, their auguries from the reeking blood and entrails of their captives, and others of the same nature, of which we shall speak in due time.

We think ourselves obliged to be the more particular in our inquiry into the religion of the Gauls, as it is the source and foundation, not only of that of the antient Germans, and other more northern nations, but likewise of that of the antient Britains, who, as we shall see in a subsequent chapter, were descended from, and had received their religion, laws, customs, &c. originally from them; so that what is said on that subject in this chapter, will serve as a clue to that of those other nations we shall have occasion to speak of in the following ones; by which means we shall avoid many needless repetitions, and be able to confine our account of them chiefly to those points, in which they either differed from this their common mother, or in such cases, where there appears a necessity to shew the affinity they bear to each other. As for those of the antient inhabitants of Italy, Spain, &c. who became intermingled with the Gauls, the reader will find the former already done in a former volume¹, and the rest will come in their turn in some of the subsequent chapters. And here we shall, for order-sake, begin with an account of the different deities worshipped by the antient Gauls, and the particular ceremonies and sacrifices used to each of them, not as they were transmitted to them from their Celtic ancestors, concerning which we refer our readers to what has been said in their history, but as they were found in the times of the Romans invading of, and becoming first acquainted with them.

- d We have already hinted, that they antiently worshipped the supreme Deity, under the name of Efus or Hefus (E), and the symbol of the oak; and it will not be thought strange,

The Gaulish religion the mother of all the northern ones.

Efus the supreme Deity.

(E) There have been various conjectures concerning the etymon of this word, besides that which we offered a little higher, and which to us seems the most natural, because the Celtic Dh being pronounced with a kind of preceding aspiration, and not unlike our softer th in such pronouns as thee, thou, &c: foreigners, who were unused to it, could not well express the sound of the word Dhew, but by the letters Efu. As for the final s, it might be superadded by the Greeks and Romans, according to their way of terminating the masculine gender in us and as, as they did likewise in the plural Efi, Aijoi, as they may be seen in Hefychius.

The antient Etruscans, according to Suetonius (8), called the Deity Æsar; for he observes there, that, among the other prodigies which preceded Augustus's death, a flash of lightning having erased the C from the word Cæsar, as it stood engraved on a pedestal that supported his statue, the diviners told him, that the C being a numerical letter signifying an hundred, the omen portended, that he had but so many days to live, after which he would be deified, because Æsar, or the remainder of the word Cæsar, signified God in the Etruscan language. If we might therefore be allowed a far-off conjecture concerning these two names, Efus among the Gauls, and Æsar among the Etruscans, it would be, that they might be both of Hebrew extract; and we have elsewhere shewn, that the old Celtic, with which the Etruscan has a vast affinity, appears visibly to have been a dialect of the Hebrew (9). The word הָעֶזֶר hezus signifies strong and mighty, and is given to God in many places, particularly by the psalmist (10); and עֲזָרָה ezar signifies help or helper (11), and is likewise given to Him, as he is emphatically so, when all other helps fail. The patriarch Abraham, and his descendants, knew him by the name of אל-שֹׁדֵד el-saddai, the mighty or self-sufficient God, till he made his peculiar name Jehovah known unto them (12); and it is remarkable, that the Thracians, a branch of the Celts, did, according to Macrobius, call the god, to whom they had erected a temple on mount Zilmiffus, Sabazius, which is a plain corruption of the Hebrew word Teabaoth, especially considering, that, in their religious rites to Bacchus, they were wont to cry out, Evøke Sab-bai, which is the Elohe, or, if you please, the Jehovah Teabaoth of the Hebrews, as God is emphatically called by the psalmist in the psalm above-quoted, and signifies Lord of hosts, a title that well suited the martial Thracians. As these therefore were rather attributes, than the names of the Godhead, each nation may be supposed to have chosen that which suited their genius best; and the Gauls that of Hefus, as suiting most with their warlike spirit.

That not only the names of the Deity, but this way of worshipping Him under oaks, and in oak groves, was common to all the descendants of Noah, we have undoubted proof out of the old

strange, that this notion of a supreme Being should have been preserved among the a descendants of Japheth, when we find such lively traces of it even among the idolatrous Syrians, Midianites, and even the Canaanites, as in the family of Laban m, of Jethro n, and of the two Abimelechs kings of Gerar in the times of Abraham and Isaac o, and some others we could name, particularly the Gibeonites in Joshua's time p, Adonibezek in the time of the judges q, and Hiram king of Tyre in the reigns of David and Solomon r; who all not only retained the notion of the Deity, notwithstanding their idolatry, but had likewise a peculiar name for it, distinct from those of their other gods. To this let us add, with respect to the Gauls we are now speaking of, that the natural fondness, which they had for the religion and customs of b their forefathers, the contempt they entertained of other nations, the recluse and solitary life of their druids, who were the keepers and teachers of their theology, and their strict and constant practice, founded upon it, of sacrificing, and performing their other religious rites under the oak only, as consecrated to that supreme Being, were most effectual means to preserve that fundamental notion still uppermost among them, whatever other superstitions might be, in process of time, introduced among them; for we must here observe, that they kept constant to this custom, or rather, as seems, law, of performing their religious worship under that tree, or, more properly, in groves of it, even after they had adopted that long regiment of deities, of which we are about to give an account. To this we must add, that, in the midst of those heathenish superstitions, which crept by degrees into their religion, they never erected c any either temples or idols unto this Ejus or supreme Deity; so that he seems to have been acknowledged by them much in the same manner, that the Athenians did the unknown God mentioned by St. Paul s; which notion was far enough from being peculiar to them: others had their unknown God as well as they, and owned themselves his offspring, though their notion and worship of him were very imperfect, and, in many cases, too unworthy of him, as even the Gauls did, when they came to intermingle the Roman theology with their own. However, antiently they seem to have entertained some sublime notions of him, to confirm which we need but add what Tacitus says of the Senones, who were a branch of the Celtes, and had the same religion: They, says that author t, have no other temples but a wood or grove, d where they perform all their religious rites. None is admitted to enter it, unless he carries a chain, in token of his dependence on, and owning the supreme dominion, which God has over him; and, if he chance to fall down, none must dare to help him up; but he must either roll himself, or crawl upon his belly, out of the place. He adds, that their whole religion consists in an acknowledgment, that the deity, which makes its abode there, governs all things; that all things depend on him, and ought to obey him. Strabo says much the same of the Celtiberians, another branch of the Celtes; and adds, that they worshipped the God without name, and danced every full moon, before their houses, all the night in honour of him u. And might it not be upon this account, as an ingenious author observes v, that Lucan rallies e the Maffilian druids, when he tells them x, that they were the only ones of all men, to whom it was given to know, or not to know, the gods they adored? And then, speaking of their groves, says, that their ignorance of the deities they worshipped under them, was the cause of that veneration they paid to those sturdy and shapeless trees. He speaks there indeed of deities in the plural, Roman and poet like; but that he did not intend thereby, that any more than one was worshipped in those testament, as we shall presently shew; and we only mention it here to confute the notion of those, who suppose the Ejus of the Gauls to have been the god Mars; for neither he, nor any other inferior deities, were worshipped under these oaks, or with the same rites with Ejus; and therefore Pliny, in his description of the ceremony which they used in gathering the mistletoe of those sacred oaks, has these words, which plainly shew, that these trees were dedicated to the Deity itself: "The druids, says he,

" (13) believe, that the mistletoe is a sign, that God hath chosen that tree to himself;" and a little lower, after having particularly described their manner of gathering it, he adds, "that they offered up victims and prayers to God, that he would bless and prosper his own gift to them that receive it." It is plain from it, that he neither speaks here of Mars, Jupiter, or any other of their gods, but of the Deity itself.

a groves, is plain from what he says at the end of his description of the Massilian grove (F); viz. that the priest or druid, who officiated there, was afraid of meeting dominum luci, by which he could mean nothing else but the deity worshipped there, a notion probably common to them and the Jews, as we have shewn in the last note.

ANOTHER remarkable thing in their religion was their great veneration for the oak. This seems likewise to have been common to them and the old patriarchs and Jews, among whom that tree was in high esteem, though not in the same superstitious degree. Abraham is recorded to have pitched his tents under some famed oaks, such as those of Mamre, of More; which, though our version, and some others, have transformed into plains, yet, in the original, do plainly signify an oak or oak grove, as we have observed in a former volume¹. He is said moreover to have planted groves of them; and where-ever he pitched his tent, he is recorded to have built an altar unto the Lord, and to have given some significant name to the place, such as that of *Beerseba*², Bethel, and the like (G). The Gauls in particular seem to have improved upon this patriarchal custom, the origin of which seems rather owing to what we hinted in the last note, than to any sanctity, or extraordinary virtue, which either Abraham, or any of his ancestors or successors, could imagine to be in those trees; whereas, among both Celts and Gauls, the oak was looked upon and revered as an emblem, or as the peculiar residence, of the Deity. (F) This description, though disfigured with satire and ridicule, being curious, and pertinent to our present subject, we shall give the substance of it to our English readers. It is as follows: There is without the walls of Marseilles a sacred grove or wood, which had never been touched by ax from the creation. The trees of it grew so thick and interwoven, that they suffered not the rays of the sun to come through their branches, but a perfect damp and darkness reigned through the place. Neither nymphs nor sylvan gods could make their abode in it, it being destined for the most inhuman mysteries. There was nothing to be seen there but a multitude of altars, upon which they sacrificed human victims, whose blood turned the very trees of a horrid crimson colour. If ancient tradition may be credited, no bird ever perched upon their branches, no beast ever walked under them, no wind ever blew through them, nor thunder-bolt did ever touch them. These stately oaks, as well as the black water that winds about through the place in different channels, fill one with horror and dread. The figures of the god of the grove are a kind of standing, rude, and shapeless trunks, covered over with a dismal yellow moss. It is the genius of the Gauls (continues he) to feel no veneration for the gods, unless they be thus represented, in a manner quite opposite to the taste of other nations; for which reason their fear and regard for them increases, in proportion to their ignorance of those gods which they worship. There is a report, that this grove is often shaken, and strangely moved, and that dreadful sounds are heard from its caverns; that the yews, if thrown or cut down, grow up again of themselves; that the grove is sometimes in a blaze, without being consumed; and that the oaks are twined about with monstrous dragons. The Gauls dare not live in it, out of respect to the deity that inhabits it, and to which they intirely abandon it. Only at noon and midnight a priest goes trembling into it, to celebrate its dreadful mysteries; and is in continual fear, lest the deity, to which it is consecrated, should appear unto him. Thus far our poet.

We have already observed, that tho' he expresses himself in the plural in speaking of the Gaulish gods, rather as a poet and a Roman, yet his last words plainly shew, that he intended to speak of one deity here. All that we would further observe of the priest's dread of seeing that deity, seems plainly a relic of that notion, which even the patriarchs and ancient Jews had, that no man could see God, and live (14). As for the dreadful description of the grove, and its horrid apparatus, if it is not, in a great measure, the fiction of the poet, to ridicule the Gaulish worship, might it not be that of the druids themselves, to prevent their laity, as well as strangers, from entering, and prying too curiously into it?

(G) It must be observed, that the original word alon signifies both an oak, and a grove or thicket of oaks. These were, at first, chosen in those hot countries for the sake of coolness and shade; and where the plains were well watered, and fit for pasture, but wanted such woods or groves, they planted them, as Abraham is recorded to have done at Beerseba. These, in time, came to be in great esteem by his descendants, not only on account of their extreme usefulness, and long duration, but out of regard to those patriarchs, who had dwelt and sacrificed under them. Jacob, we read, buried his beloved Rachel's nurse under an oak, which he called The oak of mourning. He buried all the idolatrous trash, which he found in his household, under another (15). This last became famous among the Shechemites (16), probably because Joshua reared a stone or pillar under it, in memory of the covenant which he renewed just before his death between God and the Israelites (17).

This regard, by degrees, dwindled into downright superstition, not only among the Jews, but even among christians, Mohammedans, and other nations. As to the former, they became infamous for their sacrificing and burning incense in their high places and groves, and at length, as they are justly upbraided by the prophets, under every oak and green tree (18), notwithstanding God's prohibitions, and severe threatenings. As for the latter, we have shewn in a former volume, in speaking of the oaks under which Abraham dwelt, that they were still shewn in Constantine's time, and resorted to with great devotion by christians, Turks, and even heathens (19).

it, especially the misfoldine, was thought to have a kind of divine virtue, was used ^a as a kind of panacea for man and beast, and applied to both, as well inwardly as outwardly, in wounds, contusions, and cuticular ailments, as well as for inward diseases, or even barrenness and abortion in men, women, and cattle (H). The leaves, or some small boughs of it, were worn by the druids and laity in all their religious ceremonies, which were constantly performed, as we hinted above, under those trees, or in oaky groves. These, if we may guess from the few fragments we have left of them in history, and from some carneads or heaps of stones still standing in some of our isles, especially that of Anglesey ^b, and which may be supposed to have been cinctures or fences round the grove, to prevent their entrance between the trees, except where it was left open to the comers, and, not unlikely, guarded by ^b some inferior druids, to stop all strangers from intruding into their mysteries: we say, if we may guess at them by these few antient helps, these groves were of different forms, some quite circular, some oblong, and more or less capacious, according to the number of votaries, or the largeness of the district or canton, to which they belonged. The area, which was in the centre of the grove, was open at the top, and encompassed with several rows of these oaks, set very thick and close. Within the large circle were several smaller ones, surrounded, as is supposed, with large stones, which served for the sacrifices, and other most solemn part of their worship. In the centre, or near it, of these small circles, were placed solid stones of a large size, and convenient height, on which the victims were killed, dissected, and offered ^c up. Each of these being, as we imagine, a kind of altar, was surrounded with another row of stones, the use of which cannot be easily guessed at, unless it was to keep the people at a due distance from the priests that officiated. Some of these interior circles are likewise thought to have served, one or more for their courts of judicature, another for their grand council or assembly, or for such other purposes as can only be guessed at ^c; though we very much doubt, considering the vast reverence that was paid to those groves, as they were consecrated to religious rites, whether their druids would suffer any secular matters to be transacted in them. We are rather inclined to think, that these cinctures might all serve for the same religious ends, one for human victims, another for those of beasts, a third for auguries, ^d and such-like; not but they may be reasonably enough supposed to have had other groves, designed for such secular purposes as we just now mentioned; and these might probably enough be of oaks, as the others were, that the sacredness of those trees might strike these courts and councils with due awe, and prevent such quarrels and indecencies as might otherwise happen. And this conjecture (and the contrary one is no more than guess-work) seems more agreeable to what we have lately quoted of their worship out of Tacitus, Pliny, and Lucan.

(H) Pliny, who has given us this account more accurately than any other author, tells us (20), that they called the mistleto, as well as the particular day or festival on which they gathered it, by a name which signified cures all. We shall quote the whole passage, as it is both succinct and curious:

"The druids, says he, who are among the Gauls what the magi are elsewhere, hold nothing so sacred as the misfoldine, and the tree that bears it. This is constantly the oak, for which they have such a high esteem, that they do not perform the least religious ceremony without being adorned with garlands of its leaves. It is, in all likelihood, from the Greek name of the oak, that the Gaulish priests are called druids. These philosophers believe, that every thing that grows upon that tree doth come from heaven; and that it is an evident proof, that God hath chosen it above all others.

"The misfoldine of the oak being scarce, and rarely found, when any of it has been discovered, they go, with great ceremony and respect, to gather it. This is always done on the sixth day of the moon, a day so esteemed among them, that "they have made their months and years, and even ages, which consist but of thirty years, to take their beginning from it. The reason of their choosing that day is, because the moon is, by that time, grown strong enough, though not come to the half of its fulness; and this day they call by a name, which, in their tongue, signifies cures of all ills.

"When the druids have got ready under the oak all the apparatus for the sacrifice, and the banquet which they usually make, they tie, for the first time, two white bulls to it by the horns. Then one of the priests, clothed in white, gets up the tree, and, with a gold scyth, cuts off the misfoldine, which is received in a white sagum; which done, they begin to offer their sacrifices, and pray to God to give a blessing to his own gift unto them that are honoured with it. He adds, that the water of the misfoldine gives fertility to man and beast, is a specific against all kind of poison; an eminent instance, says he, that human religion has often no other object than frivolous things."

- a How the Ejus, or supreme deity of the Gauls, came afterwards to be transformed into, or give place to, Jupiter, which, if we may believe Lactantius, did not happen till about the fourth century at soonest, we shall endeavour to account in the sequel. But, by what we have said of him and his worship, and of the oaks and groves consecrated to him, &c. the reader cannot but have observed a great deal of conformity between the Gaulish and the patriarchal and Jewish religion, though, if this had been all, we should hardly have inserted this remark; neither could Celsus have had so much reason to oppose the antiquity and wisdom of the druidish religion, and its conformity to that of the antient Jews, against the novelty of the gospel ^d. We shall therefore beg leave, in speaking of the other branches of the Gaulish religion and ceremonies,
- b to observe to him the same conformity running through very many other particulars, as they have been collected in one view by a very diligent author often quoted under this head ^e; and from which we may be able to satisfy ourselves, that they could never be owing to mere chance, but that both plainly appear to have flowed from the same source.
1. THE Gauls had a sovereign pontiff or head of the druidish order, to whom both these, and the whole nation, paid the highest regard. The same we find among the Jews, to say nothing of Melchisedech, to whom Abraham paid tythes of the spoil he had lately gained. 2. The druids, under this their head, had such an uncontrollable power and sway, that whoever refused to submit to their decisions, not only in religious, but civil matters, (even to the putting an immediate stop to an engagement, when both armies were ready for the onset, if the druids did not like the prognostics) was interdicted from assisting at their solemnities, which was looked upon by the Gauls as the most grievous punishment ^f. The Jewish high-priest, at the head of the sanhedrin, was looked upon as the dernier appeal in all causes; and excommunication, the greatest punishment among the Jews, was to be the lot of those, who refused to abide by their decision ^g. 3. The druids were obliged to assemble themselves in the territories of Chartrain once a year. The Jews had their three grand festivals, on which their males were obliged to repair to Jerusalem. 4. The druids wore white garments. The same did the Jewish priests. 5. The druids lived in woods and groves. The same did generally the patriarchs, the sons of the prophets, and the Essenians, a kind of monks among the Jews. The Gauls had their female druids, prophetesses, and aruspices. The Jews had Miriam Aaron's sister, Deborah, Huldah, and other prophetesses, to say nothing of other women, who kept familiar spirits. Some of those females were in high repute among the Gauls, and bore a great sway in the government. And Deborah was a famed judge in Israel. 6. The Gauls vowed to Mars some parts of the spoil they took in war, and it was death for any one to infringe upon it. The same was among the Israelites with respect to those cities and kingdoms, which were subject to anathema, as in the case of Jericho. The rest they divided among themselves, according to certain laws and customs settled amongst them. Moses, Joshua, and David, made also laws on the same head, what portion should be offered to God, what given to the priests, and how the rest should be divided between the combatants and those who guarded the camp and baggage. 7. The Gauls worshipped a brazen bull. And the Israelites golden calves. 8. In public calamities they offered a human victim, on whom they threw all the curses that threatened them. The Jews did the same by their scape-goat ^h. 9. The Gauls had power of life and death over their servants. The same had the patriarchs and Jews, and the former even over their families, as one may conclude from the instance of Judah and his daughter-in-law Tamar ⁱ. They began their days from the evening, as the patriarchs and Jews, and, like them, distinguished the year only into three seasons, viz. spring, summer or harvest, and winter. The autumn was so unknown to both, that they had no name for it. The same is affirmed likewise of the Egyptians by Diodorus Siculus. 10. They gave significant names to their children, to places, &c. as these did. 11. The Gauls believed the immortality of the soul; so that no people under heaven could shew a greater contempt of death. The patriarchs and Jews, if we except the upstart sect of the Sadducees, were famed for looking on this life only as a mere passage into a better. 12. When their life or liberty was in danger, they endeavoured to redeem it by one or more of their own servants ^k. We have an instance of this in Jephtha, one of the Israelitish judges, and his rash vow ¹, ^a though it was more common among the Phœnicians, and other antient nations. 13. The Jews had the waters of jealousy to assure them of the fidelity or infidelity of their wives. The Gauls had some kinds of ordeals or trials to the same sense; and Julian the emperor tells us, that the waters of the Rhine had some secret virtue to punish those wives, who had gone astray (1). The druids made it a constant maxim not to commit any thing of their laws, philosophy, or history, to writing, but to couch them in set poems and canticles, to be learned by heart, and sung at proper places and seasons. These songs were, it seems, so multiplied in Cæsar's time, that it took up some druids (for they were all obliged to it) near twenty years in learning them ^m. We do not find but that this was the antient custom of the patriarchs and other nations in Canaan before Moses, who quotes some of those canticles, and composed some of them himself, as did other prophets after him, in memory of some signal victories, deliverances, and the like. Some Gaulish nations carried their gods along with them to the war, as did the Israelites their ark, and their apostates the tabernacles of Moloch, Cbiun, and Rempham. The Gauls did personify and deify their rivers, lakes, woods, &c. and might not this be a corruption of that laudable elegance of the sacred poets, who called upon those, and all other creatures, to praise God? as, in all probability, their offering human victims, common likewise to other nations, and even to the apostate Israelites, in imitation of them, seems to have had its rise from the example of Abraham's readiness to sacrifice his son Isaac, concerning which we shall refer our readers to what we have said in a former volume ⁿ. We shall now give our readers a short account of this inhuman rite, as it was practised among the Gauls, and leave our readers the pleasure of discovering, in the sequel of this history, many more instances of that conformity we have been speaking of, which we are forced to omit, to avoid being tedious.

Human victims how offered.

As to this bloody custom of sacrificing human victims, which began so early with the Gauls, and which, if we may believe Procopius ^o, did not end till some centuries after their embracing christianity, we can only speak of it as it was transacted out of their groves or places of worship; for as to what was done within them, no stranger being made acquainted with, much less admitted to see it, we must be wholly in the dark about it, as their druids committed nothing of it to writing. Concerning those unhappy ones, that were offered abroad, Cæsar and Plutarch give us the following account: When a man's life is in danger, either through sickness or other accident, they immediately sacrifice, or at least make a vow so to do, some human victims; for, besides that they think them the most perfect and pleasing to the gods, they believe, that one man's life cannot be redeemed but by that of another, without which no satisfaction could be made to them for their goodness to men. And these are the ceremonies established amongst them upon all such occasions ^p: They erect a huge, hollow pile of osier, which they fill with these unhappy wretches, who are quickly suffocated by the smoak, and reduced to ashes soon after. They imagine however, that criminals of any kind are much more acceptable victims; but, where they are not to be had, the innocent must go in their stead. In their funerals, which are very magnificent, they throw into the burning pile every thing that the deceased delighted in, even to living creatures; and it is not long since they threw likewise into it all his favourite servants and slaves. Some of his near relations, continues Cæsar, did likewise fling themselves into the flames, in hopes of living happy with him in the next world. This custom was exactly like that of burying the Jewish kings, except the

(1) This is not a proper place to speak of those ordeals and other trials, as passed, in all probability, from Gaul into Great Britain, and which might, in all likelihood, have their rise from the Jewish waters of jealousy. But that, which the apostate Julian mentions concerning the Rhine, can scarcely be owing to any thing else.

He tells us (21), that, when a Gaul suspected his wife of infidelity, he obliged her to throw, with her own hands, the children that were born of her body into that rapid river. If they sunk, the woman was deemed guilty, and put to death. If they swam, and moved towards the place where she stood trembling at a convenient distance, and ready to receive them, she was cleared, and restored to her husband's favour.

- a burning of living and human creatures, as the reader may see in a former volume, where we have given an account of that ceremony ^q.

We lately hinted at their imitating, in some measure, the Jewish scape-goat, by devoting some vicarious victims to death, and praying, that all the curses due to them might fall upon it. The Maffilians, among the rest, are reported to have, in times of pestilence, made choice of some indigent person, that offered himself voluntarily, whom they took care to fatten with the daintiest fare during a whole year; after which they dressed him with garlands, and other rich ornaments, and led him through the streets, loaded with the bitterest imprecations, to his death^r. We have formerly had occasion to account for this custom, which was likewise common to other nations, as well as the Gauls, and had its rise from the same source^s. However, if the Gauls, in such calamitous times, could procure any of the handsomer and nobler sort to offer themselves to such a voluntary death, they not only preferred them, but encouraged them by large rewards and encomiums. These were led, like the poorer sort, out of the city, and stoned, and the former thrown down from some high precipice. The common notion among them was, that such a spontaneous death for the good of the commonwealth intitled them to a rank among the gods. In other cases they either tied or nailed them to some tree or post, and shot them to death with arrows. Others they burnt, with a number of beasts, on a pile of hay^t. It was also customary among them to reserve their criminals to the fifth year, and to burn them in sacrifice with the first-fruits of their ground^u. The same author adds, that they threw into the fire an incredible quantity of gold, and other rich things, which it was death for any one to meddle with afterwards^w. As for their brute victims, they were left, in some measure, to the choice of the offerer, or perhaps rather of the druids, who were the butchers of them, and always officiated in white garments (K), both in this, and all other parts of their worship. Only the horses, which they took in battle, or at least part of them, they burnt with the bodies of the slain^x. All these sacrifices were occasional, and unlimited, except those which Lucan calls national, and which were constantly performed at noon, and at midnight, as we have hinted above. As the Gauls were addicted to all kind of superstition (L), they used to be exceeding watchful of the singing and flight of birds, and other such kind of ominous trash. They never undertook any thing of consequence, without the advice of their aruspices, who were, for that reason, in high request among them. These carefully examined the entrails, blood, &c. of their victims; and when they offered any human one, as they did constantly before they held a council, whether of the nation or district, they stabbed him behind with a cutlafs, a little above the diaphragma, watched the manner of his falling, whether on his right or left side,

(K) Some add, that they were striped with purple, which dwindled, either at one or both ends, into a point like a spindle, to distinguish them from the laity. But there seems to be no need of supposing such a distinction, seeing the white robe was peculiar to the druids, and no one dared to wear it but they and the druidesses, of whom we shall speak in due time (12).

(L) According to the Greek and Roman writers, the Gauls exceeded all other nations in cruelty and superstition; and yet, if we compare them together, even according to their own writings, we shall scarce perceive any difference between them, but what is on the opposite side. It must be owned however, that some of the Gallic nations were very famed for their superstition, since Alexander Severus is upbraided with having even outdone some of them, viz. the Vascones or Gascous, in it (23).

Our design is not to extenuate those inhuman and abominable practices of the Gauls, but to observe how little reason other authors, especially the Romans, had to blacken them above all other nations, when they themselves outdid almost all that ever went before or since. We have given a sufficient number of instances of it in their history under several of their emperors, especially Severus above-mentioned, Nero, and Julian; and we shall close this note with another, which happened just upon the breaking out of the war between the Gauls under Viridomarus and them, when, as Plutarch tells us (24), they found themselves obliged to obey certain oracles, which they found in the Sibylline books, and to bury alive in the beef-market two Gauls, and two Greeks, a man and a woman of each nation, to whom, says he, they still offer some private sacrifices in the month of November, which the people are not allowed to be present at; which very sacrifices, we are told by two of their own authors (25), were since repeated at the same place on several occasions, especially at the first opening of the Punic war, which immediately succeeded that of the Gauls above-mentioned.

or on his face, how the blood flowed at the wound, and from thence gave their judgment, which was exactly followed, let the case be what it would, or the appearances be ever so much against it; infomuch that they have come to the head of an army, and stopped the fight, which was just going to begin, their kings and generals not daring to contravene them upon any account ^a.

We have already hinted, that their religious groves had some large stones, which were supposed to be the altars on which they offered up their victims. Some of them are still extant in several parts of France, Germany, England, Wales, Ireland, and the isle of Anglesey, and are of such a monstrous size, that the bringing and rearing of them was thought, by the superstitious inhabitants, to have been the work of those demons, that were supposed to attend on that kind of worship, especially considering that, as ^b it is pretended, there were no quarries of such stones within any reasonable distance from the place where these altars stood. Of these one, that is to be seen in the confines of Alsace, measures about thirty-six foot in circumference, twelve foot and a half in breadth, and four foot and a quarter in thickness. It is reared on a parcel of other stones about three foot and a half from the ground ^c. Some of these altar-stones were round, others oval, some square, others oblong, and some triangular. Some appear to have been adorned with a kind of ornament either of bas-relief or inscriptions, others to have been quite plain; but whether originally so, or by time and weather, is not certain. Others there were, which had a kind of hollow or basin on the surface, supposed to have been designed to receive the blood or entrails of the victims ^d. One of these is recorded to have had a hollow kind of nasty passage under it, through which they made those strangers, whom they designed for sacrifice, to pass, pelting them all the way with filth and dung; from which that passage is, it seems, called to this day cunus dæmonis, duvels-skut, or devil's bole ^e. The antiquaries of each nation have been very curious and diligent in their accounts of those altars, and other piles of huge stones, which are to be met with in almost every kingdom and province of Europe, together with such other monuments as describe those sacrifices that were offered upon them, and the apparatus and instruments that were used in them; but they generally deal so much in conjectures, and agree so little with each other, that it is no wonder that kind of learning has been so disrelished by the far greater part of the learned; so that it would be lost time for us to enter further on this subject, and all that we think worth adding to it is, that the Gauls are affirmed by the generality of authors to have constantly assisted at these sacrifices armed cap-à-pé, and to have carried some small thing belonging to the victim away with them in their mouths or hands ^f, after it had been offered up, or had been led to the altar.

They had no temples till long after Cæsar.

TEMPLES, we have already hinted, they had not before the coming in of the Romans, nor, in all likelihood, for a long time after Cæsar's conquest of them. An author, who lived long after him, tells us expressly, that they had not any other statue of Jupiter but a tall oak ^g, which could hardly be supposed to be growing in a temple, any more than those colossian piles of hay and other combustibles, in which, ^h we are told by other authors, they used to burn their numerous human victims, can be imagined to have been reared in any such close places, much less still the trees on which they fastened those whom they pierced with arrows. Their groves, such as we have described them, were much fitter for those ceremonies; and this appears to have been one main difference between the Gauls and the Greeks and Romans ⁱ. When Mars came to be adopted among their inferior deities, they only worshipped him under the figure of a naked sword, that was reposed upon an altar in one of those groves; but as they had then a custom to vow to him what spoil they took from their enemies, Cæsar tells us they generally deposited them in any place where they chanced to be. There they sacrificed all the cattle they found, and laid up the ^j rest of the plunder in vast heaps in the open country, which were nevertheless held so sacred by the people, that none dared to touch any part of it, though there were amongst them great quantities of gold and silver, and other rich stuff; for he tells us, that those consecrated heaps were to be found in most cities in Gaul ^k. This seems likewise another material point, in which they differed from other nations, who chose

- a to shut up those treasures in their temples, as in places of greatest safety; whereas the Gauls left them exposed under the canopy of heaven, and in the open fields, or, at most, in some lakes and groves, which were on that very account esteemed sacred (M). The Germans appear to have been still more averse to the introduction of temples amongst them, as we learn from Tacitus and other authors, and shall see in the next chapter; and even the Britons, who certainly must have had them, if any other Gauls had, because they were the standard of the Gaulish religion, from whom all the others received it; for we are told ^b, that these used to cross over in great numbers into Britain, or, as some think, into the isle of Anglesey^c, and to spend there some years in the study of their religion and mysteries, as it was indeed the
- b seat and nursery of it, and the residence of the grand druid, or chief pontif, and consequently of all the learned doctors of the Gaulish religion; and yet, when Tacitus speaks of the descent of the Romans into this island^d, he tells us, that their first care was to destroy those groves and woods which the druids had polluted with the blood of so many human victims; and would they not, upon the same account, have done so by their temples, if any such had been in this country? And since all the other Gauls appear to have regulated their whole religion, and its rites, from these, it cannot be supposed, that they could, at least in Tacitus's time, have had any temples any-where else, whatever they did afterwards more by force than out of choice, as we shall see by-and-by. Some statues they might have, and in all probability had,
- c before Cæsar's time; but it would be difficult to prove, that they bore any resemblance with those of the Greeks and Romans, either as to their figure or design, or that they were set up by the priests, and not rather by the people, who are often hurried away by imitation, though contrary to the consent of their guides, who appear to have been most strict observers of the old patriarchal way of worshipping the Deity; for as, on the one hand, they seem to have kept all along some kind of tradition from their progenitor, who was but a third in descent from Noah, not to say any thing of those before the flood, of which they could not so soon lose all memory, and whose custom it was to worship God without temples or images; so, on the other, their great veneration and tenaciousness for their antient rites and customs,
- d joined to the contempt they had for those of other nations, must have proved an effectual and long-winded preservative against their introducing them. At least it is very probable, that these statues or images we are speaking of, if there were really

(M) It must be owned, however, that some of these authors give to these places the name of temples or oratories, and Cæsar is affirmed to have risted them to support his army (25); but then they spoke like Greeks and Romans, among whom it was customary to recond such sacred treasures in their most famous temples, and even to call such consecrated places by the names of ισόον and templum. Thus Tacitus, though he affirms, that the Germans had no temples, tells us, that their goddess Hertza used sometimes to come out of her grove or Castum nemus, to air herself, and, when she was weary of rambling, was carried back, and placed in her own temple, which, the same author tells us afterwards, was no more than a lake within the wood where that goddess resided (26).

The same may be said of that famed one of Thoulouze, upon whose account the aurum Thoulouzanum became famous, even to a proverb, on account of the vast quantity that was reposit in it; This place Sirabo, speaking of it, calls a temple: There was, says he, a very famous temple at Thoulouze, the veneration and credit of which made it grow immensely rich, because none dared to touch any part of what was consecrated in it (27); and yet the same author, when he accounts for the vast quantities of gold that were found there, from some rich mines which he supposes to have been in the neighbourhood, and which, joined to the plain frugal way in which the inhabitants lived, made it increase upon them to such a stupendous height, he adds, that they had other treasures in many such-like places, which, says he, were deposited and consecrated in whole ingots, in lakes, as in so many sacred asyla. So that this Thoulouzan temple, and those other lakes he speaks of, were in all probability the same thing, or meant, at most, but some more sacred and private part of the lake, to which he gives the name of temple, only on account of the deity to whom that metal was consecrated.

What confirms it still more is, that Sirabò, speaking of the sacrilege committed by Cepio (28), mentions only the lake out of which this famous Thoulouzan gold was taken; and Juslin, speaking of the Tectosagi, whom he supposes to have brought it from the temple of Delphos, says, that, being returned to Thoulouze, and afflicted with a grievous plague, they were ordered by their augurs to fling their ill-gotten pelf into that lake (29). We shall have occasion to speak more particularly of this Thoulouzan treasure, and its being exposed to sale, in the sequel; and we only mention it here to shew upon what account Sirabò called it a temple, though no more than a sacred lake, with a source or niche, with some emblem of a deity in the richest, and, consequently, most sacred part of it.

any such among them, might be no other than monuments of some eminent persons^a and transactions, such as that which Laban and Jacob reared in memory of their mutual reconciliation, or that which the latter set up in the place where he buried his favourite *Rachel*¹; or perhaps to point out those sacred treasures, which were consecrated in the manner and places already mentioned, and to deter people from profaning or seizing upon them; all which might be easily mistaken for statues and idols by those Greek and Roman authors who beheld or heard of them.

BEFORE we dismiss this point, it will not be thought unseasonable to make some further inquiry into those vast piles of stones which remain to this day both in England, and in other parts of Europe; concerning which so many different conjectures have been offered by learned antiquaries, and others, whilst some have maintained them^b to have been erected by the Romans, others by the antient Gauls and Britons; one sort taking them for monuments erected in memory of some famous battle or victory, others for burying-places, and a third sort, though with less reason, as we think, for temples, or places of worship. We shall, however, willingly save ourselves the trouble of entering into a detail of them, considering how difficult it is to describe such kind of antiques, so as to give our readers any tolerable idea of them, without having constant recourse to some iconography of them, which are not in many cases easy to be had, and in most not without greater expence than they would perhaps think they deserve. But since that famous one of Stonehenge, which has been seen by all the curious, and of which we have so many descriptions in many of our English^c authors, may be justly affirmed to exceed all the rest, as well in the largeness of the stones as the perfection of its figure, we shall, notwithstanding its more properly belonging to a subsequent chapter, venture to speak of it here, and give the best light we can concerning that truly curious piece of antiquity; especially as we proposed, at the beginning of this chapter, to treat of every thing that related to the Gauls, and those other nations that are descended from them, in so full a manner, as might save us the trouble of needless repetitions in those that follow. But what more effectually calls upon us to treat of it here, is, that a reverend and learned author lately, in that curious and elaborate account he has given of that stately edifice^d, hath endeavoured to prove it an antient druidish temple, which, if it had been^d such, would overthrow all that we have hitherto said, on the testimony of so many antient authors as we have produced, in favour of the opposite opinion. Had that learned author contented himself with calling it a druidish edifice of any kind but that of a temple, we should have readily agreed to it; because we think he has given us full proofs of its being not only much antienter than the Romans, and, consequently, much more so than the Saxons, but has further demonstrated, as far as the subject is capable of demonstration, that it never could be a fabric of the former; so that upon the whole it must be owned to have been a British or druidish work: and thus far we readily agree with him, tho' we shall take the liberty, as we think we ought, to differ from him in his origin of the druids, as well as in this of their having erected^e temples in imitation of the patriarchs, who are no-where recorded to have reared any thing but bare altars of unhewn stones, or, at most, some groves over them, rather for shade and coolness, than out of any superstitious regard for either the oaks, or any other trees. And as our author offers nothing but far-off conjectures on a subject of such remote and dark antiquity, there seems to be one insuperable obstacle against his hypothesis of their coming from Phœnice; namely, that if these druids had^f been of so different a nation from the Celts the ancestors of the Gauls, let them have come into Britain when they would, either before or after the Celts, it is not to be supposed, that these, much less all their Gaulish descendants, who were so superstitiously tenacious of their antient rites, laws and customs, could have ever paid^f such a blind and universal subjection to them, not only in religious, but in all civil and military concerns, as we have seen from the universal consent of Greek and Roman authors they actually did: and if those druids had had such sublime notions of the Deity, and been such strict followers of the patriarchal religion and rites, it is scarcely to be imagined they could have fallen into such horrid excesses, superstitions, and cruelties, as we have shewn they did, even from the earliest times.

We come now to speak of this famous fabric of Stonehenge, and to give our readers such an account of it as may afford them an idea of the excellent taste of those

- a druids, who were the projectors and conductors of it; and may serve to shew the nature and design of all other works of this kind, that are extant in any parts of Europe (N), where they bore any sway; and herein we shall make no difficulty to follow our learned author's description of it in every case but that we have excepted above, it being, in all other respects, the most exact and accurate we have; tho' we shall refer those who desire a fuller account of it, to his late elaborate description here referred to.

- THE name of Stonehenge, being of Saxon extract, and signifying barely a heap of hanging or gallows stones, is so contemptible a one for so noble a work, that it plainly shews it to have been reared long before their coming into England. Had they been the builders of it, or capable of judging of the magnificence of that work, or had there, in their time, remained any traces of its builders, and their design in it, they would doubtless have called it by a much more honourable name. The ancient Britons, in the time of the Romans invading them, spake of it only by long and immemorial tradition, and as of a work far above human power; and called it, in their language, Cboir Gbaur, which some interpret the choir or dance of giants, on account of a general notion that ran through all those countries, where such heaps of vast stones were set up, that it was done by giants, though others, more absurdly, by the assistance of dæmons, probably from the reputation which the druids were in for their skill in magic, and by the help of which they were supposed to have reared those stupendous piles in the form they stood; though our author very judiciously observes, that Cboir Gbaur might be more properly rendered the grand choir, as it exceeded all other works of this kind in bigness, and, not unlikely, in dignity, on account of the arch-druid, or of his holding his grand assembly of all the inferior ones in this place. This etymon is altogether suitable to the grandeur of the fabric, and the design of it, whether we suppose it, with our author, to have been a temple, or, as seems more probable to us, for some other public use, in either of which it appears equally grand and noble. And this will go a great way to convince us, that it never was reared by the Romans; for the ancient Britons would hardly have given such a grand name, to a fabric of theirs, in their own language: but our author has taken a much more effectual way to convince us, that it could be none of their work, much less such a one as our famed architect Inigo Jones (if he really was the author of that plan and performance which Mr. Webb published under his name, and has been so amply confuted by Dr. Charlton * and Keyzler) has endeavoured to prove it, and in which he asserts it to be a round Roman temple, like the Pantheon (O).

Dr. Charlton, though he fully exploded that notion, yet failed in proving his own, which attributed it to the Danes; upon which he was soon after confuted by

(N) Though there are many of these to be found in Germany, France, Spain, Brabant, Holland, &c. yet they are no-where so frequent as in these British isles, even, as our author observes, from the very Land's-end in Cornwall to the utmost promontory in Scotland, where the Roman power never reached. They are to be seen in all the islands between Scotland and Ireland, in the isle of Man, in all the Orkneys, and numerous in Ireland; and all pretty near after the same design, being generally arches of rude stones, of different diameters, upon elevated ground, open heaths and downs, and chiefly made of stones taken from the surface of the earth, though some of them appear to be of different forms, and so decayed and disfigured by time, that it is hardly possible to guess at their original use or intention, but from some analogy which they seem to bear with those that are more perfect, as this we are upon (30).

Those on the continent have suffered still more, not only from the Romans, who took singular pride in destroying them, and introducing some of their own in their stead, and bringing the Gauls over to their religion and customs; but likewise from the blind zeal of weak christians, who looked upon it as a piece of merit to destroy or deface them, as monuments of idolatry, and superstitious cruelties. The reader may consult concerning them the authors quoted in the margin (31).

(O) That great architect, or, as is commonly thought, his publisher, to make the dimensions answer to his scheme, has been forced to alter and misrepresent them, to displace some of those huge stones, and remove them at such a distance as best answered to his imaginary plan. All which was afterwards discovered by a new survey of it before persons of taste and judgment. Jones not publishing his account, though he lived thirty years after he had taken a view of it, makes one conclude, that he never designed it; and that, upon a serious examination of it, he found it impracticable. But upon his death, Mr. Webb his son-in-law, it is thought, found an expedient of surmounting that difficulty, by the alterations we have mentioned; and by way of salvo tells the world, that if his father-in-law had lived to finish it, it would have appeared in a much better guise.

And was built by either Saxons or Danes.

The notion of its being a Roman temple confuted.

Olaus Vormius †, there being really no such monuments to be found among the Gothic a nations. Besides, this of Stonehenge is mentioned in some manuscripts of Ninnius, who wrote two hundred years before they set foot in Britain; all which is a sufficient confutation of its being a Danish work. Keyzler, for want of being thoroughly acquainted with our British antiquities, after having confuted the notion of Inigo Jones, of its being a Roman temple, or having any relation to public worship, and the vulgar error of its being built by giants, or by magic art, or of its being some old broken remains of the flood (P), endeavours to prove it a sepulchral monument erected by the Anglo-Saxons ‡. We hope we have already said enough to prove, that, if it was such a sepulchral fabric, it is of too old a date to have been reared by that nation, or indeed by any but the antient Britons; though he is pleased, in order to b prove them every way unqualified for such a work, to represent them as such ignorant savages, and so like the wild Americans †, that he thinks it argument sufficient, and indeed it is the only one he gives, against any one believing them to have been the contrivers of it. But how truly soever this character may suit to his antient Germans, of whom we shall speak in the next chapter, we hope to shew in the sequel of this, besides what has been occasionally said of the Britons, and their druids, that they were the very reverse of what he has painted them: he has succeeded much better in his proofs, that it was a monumental work, from many more of the like nature and form, which are known and allowed to be such. Our very author himself tells us of one in Ireland, which, by his description, is Stonehenge in miniature, c and which he owns to have been the monument of a famed druideis †; though he insinuates it to be her temple likewise. What he mentions in order to prove the great pile being rather a temple than a sepulchral monument, viz. the horns, bones, charcoal, and other things that were dug up from under it, is quite insufficient, it being common, at the funerals of antient Britons and Gauls, not only to offer hecatombs of victims, which alone would answer for these horns, bones, &c. but likewise to bury their favourite horses and slaves, as we shall see in its due place: and if the reader will be pleased to look back at what we have said of the funerals of their brethren the Scythians, especially of those of the highest rank †, and compare it with the form and disposition of the stones in this place, he will be apt to think it a more decent d refinement upon that antient and inhuman Scythian custom; and only rearing a number of huge stones in this form, instead of the skins of men and horses, which they used to stuff, and set up round their monuments; for as it favoured less of barbarity, so it was of a much more lasting nature. But this we offer only as our own conjecture, and conjecture is all that can be offered, in favour of any other hypothesis about it at this vast distance of time, and with those little helps we have left. For this reason we shall omit mentioning some other notions which people have entertained; such as, that it was the place where the grand council of Britain met, a Roman trophy, the monument of the famous queen Boadicea, of king Vortigern, and such-like, all which, carrying still less probability than any of the preceding ones, e are not worth dwelling longer upon.

We shall now give a short description of the fabric itself, out of that accurate survey which the reverend author last quoted made of it. It is situate on a pleasant part of Salisbury plain, about two miles from Amberbury, and six from Salisbury, and is situate not upon the summit of a hill, but very near it; and, for more than three quarters of the circuit, you have a gentle ascent to it from the lower ground; at half a mile distance the appearance of it is quite stately, awful, and august, especially on the north-east side, which is the most perfect. According to his plan or iconography of it, the circumference of it exceeds that of the outside of St. Paul's

(P) There are two other vulgar errors more worth confuting than any of these, because they have proved exceedingly detrimental to these antient monuments. The one is, the notion of the stones being factitious, or cast by art, which hath and doth still induce stupid pretenders to antiquity to come and disfigure those curious stones with chisels and hammers, to find out whether they are really so or not. The other is, their digging near and round about them, in hopes of finding out some hidden treasures, or other curious antiquities; by which means many of them are fallen down, and others so very near doing so, that, if this humour continues much longer, those noble fabrics will be reduced, in time, into a heap of ruinous fragments, and no traces be left, either of their structure, design, or magnificence, but what we find in such descriptions as those given by this and other authors.

- a cupola. The height of the outward cornice is eighteen foot complete, and that of the inner twenty-four at a medium; for these, for reasons to be mentioned hereafter, are not all of equal height. Thus the height of the inner circle, or rather ellipsis, as our author has proved it, bears a just proportion to the curve of the circumference, which is above one hundred feet, and was one fourth part of it, though at present some of these stones either stooping, or by long time being sunk lower, come somewhat short of the proportion above-mentioned. The nobleness likewise of their lights and shades, as well as the variety arising from their circular form, adds to the elegance of the prospect; so that it is not without reason that our great Jones blamed Mr. Camden for calling it so senselessly as he doth in his Britannia, insana substructio, a buge, or, as he englishes it, a wild kind of structure; whereas it plainly appears to have been the very reverse. But it is manifest, that he never saw it, or took but a slight view of it; and his description is so faulty and incorrect, that he seems not to have thought it worth a more exact survey, though he had seen those of Mr. Aubrey and Inigo Jones; but these likewise he seems to have had but little opinion of, and rather mentions their account of it to confute them, than to rectify his own by them; and we own, that he has very judiciously exploded both their notions, as well as all those other vulgar ones, which ascribe the rearing of this odd edifice, as he thinks it, to any but to the antient Britons. But to return to the fabric itself: the whole is inclosed within a circular ditch, which being crossed, one ascends thirty-five yards
- b before he comes to the work; so that the area, as it is inclosed by the ditch, is three times the diameter of the building; and therefore the distance from the ditch within-side, quite round, to the fabric, is equal to the diameter of the fabric. When you enter the building, whether on foot or horseback, you are struck with astonishment at the sight of the vast stones, whether you view those that are still standing in their antient site, or those which lean forward, and are ready to fall, or those which lie down, and, by their immense weight, have crushed a number of others under them, especially that which our author supposes to have been the altar-stone (Q), and is broken into three large pieces by the fall of one of the large architraves. What increases the wonder, especially to a man versed in these antique works, is, that,
- d among those dreadful dilapidations, in which every stone lieth, like the carcase of a giant, with a number of horrid ruins under it, there remains still as much of it undemolished, as enables one to recover an idea of what it was when in its perfect state, and enough of every part to give one a notion of the whole. To all this we may add the beautiful contrast, which the view of the inside gives you, when joined to the vast and beautiful prospect of the country about it. The one, if you look up to those huge stones, and the vast ponderous imposts over them, the chasm of sky between the jambs of the cell or inner circuit, you imagine you see whole quarries mounted in the air; and if upon the rude havock below, it looks like the bowels of a mountain turned inside out. The other gives you a most spacious and variegated prospect of the country round about, bounded only by the horizon. One of them is what they call Vespasian's camp; a beautiful prospect it is! another the antient hippodrome, or place for horse and chariot-races; a third the grand avenue to the fabric, which, as our author supposes, begins some miles from it. The plain is here-and-there interspersed with a vast number of mounts, or, as they are called, barrows, some larger than others. The largest of them is inclosed about with a ditch an hundred cubits in diameter. These are set thicker and closer in one place, and thinner at another; and, upon digging some of them up, there have been found human bones, urns, and some kinds of beads, and other pieces of glass, crystal, jet, amber, and such-like female trinkets, of different colours and metals; as also some swords, hatchets, and other weapons; have been dug out of them; which plainly shew them to have been burying-places; but whether of the antient Britons, Romans, Saxons, or Danes,

(Q) And so it may really have been, let the fabric be supposed a temple, a sepulchral monument, a grand court or council, or any thing of the like nature, seeing that, as we have observed before, sacrifices were used in great numbers in all those solemnities, and an altar cannot but be supposed to have been fixed in some convenient part of the building; but why so close to one part of the cell or nich as Mr. Jones has made it, and not in the centre, where Keyzer would rather have it, this reason may be well enough assigned, that it is most likely to have stood where we find the huge fragments still lying, and crushed by one of the large imposts falling upon it; for, had it stood in the centre, it would have been out of the reach of it, and have remained whole to this time.

is not easy to determine, though the first seems most probable upon one account, a which the reader will find in the margin (R). These barrows however are so thick about the neighbourhood of Stonehenge, that, from some heights, one may tell one hundred and twenty-eight in sight¹. Among them one may observe, in some places, two or more, sometimes to the number of six or seven, inclosed in the same circle or ditch, of which one is larger than the rest, and seems to be the tomb of some head of a family, and the rest that of the family itself. The most remarkable of all the rest are, that which is called the tomb of king Carvifius, who was the famed king of the Iceni, who fought against Julius Caesar. It stands on the other side Wilton, antiently Carvitium, so named, as is supposed, from, if not built by, him. It is situate on an eminence, and of a handsome height, and has four tall stately trees planted b on the top. From this mount you have the prospect of Old and New Sarum, of Wilton house and park, the Ikening road, and some distant hills. The other, called Bush-barrow, is beautifully planted by the shepherds, and commands the prospect of Stonehenge, of the curfus or antient races, and of all the barrows around that plain, besides a most elegant and spacious landscape^m. Thus much may serve to give an idea of the grand prospect, which this noble structure affords you from without.

BUT, before we come to speak of its symmetry, and the form and bigness of its stones, it may not be amiss to obviate a difficulty, which will, in all probability, occur to our readers from what we have just now said of those barrows; for since they evidently appear to have been burying-places, and to bear a kind of relation to the fabric itself, which is, as it were, the centre and kebla of them, will not this destroy our supposition of the latter being likewise a sepulchral monument? Will it not appear absurd to suppose such a noble fabric to have been subservient to the same ends with those hillocks, which are seen around it? And will it not be more reasonable to suppose it, with our author, to have been a temple, than a monument? To which we beg leave to answer, that we should have made no difficulty of admitting it such a temple, had we not so many convincing arguments, that neither Celts, nor Gauls and Britons, had any such buildings till long after the coming of the Romans. We have already given our reasons, and hope they will appear as satisfactory to them, as they do to us, when duly weighed. However, to shew that our conjecture d is not so inconsistent at the bottom, as it may appear at the first sight, we shall observe, first, that there is a manifest difference between a monument and a burying-place; and that the latter is designed only to inclose the remains, and the other to preserve the memory, of the deceased. These might be appropriated for the sepulture of the great ones, and their family; and this to burn their bodies, to be afterwards deposited in urns, and conveyed to their proper burying-place. Again, the stone fabric might be the sepulchre of kings, and consequently deserve greater magnificence; or it might be that of the druids, then in very high esteem; or more particularly of the head of that order, or grand druid, and require not only to make a more stately appearance, but likewise to bear some kind of affinity, as, in fact, it e seems to do, in its structure, to those sacred groves, in which they performed their

(R) The author observes, that the via Icenia, or Ikening-street, a road made by the Romans, which reached from Norfolk into Dorsetshire, infringes upon one of those barrows, and crosses some part of it; from which it is reasonable to conclude, that these barrows were older than that road (19).

In these barrows, besides those human and other bones, and materials, which have been digged out of them, there was a broad sword taken out of one, and sent to Oxford; in another was found a weapon of the same metal like a pole-ax, which weighed twenty pounds, and given to colonel Wyndham; out of a third was dug a brass instrument, called celt, and is supposed to have belonged to some druid, and to have been used for cutting the mistletoe off the oaks. We have taken notice above, that the Gaulish druids used one made of gold for that purpose. In one of the female barrows was found, besides some other ornaments and trinkets, the head of a javelin of brass, at the socket of which were two holes for the pins, that fastened it to the staff, and a sharp bodkin, round at one end, and square at the other, where it went into a handle. Some of the trinkets seem to have been originally covered with metal; and one of them had still a thin film of gold: all which sufficiently shew this barrow to have been the sepulchre of some heroine.

All that is further worth observing on this head is, that those materials, as well as the bones, appear to have suffered the fire in some, though not in others. In some likewise the ashes were deposited in a small urn of reddish earth unburnt; and, in others, the bodies were buried at full length, generally north and south. From all which it is concluded, that the custom of burning dead bodies was in use among the Britons, as well as that of burying without it, before the times of the coming in of the Romans.

- a religious ceremonies. But lastly, and to name no more, that which appears to us the most probable conjecture, from the relation which those barrows bear to the building, is, that this last was, as it were, the centre or kebla, that is, in other words, the point of view, or rather of distance, to all the rest, and might be erected at the charge of the whole nation, and be designed, not only as a magnificent monument, or rather an open and majestic edifice for the performance of funeral rites to the whole people, and more especially to those of a superior rank and merit, but likewise to ascertain the property of each barrow to its respective family, by the number of cubits or furlongs they stood east or west, &c. from it; for that they had a clear notion of the points of the compass, and of geometry, is evident from the very planting, structure, situation and symmetry of the fabric, as has been demonstrated by our author himself, as well as by some others, who have written before him of it.

THIS conjecture being allowed, as indeed every thing about this noble pile seems to confirm it, (viz. the long and spacious avenue to and from it, its dividing itself as a convenient distance, the one road towards the curfus, and the other to Radfin and the adjacent plains, the situation and structure of the edifice, its prospect and command over all the country, especially the barrows and curfus above-mentioned) we may carry it on a little farther, and suppose the corpse of the deceased, especially if a prince, a grand druid, a celebrated warrior or heroine, to have proceeded with a suitable funeral pomp, such as we have formerly shewn was observed by the Scythians to their monarchs^a, from the place of his residence to this sepulchral monument. Here the druids and bards received it, and performed the funeral ceremonies over it, which consisted chiefly, at least as far as related to their office, in offering sacrifices, rehearsing the genealogy and heroic exploits of the dead, singing their encomia on him and his ancestors, and, if the body was to be burnt, in assisting to, if not performing, that ceremony, committing the ashes to the funeral urn, and conveying it, with all its apparatus of ornaments, weapons, &c. to the proper place of its interment. The area on the outside might serve for exhibiting such games, shews, and fights, as were usual on such occasions, to the numerous spectators round about, and of which we shall speak in due place. After which, the company might proceed to the curfus, and there close the ceremony with races, and other such-like exercises. Every one of these places seems indeed so excellently situate, as if they had been designed for this grand ceremony. They all stand at a convenient distance from one another, and each commands the prospect of the others, and may be viewed at a great distance by the largest number of spectators which we can suppose to have assisted at it. We shall only add, that this notion, which we have been offering here, doth include all the various conjectures, which our best antiquaries have been able to make of it, either from the various antient traditions of it, or from their own discoveries. It answers to that of a temple, by reason of its sacredness, its resemblance to the antient religious groves, and the sacrifices and other rites performed there. It answers to that of a sepulchral monument, on account of its being appropriated to the grandest funeral ceremonies, and its being the centre or kebla to all the adjacent monuments round about: to that of an amphitheatre, on account of the funeral games and shews exhibited at it; and may also have served for a convening-place of the national council for the election and proclamation of a new king, general, or grand druid, whilst they assisted at the obsequies of a deceased one. Lastly, it appears not to have been reared by either Romans, Saxons, or Danes, because it is evidently prior to them all, for the reasons we have alleged a little higher, to which we shall subjoin one more, as we are come now to speak of the huge stones, that compose this stupendous fabric.

- f We have already hinted, that their monstrous largeness, joined to their apparent great distance from any quarry, and the many ups and downs through which they must have been conveyed hither, led the unthinking vulgar into the notion, that they were brought hither by magic, or the help of demons, according to some, and by giants, according to others, either of which were readily enough supposed able to bring them upon their backs from Africa (S); whilst the wiser sort rather imagined

(S) From a notion, which our author has likewise adopted, which supposes Afer to have been the same with Hepher, one of the sons of Abraham by Keturah, to have come hither from Africa with Hercules, and to have brought with him the druids, who erected the fabric we are now speaking of.

them to be factitious, and cast from some such composition as sand and mortar, and the like, and hardened by the weather. This notion, as we hinted in a late note, has been sufficiently, and, we may say, experimentally, disproved, though to the great detriment and disfiguring of the stones themselves, and the endangering of the structure. These stones, rough and battered as they have been by these pretended curiosoes, as well as by a long series of ages, appear to have been originally smoothed by the chisel, at least as far as they stand above ground; for, as to that part which lies buried in the earth, it shews itself, upon digging round it, to be in its primitive roughness, and as it was digged up out of the quarry, or, as our author rather supposes, and with greater seeming probability, as they were found lying on the surface of the ground in great numbers, and various dimensions, perhaps ever since the creation of the world (T), and as they are to be seen still in vast quantities upon Marlborough downs near Abury, at a place called from thence the Grey Wetters, and are of the same kind, viz. a bastard white marble. Hence another argument is drawn of its being of antienter date than the coming of the Romans; for, by this time, the Belgæ, a colony of the Gauls, had seized upon, and seated themselves in, that part of the country; so that the Britons must have fetched these stones from, and drawn them some miles through, an enemy's country, unless we could suppose, that those Belgæ were the builders of Stonehenge; which is less probable than that the Britons did, because these have left such kinds of monumental piles where-ever they can be traced, as we hinted a little higher. The difficulty is, to conceive how stones of that immense weight, one of which, though neither the largest nor heaviest, has been computed, by proper judges, to weigh between thirty and forty tons, and consequently would have required about an hundred and fifty oxen to have drawn it, could be conveyed from their original seat to Stonehenge, which is sixteen computed miles, and along such uneven ground, and in such quantities as compose the fabric. Sure it is, that no carriage can be conceived, which would not have been sunk into the ground by such a monstrous weight, unless it be that of rollers; but even this must appear a more than Herculean labour; the arduousness of which cannot be extenuated, but by the supposition, that the whole, or at least the greatest part, of the nation contributed their help towards it in their turns.

Their bulk and weight.

Disposition and form.

THE rearing of them afterwards in such form and situation, was a work of no less difficulty; for though we may reasonably suppose, that they were all pecked and chizelled, had their mortises and tenons wrought, and every thing done, that could lighten and fit them for the design, at the place where they were brought from, yet every man will easily perceive what an immense labour it must be to rear stones of that vast bulk and weight, to place them in their proper places, and at such due distances, that the architraves or imposts, that locked them to each other at the top, should fall so exactly every mortise upon its own tenon, as we find they actually do to this day; for it is plain to every eye that views them carefully, that each of these tenons are so exactly fitted to its mortise, that if either of the standing stones had been set ever so little out of its place, and perpendicular, they could never have locked one in the other, till they were reduced to their due distance and position; especially considering that there were at least fifteen in number of this large sort, set up two and two, the whole in a beautiful oval, nearest to a circle, and exactly locked each to the other by architraves of proportionable bigness. Each tenon is a druidish

(T) This is at least our author's conjecture (30), which we must be content to submit to our readers, till a more probable one be found out. We never had an opportunity of viewing those Grey Wetters but at a distance, whence they appeared as huge stones dug from some neighbouring quarry, which, though not now to be found, might have been exhausted, or covered up; in which case, these might have been designed by our ancient British druids for some other edifices of the same nature, which they were obliged to set aside, upon their being forced from this isle into those of Ireland, &c. and of which we shall speak in due place; but doubtless our author, who has been a curious examiner into all these particulars, had his reasons, though he doth not mention them, for not thinking them to have been dug out of any quarry, but to have lain there scattered from the beginning.

One thing is remarkable, that all these British structures in Wiltshire, and no others, are built of the same kind of stone as that of the Wetters; whereas the cathedral of Salisbury, all their great churches, and other large edifices, are of quite another kind, and were hewn out of the quarry called Chilmark, in the same county and neighbourhood.

- a cubit, somewhat above twenty inches in diameter (V) on the broadest side; for they are of an oval figure, and the mortises exactly answerable to it. By this contrivance the imposts or architraves lie firm locked upon the uprights, and these are kept firm to each other. Where the imposts are heaviest, the tenons are shortest; and where those are lightest, and consequently more in danger to be shaken, as in those of the outward circle, these are made longest, and the mortises deeper accordingly. If the bottom face of the impost be divided into three squares, the two mortises will be found in the middle of the two outward ones: draw diagonal lines from corner to corner, and where they intersect is the centre of the mortise; which central distance from one to the other is seven druidish cubits, or about eight of ours. We might
- b mention several other curious particulars, which make the whole appear to have been done geometrically, and from such plain and simple principles, as would best answer every purpose of the grand design; but for these we must, in a work of this nature, refer our readers to the author's account*, to avoid prolixity. But from what has been said, the reader may frame an idea of the curiousness, as well as arduousness, of the work, which, considering its regular complexity and symmetry, must be owned to outvie all that we read of single obelisks, pillars, and statues, how gigantic soever, if we except the pyramids of Egypt, and the Rhodian colossus, of which we have given an account in former volumes†.

- c THE whole fabric consisted of four circles, or rather ovals, of stones, the most considerable of which had ten uprights, and five architraves or imposts, making up five trilithons, each trilithon consisting of two uprights, and one impost, which locked them together at the top by the tenons and mortises above-mentioned. These trilithons were not all of the same height, as our author observed, and is indeed the only one we know, that has taken notice of this elegance; but each of them raised its head or impost somewhat higher, as it drew nearest to that before which the altar is judged to have stood, and which appears to have been not only the highest, but finest, both for the smoothness and beauty of the stones. The height of these trilithons, with their architraves or cornice, is computed, in a medium, to be about twenty-four feet; for there is no coming at an exact dimension in a work so decayed by
- d time and weather; the uprights being between twenty and twenty-one feet high, and lessening a little upwards to the top, and the cornice computed about three feet and a half, making up the complement of twenty-four feet. These imposts, on the outward face, bore the same sweep with the oval which they composed; but, on the inside, went in a strait line. They seem likewise to have been somewhat broader on the top than at the bottom; so that their sides bear a little slant downwards, whether to preserve them the better from the weather, or to make up the shortning, which is caused by their elevation from the sight. The gradual ascent of these three orders, as they may be termed, of trilithons, is, according to our author‡, thirteen, fourteen and fifteen druidish cubits. The breadth of each trilithon is computed, in
- e a medium, about ten cubits of the same measure, and is consequently the length at least of the impost. Each upright is about three feet nine inches thick, and twice that, i. e. seven feet and a half in breadth, or four cubits and a half druidish. Each trilithon, which composes this oval cell, stands at such convenient distance from the other, as to yield a beautiful prospect into it, which is not a little heightened by the space which stands between the two uprights, and which widens upwards, as these lessen in their breadth, and form an oval from its two centres, whose longest radius is fifteen, and shortest twelve, druidish cubits; so that the ellipsis is formed by a line of sixty cubits; which, being joined at the two ends, and turned round the two centres, give a diameter of thirty cubits at the longest, and twenty-five at the shortest,
- f five cubits being the supposed distance between the two centres (W).

(V) Dr. Stukeley hath clearly demonstrated, that this fabric was never built according to the Roman measure, from the great number of fractions and uncouth numbers, that occur in the measuring of each part, but according to the antient cubit, &c. which was common to the Hebrews, Phœnicians, Egyptians, &c. as well as, as it appears here, to the druids and antient Celts. His proofs the reader will see in the work itself (31); for it is not for us to dwell on those.

(W) Hence, among several other arguments, one may infer, that this nich or cell could not be originally such an hexagon, as Mr. Jones supposed it; much less could it be formed, as he pretended, at the six

(31) P. 6, & seq. & plac. vi.

THIS was the figure and greatness of that which Mr. Jones called the cell, and our a author the adytum or the concha, of, what they supposed the fabric to be, the temple, and which we have taken the more pains in describing, as it is indeed the grandest part of the whole. As for the remainder of the structure, though it bears an exact and beautiful proportion with it, we shall content ourselves with mentioning the most remarkable parts of each, without entering into a detail of all the particulars. Within this grand oval, is another of much lesser, though harder and finer stones. This circle, together with the long stone now broken, which is supposed to have been the altar, and is of a darkish-blue marble, such as is often set upon common altar tombs, and about sixteen feet in length, consists of twenty stones, the greatest b part of which are sadly broken and mangled; but not so much as to hinder a curious observer from recovering the form and order in which they stood, though their use and design is hard to be guessed at. Another circle or oval of forty stones surrounded the cell or adytum at a proper distance. These were likewise of a much lesser size; after which one comes out to the greatest or outer circle, composed of thirty stones, likewise harder, and somewhat of a pyramidal form. It seems as if the founders had wisely provided, that their lesser bulk should be compensated by their solidity. The difference between this outward circle, and that of the cell or adytum, consisted in this, that the architraves of the trilithons of the latter did not touch one another, but preserved the same distance with the two uprights, on which they were locked; c whereas, in the former or outward circle, the standers were joined by a continued cornice. Each stander or upright here had two tenons, at equal distances on the top, by which the two imposts were locked by their mortises, and so continued quite round, in the form of a crown or cornice. The whole was surrounded by a vallum or deep ditch at a proportionate distance, as we have hinted above; and this, with the grand avenue, and the gradual ascent up to the fabric, afforded a noble prospect, both as you advanced towards it, and much more when you viewed from it all the champaign country round about it. And thus much shall suffice for us to say on this stupendous British fabric, which has astonished and puzzled all the architects, anti- quaries, and curiosoes, that have either seen or read of it. We hope we have made d a sufficient apology for our anticipating this short account of it here, which might otherwise have more properly belonged to the British history; and that the accurate author, from whom we have taken the most considerable and curious part of it, will not take it amiss, that we have not followed his hypothesis of its having been a druidish temple, when he considers the reasons we have given for our asserting, that neither Gauls, Germans, nor antient Britons, had ever any such buildings, till long after their being conquered by the Romans, and being forced to introduce a foreign religion amongst them, that is, the worship of Jupiter, Mars, Mercury, and a great number of other inferior deities. How and when this was most probably brought about, we shall endeavour to account for in the next section.

points of three equilateral triangles; for, if this had been the case, there must have been six instead of five trilithons; but here is not the least footstep of a sixth, no stump or fragment of it, nor cavity in the earth, where it may be supposed to have stood; so that three stones of that immense weight and magnitude, as we have described them, must be imagined to have been spirited away by the same magic art, by which the vulgar supposed the whole to have been reared, before we can think, that it ever had this trigonometrical form.

How and when the antient Gauls introduced the worship of inferior deities among them.

IT is plain, by what we have quoted out of Caesar, Strabo, Lucan, and others, e that though the Romans had had a considerable footing in Gaul before the coming of that conqueror, yet they had not been able to persuade them to imitate them in their rearing of temples to any deity. If they had, Caesar would not have failed hinting something of it, it being one of the chief maxims of his republic, to spread their religion, laws, and customs where-ever they came; so that, if the Gauls had ever been forced, or prevailed upon, to build any such temples in their country, it can hardly be supposed, that he would have omitted mentioning it; he who took such pleasure

The Tribe of Koreish

- a to tell us how many petty kingdoms and commonwealths he had brought over to the Roman interest, and to a fondness for some of their customs. Since then there is not the least hint of it either in that or any author, but the contrary plainly appears to have been the practice of this nation, we may safely conclude they had not begun, even in his days, and under his government, to introduce this foreign custom, though it could it be made appear, that any such structures had been reared then, yet would it not from thence follow, that it was done by the Gauls, but would appear more probably to have been done by the Romans, who, as we observed at the beginning of the last section, made it a part of their religion to adopt the gods, to vow temples and statues, and afterwards to rear them in every country they conquered; whereas
- b the Gauls made it a constant maxim of theirs to wage open war against, to plunder and demolish, all such structures, from a principle bred amongst them, in common with the Perjés, that it was offering an indignity to the Supreme Being to confine him within any place; which made Cicero, who was not deeply versed in the Gaulish religion, say, that it chiefly consisted in a hostile contrariety to all others (A).
- c WE cannot affirm with the same certainty, that they did not imitate the Romans in another part of their religion, the worship of a plurality of gods and goddesses, before their conquest. We are told, that they worshipped Mars under the emblem of a naked sword, and that Mercury was in the highest veneration among them all over Gaul, doubtless on account of the vast benefits and improvements, which their trade, commerce, arts, and sciences, had received from him, and of which we have spoken in a former volume b. Here is indeed no mention of temples, altars, but only of statues reared to them; and probably that worship might, at first, be no more than a civil one, though it grew up, in time, into downright idolatry and polytheism. These two deities, as well as Uranus, Saturn, Jupiter, Apollo, Juno, Venus, Diana, &c. being all of Celtic extraction, as has been formerly shewn, it was much more natural for the Gauls to deify them, as having formerly reigned over their nation, than for the Romans and Greeks to adopt or challenge them from others as their own, and, in process of time, to strive to outvie them in those divine honours, which the rest of the world paid to them. This will, in some measure,
- d lead us to the motives of that great change, which they suffered to be made in their ancient religion, for those temples which they erected, and for those sacrifices which they offered, to all those deified monarchs, till at length they sunk down into the same absurd notions concerning them with the rest of the idolatrous world; and the notion of Esus, or supreme Deity, was swallowed up into that of a Jupiter, as it had been every-where else; and this might reach no farther neither than the vulgar, whilst the druids and wise men among the Gauls, as well as the philosophers among the Greeks and Romans, still preserved the notion of one Supreme Being, and either pitied, or perhaps laughed and winked at, the rest of the pretended deities, heathen theology, and foolish superstition.
- e BUT neither is this account altogether satisfactory, considering the aversion and contempt which the Gauls had of all other religions; and this extraordinary change will perhaps be better accounted for, if we can shew, with any probability, that they

(A) Whether it was his ignorance or contempt of their principles, or done out of a design to make his client's cause appear more justifiable (1), he expresses himself in these virulent terms against the Gauls, that they professed no other religion than that of waging war against those or all other nations, and against the very gods themselves. He accuses them of having left their native soil, and crossed immense tracts of land, merely to go and attack the Delphic Apollo, and plunder the oracle of the whole world. This, continues he, is that holy nation, which had the boldness to besiege our capitol, and even the great Jupiter himself in it.

We shall have occasion, in the sequel of this history, to explode the greatest part of this charge, for which that orator so foully inveighs against them. A.] that we shall observe here is, that they had, at that time, neither regard for the pretended gods of other nations, nor for the pretended sanctity of their temples, but rather a singular contempt for the one, and abhorrence of the other; and this shews, that they had not as yet adopted any of the Greek or Roman rites into their religion, whatever they did afterwards.

One thing may be observed, that the general character, which the authors of both these nations give of the Gauls, is a continued contradiction, one while representing them as people of no religion or principles, and at other times as the most addicted to all kind of superstition of any nation under heaven: all which can be only reconciled by allowing, that they actually had a religion of their own, of which they were so tenacious, that they despised all others for the sake of it.

were rather forced to it by those, under whose tyranny they came afterwards to a groan, than out of any vain imitation of their neighbours, or affectation of respect for their deceased princes and heroes. It is not to be doubted, but to such a brave and warlike nation as the Gauls, among whom one constant maxim was universally followed, as we shall see in the sequel, to prefer the worst of deaths to the loss of liberty, the Roman yoke must appear intolerable; and that they could not be expected to submit to it longer than they were forced to it by the superior power of their tyrants; and as these made it their constant practice to introduce, either by fair or foul means, their religion, laws, and customs, where-ever they conquered, the druids, tenacious as they were of their own, could not but be extremely averse to all such changes, and use all their power and authority, which was still very great, and almost uncontrollable (B), either to oppose them, or to prevail on the people to shake off the yoke. This their history will shew they did upon all favourable opportunities that offered; so that there was a kind of necessity for the Romans to find out some plausible pretence to strip them of their great sway, and force them to a blind and thorough submission. Accordingly we find, that several emperors took an effectual method to suppress the druidish power (C), by issuing out some severe edicts against their bloody custom of offering human sacrifices. Augustus was the first who issued out a decree against them, and at the same time introduced a census among the Gauls; upon which the whole nation was just ready for a revolt. But by the address and authority of Drusus, who was left there by him, they were not only prevented from rising, but prevailed upon to assist at the dedication of Julius Caesar's temple, and to build an altar to Augustus ^c. However, it is plain, that the edict of the latter was not executed there, and the druids, by this time in less authority with the people, might buy it off, by rearing the above-mentioned altar to him; and this is the reason why Claudius renewed it against them. But, whatever the pretence of those edicts might be, it is scarce credible, that religion had any hand in them; and they might as well have fallen foul upon all other nations under their empire, nay, and upon their own, since none was exempt from this barbarous custom, much less the Romans, as the reader may infer from what we have said in their history, and elsewhere ^d. However that be, it doth not appear, that even these took any more effect against them

(B) It plainly appears, that this high power of theirs, except what related to religion, was not of very antient date; and that they raised themselves to it in process of time, by the help of the people's superstition. Antiently the women seem to have had a greater sway in all civil matters, and even about making peace and war. This privilege they had even before their first expedition into Italy; and it appears that they held it still, when Hannibal passed through Gaul to cross the Alps; for, in the treaty they made with him, it was agreed, that, if a Gaul offered any injury to a Carthaginian, he should be tried before the court of the Gaulish women (1). The reason of this great sway is variously accounted for: some think, that they were looked upon as inspired; others think, it was owing to their having shewn a superior degree of wisdom in quenching a civil war, which the men had kindled among themselves. The Germans, according to Tacitus (3), allowed them the very same privileges; and we find something like this practised by the Eliahs, who, having in vain sued for satisfaction from Demophon tyrant of Pisa, agreed with the Pisani, after his death, to submit their difference to a court of sixteen women, to be chosen out of sixteen cities of the Eliahs. Our author adds (4), that their decision so pleased both parties, that they appointed a perpetual college of sixteen matrons to preside over the Junonian games, and to assign the prize to whom they thought worthiest of it.

However, with respect to the Gaulish women, though we cannot ascertain the time when they lost this their authority, yet it is plain, by what Caesar says of that extensive one (5), which the druids had in his time, that they had found means to strip those female heroines of theirs.

(C) We are told by three Roman authors, that Claudius did quite abolish this sect, and their inhuman superstition (6). The last quoted calls him indeed Tiberius, from which some have ascribed this edict to the emperor of that name, though wrongfully; for he only calls Claudius by his prenomens, Claudius being called Tiberius Claudius Nero Drusus; and it doth not appear, that the other Tiberius made any such edict against that custom, but only against astrologers, whom he banished from Rome (7). And here we beg leave to rectify a mistake, which inadvertently slid into our Carthaginian history (8), where we said, that the emperor Tiberius punished the African priests for their practice of these human sacrifices; whereas it should have been said, Tiberius the proconsul of Africa under the emperor Adrian; for it appears by Tertullian's account of it, that his own father was a centurion under him (9); which can by no means agree with the rank, nor with the times of the emperor of that name. We hope our readers will be candid enough to overlook such oversights in a work of this extensive nature, especially when they find how ready we are to acknowledge and rectify them, as soon as we have discovered them.

a than that of Augustus, since we find them still not only in high vogue some centuries after, but even authorized by the emperors Severus, Aurelian, and Dioclesian. They subsisted still, even down to the times of Solinus Polybistor, and of *Eusebius of Casarea, and much longer still in their chief abode in the province of Chartrain, where whole towns continued in their ancient paganism, even down to the fifth century†. Neither did those edicts suppress the practice of human victims amongst the Romans themselves, among whom they continued to the time of Constantine the Great, and even down to that of Gratian, who gave the finishing blow to it‡.

How and when introduced.

From all this it appears very probable, that these edicts against the druids, and their bloody rites, were not so much issued out to abolish their sect and religion, as b to intimidate them, and suppress their exorbitant power, which, somewhat before this time, was grown to such a height, that they over-ruled in all courts and councils, raised whom they liked to the highest dignities, and even to the crown, and often aspired at and obtained it for some of their own order. They directed in the making of peace and war, and, even after they were conquered by the Romans, could stir up the people to a general revolt; and so jealous were they grown of their usurped authority, that they punished, as we have hinted a little higher, all that disobeyed or disputed their commands with excommunication, and even with death. Nothing could therefore be more suitable to the Roman policy, than to use all possible means to suppress and crush so dangerous a set of men; and since religion was the c common pretext to all their exorbitant sway, so that there was no possibility of pulling down the one, without abolishing the other, it was natural for their conquerors to use all their power and address to bring about such a thorough change, and introduce their religion amongst them; and there might not perhaps be a more favourable opportunity than that which this period offered them, when the Gaulish nation, groaning under a double, and, we may add, a divided tyranny, that of their conquerors, and that of their druids, would, in all likelihood, think it no small ease to be rid at least of one of their yokes, and that perhaps which, at that time, seemed the most intolerable of the two; for it must be remembered, that the Romans seldom made use of force, when they could gain their ends by cajoling and flattery, by fair d promises, or even bribes and rewards; whereas the druids, if we may believe the Roman authors, bore all down with an arbitrary and uncontrouled sway, till being overpowered by their enemies, and forsaken by their own people, they were at length forced to submit to, and exchange their religion and rites for, those of their conquerors.

This at least appears, by several concurring circumstances, to have happened about the time of these edicts; for, in Cæsar's time, who left the Gauls to the free enjoyment of their rites, and even of many of their laws and customs, there was not as yet any temple built, or any place of worship, but their oaks and groves. In the very next reign, we find the Lugdunenses building a stately temple to that conqueror, and an altar to Augustus, then on the throne, and a professed enemy to the druids and their religion. Under his successor Tiberius, their chief deity Efus is transformed into Jupiter the god of heaven and earth, or rather, as it should seem, divides his worship with him for a while (D). Both are worshipped at first in groves, and under oaks; and at length the former is quite swallowed up in the latter, and temples,

Gaul at length over-run with them.

(D) This is inferred from some ancient bas-reliefs found in the great church of Paris, in which both these deities are carved one close to the other, the inscription of which is indeed to Jupiter; but the ceremony of the oakly mistletoe, with the words Senani veilô, shews, that Efus was looked upon still as the chief godhead there represented.

We would not rely too much upon these dark and enigmatic monuments, which every antiquary wrests according to his own favourite hypothesis. Sure it is, that, in the time of Maximus Tyriensis, who lived about an hundred years after Tiberius, Efus was already transformed into Jupiter, and worshipped under the type of a large oak (9). The author of the life of St. Boniface, bishop of Mentz, tells us, that that prelate found no better expedient to bring his people from their old superstition to christianity, than by cutting down an oak of a very large size, called the oak of Jove, and the strength of Jove (10). The same is said to have been done, with like success, by still later preachers (11). So long did this veneration for those trees continue, as one may say, in the heart of christianity. We may add, that the name of Jupiter doth not appear to have been adopted by the Gauls, but only that of Jove, which we have already shewn is of Celtic original (12).

altars, and statues, are erected to him after the Roman manner over all the conquered ^a parts of Gaul. After a few reigns more, during which they were still greatly oppressed, and made several vain attempts to regain their liberty, especially under Caligula and Claudius ^b, who succeeded Tiberius, the whole country is filled with Roman temples, all their deities adopted and worshipped, and scarce any traces left of their antient religion, but their bloody rites of offering human victims to these new deities, and perhaps also in their auguries; which occasioned the above-mentioned decrees against them. To these we may add the great veneration which they still retained for their oaks, notwithstanding their multiplicity of temples, and which continued, according to some authors, till the twelfth and thirteenth century. One of these was dedicated to an hundred deities, as appears by the inscription engraven on a ^b neighbouring column, which the reader will find in the margin (E). However, the sluice thus broken, an inundation of superstition and idolatry ensued, which nothing could resist; and the Gauls, having once shaken off the yoke of their druids, became so enamoured with the pageantry of polytheism, that they deified at length lakes, rivers, marshes, and even fountains, to all which they ascribed some peculiar deity, and extraordinary virtues; upon which account it was looked upon as the highest sacrilege to fish in them, to draw or drain them, and especially to lay hands on any treasures that were committed to their care and protection (F). To all these changes the druids found themselves obliged to submit, to avoid the penalties of those edicts; ^c and so compliant did they shew themselves, that, from that time, whether to shew their complaisance to the Romans, or to take off the odium which their name laid them under, they exchanged it for that of Senani, which, in their language, signified the same as elder or venerable with us. From hence we may date their downfall, though not their total abolition till some ages after; for, being once reduced to such a low ebb of authority, or rather being once stripped of it, and become such servile creatures to their new and potent masters, it is not to be supposed, that these would ever suffer them to recover it again, but, if they still permitted them to make a gain of religion, it should be only in the worship and rites of those new deities, which they had now adopted. This was an effectual means to induce them to give into all ^d kinds of Roman and Greek superstitions, or even to outdo them in it, since it would open a new door to their interest, instead of the old one that had been stopped up. We have taken notice, in the last note, of the immense treasures, which were flung into their consecrated lakes, rivers, and afterwards into their temples; and who can imagine those druids and priests to have been as scrupulous as the stupid laity, of converting any part of it to their own uses? But this we must submit to our readers, who will be better able to judge of it, if we subjoin here some few more instances of this kind of superstition; for it were endless to mention them all, they were grown to such number and variety.

(E) This oak being afterwards cut down by St. Severus, the inscription engraven was to preserve the memory of it; ARBOREM DIVUS SEVERUS EVERTIT CENTUM DEORUM. Our author adds, that, in rooting it up, they found a head full of gold and silver, which was laid out by that saint in the building of a church since dedicated to him, as appears by the epitaph upon his tomb (13).

(F) Of these lakes, fountains, &c. some were dedicated to one deity, some to another. Tacitus pretends to give us the reason why the Gauls deified them, because, says he, they were nearer heaven, and consequently nearer the ear of those deities, to whom they pray from thence (14). This is a very foolish one; and it is more reasonable to suppose, that they fancied those deities to be more immediately present there. However, such regard they had for them, that the same author tells us, that the Hermonduri and Catti waged a bloody war against each other for the property of one of these fountains, which was a salt one; and that the former

at length gained their point against the latter, by a vow which they made to sacrifice their enemies, and all their spoil, to Mars and Mercury; which was accordingly done: the Catti were all massacred without mercy, together with their horses, cattle, and all their spoil, and flung into the lake (15).

However, unless it be upon such bloody devotions, we do not find, that they offered any victims to them; but abundance of gold, silver, rich cloths, and other costly things, they flung into them, which it was sacrilege to touch. We have spoken of the famous lake of Tholouse dedicated to Apollo, whose treasures, especially in gold and silver ingots, and massy utensils, amounted to immense sums, and was continually increased by such offerings (16). In time these places became so liable to be plundered by foreign nations, as well as perhaps by their neighbours, that they began to repolit those sacred treasures in their temples, of which they had looted after a vast number, as we shall see in due time.

a ON a lake they had in some part of Gaul nearest the ocean, which received its name from two white ravens, with whitish wings, which constantly kept about it. Incredible wonders were told of it¹. Amongst others, it was much resorted to in matters of controversy between parties. Each of the contenders brought a kind of cake, and laid it at the end of the same plank, which was set afloat on the lake, to be exposed to these ravens, whose custom, it seems, was to devour one of the cakes, and to crumble and scatter the other; and this last gave the cause to its owner. Another we read of at the foot of a mountain in the neighbourhood of Savoy, dedicated to the moon, under the name of Helanus, which signifies splendor. It was resorted to by all the neighbouring people once a year, who threw into it some cloaths, linen, b fleeces of wool; others bread, cheese, wax, and the like, according as they could afford it. Here they kept a sumptuous feast, which lasted three whole days, a sufficient quantity of provisions being brought in waggons to the place. On the fourth day, we are told², when they were ready to return home, there constantly arose such storms of wind, thunder, rain, and hail, as made them afraid for their lives. We have taken notice how they used the waters of the Rhine to discover the fidelity of their wives, and the legitimacy of their issue. They seem to have had a much greater veneration for this river, than for any other. The offerings and sacrifices offered to it were of a peculiar kind: whole armies called upon it for help and victory, and the sight of it, or of any of its waters, inspired the soldiers with courage and c bravery³. Each river, fountain, lake, or pool, was looked upon as inhabited by some deity, and had some peculiar and extraordinary virtues ascribed to it, for the sake of which the credulous people resorted to them in shoals, and with proper offerings, every one according to their ability. Some others of their superstitions we shall have occasion to hint in the sequel; and these shall suffice to shew into what lengths they ran in their imitation of the Greeks and Romans, and what profit their druids, bards, &c. are like to have made of them (G).

THIS multiplicity of deities, or rather of lakes, marshes, &c. consecrated to them, did not hinder them from building temples, altars and statues to them after the Roman manner, and not only in great number, but some of them very stately, and in the d grand taste, as one may infer from some remains of them, and other monuments of that nation; but yet in these they commonly sacrificed to the gods only brute victims, and offered their vows and rich donatives in them; but, as to human sacrifices, they still offered them, it seems⁴, under their oaks, and in their groves; but whether they did it for privacy, or for fear of the Romans, and to avoid the penalty of their edicts, or still retained their antient notion of that supreme being, to whom they thought them more peculiarly to belong, is not easy to determine (H). To give our readers a specimen of these new buildings, we are told, that the statues of these gods, such as Pennin, Mercury, Diana, &c. of whom we shall speak in the sequel, were placed sometimes on a pedestal, which served likewise for an altar, sometimes e on a column of a prodigious height⁵. In some they were exposed to the open air, and in others sheltered by an edifice of polished stones in form of a cupola or cone. Their temples were no less rich and magnificent, witness that famed one called Vasso at Clermont in Auvergne, the walls of which are affirmed to have been thirty feet thick, covered, on the outside, with carved stones, and on the inside with small ones nicely wrought and polished, and on the top incrustated with marble, and compart-

(G) It may not be amiss to observe here to our readers, that this deifying of lakes, rivers, and springs, might probably be owing to some extraordinary qualities and virtues they observed in their waters, especially such as were of a hot and medicinal nature. Even lakes and rivers, though less extraordinary on any such account, might yet rise to this height of veneration, on that of their perpetual flowing, and discharging such constant streams of water, without being exhausted; of all which the druids, though well enough acquainted with the natural reason, (for they were great philosophers) might yet make a mystery with the vulgar, for their own politic ends.

(H) The former seems the most probable, because they did likewise choose to offer these victims in caves, rocks, precipices, and other desert and unrequented places, which they chose sometimes by mere chance, and as they fell in their way; at other times by their auguries and lots: all which seems to intimate, that they avoided being seen at these bloody ceremonies by any other people (17), especially the Romans, who had so strictly forbid them.

ments of Mosaic work. The pavement was likewise of marble, and the top covered with lead. A learned French antiquary mentions eight of these stately fabrics of an octagonal form, and whose eight faces were adorned with a number of Gaulish deities, generally eight in number in those which he himself observed; which made him suspect, that this combination of numbers contained some druidish mysteries, which are now quite out of our reach (I). We shall refer our readers to the two authors last quoted for a further account of those famous edifices, that we may not draw this section into an excessive length, and content ourselves with giving them a short description of one of the most curious of them in the next note (K), and figure, by which

(I) The author of the religion of the Gauls has however disproved the conjecture of that learned antiquary, by shewing (17), that this octagonal form was common among the Romans, as well as the Gauls; and that the latter had temples of different forms, some round, some oblong, some decagonal, without any apparent mystical design. The thing is not worth disputing at this distance; and it doth not appear, that the Gauls had any such regard for the number eight. They had indeed a greater one, if we may believe Pliny (18), for the number six, which was held so sacred amongst them, that they overturned the order of months, years, &c. in honour of it; but on what account they did so, doth not appear.

(K) This octagonal structure stands at Montmorillon, in the province of Poitou, and consists of two temples, one above ground, and the other under it, somewhat like our St. Faith and St. Paul, the lowest of which is much narrower than the upper, and its wall as thick again. The upper received its light from eight windows, in form of portals, under the arch of each of the eight faces; but now walled up, except that over the gate or entrance into the fabric; and another which leads to a kind of wing or portico, which projects from the fabric on the opposite side. The great overture in the centre of the roof, which resembles that in the Rotonda of Rome, gives likewise some light to the building, tho' not much, because it descends through a hole in the roof, like a cylinder, of twenty-four feet in length, and about ten in breadth. The rain, that falls thro' it, gathers itself to the centre of the pavement, which is made with a proper declension, and empties itself through another, and much lesser hole, into the lower temple, and is sucked up by the earth, this last having neither sink nor pavement.

The wing, at one of the sides of the octagon, is equal to it, that is, eighteen feet in breadth without and within. That, which leads into the lower, is much narrower than that which leads into the upper building; and at the end of the former is a stair-case, that leads up to the latter. This place appears to be of the same age and structure as the octagon, and has, on the top, a kind of square tower of about the same height with the roof of the inner temple; but whether it had a bell in it, as some think, who imagine it to have been since turned into a church, is not easy to determine. This advanced building seems to have served for a kind of vestry to the priests and druids. Just over-against this, across the temple, is the gate that leads into it; and on the one side of it, in the subterranean temple, begins a covert way above six feet broad, and about six hundred in length, which leads to the neighbouring river, to which, it is supposed, the druids went to wash themselves, and their victims, whenever they performed the priestly function.

Over the gate of the temple were eight human figures, coarsely carved, supposed to have been so many Gaulish deities. Of these six are of the male kind, three in a group or nich, and the two others, one at each end, are females. The former are differently dressed. Those that face you, and stand farthest out, have a kind of antique mantle; the others have on a kind of tunic. One has a long gown quite down to his feet, and open from top to bottom, and all of them are girdled up. In one groupe the figure that faces you is shod, and the other two on each side are barefooted. In the other group, that which faces you is unshod, and the other two shod. In the one they appear old men, with long beards; in the other, all young and beardless, so that in the first there are two old men unshod, and one shod; and in the other two young men shod, and one unshod. This odd contrast was not, doubtless, without some mysterious meaning.

Of the two women, which stand one at each end, the one had a long head of hair plaited hanging on each side before her, and is dressed somewhat in the modern form, that is, in a kind of stiff-bodied gown. She holds her hands on her sides, and hath a kind of mittens which cover about one-half-way her arms. That, which stands on the opposite side, is quite naked, and hath two serpents twisted one round each leg, and both, twining between her thighs, rear their heads up to her breasts, as if they were sucking at them, whilst she holds them by her hands, as it were, close to the sides of her belly. From this combination of eight figures over the gate of an octagonal temple, our learned author infers, that that number was looked upon by the Gauls as sacred to the gods, as we hinted a little higher.

The intabature over it was not without its ornaments, which chiefly consisted of a great variety of heads oddly variegated, the meaning of which, if it was done with any, is not easy to guess. As to the figures themselves, this is the conjecture of our author, for the proofs of which we shall refer our readers to the place quoted in the margin (19): The naked woman, with two serpents, he supposes to have represented the moon, to whom therefore he concludes the temple to have been dedicated. The three old men he takes to have been three druids, and the three young men to have been their disciples, and the number six to have been designed to signify the sacredness in which it was held by the Gauls, it being on the sixth day of the moon that they performed their grand ceremony of gathering the mistletoe, as we have already hinted. The serpents, sucking at her breasts, may signify properly enough the virtue, which that planet imparted, not only to that plant, but to all other vegetables, as the snakes are said to renew their age with their skins. As for the other woman, he supposes her to have been designed for Venus, because such a kind of figure had been dug up at Chalons, with her tresses plaited somewhat like this. If so, we would rather suppose the three young men, which stand next to her,

- a which they may frame an idea of the Gaulish taste in architecture. All that we shall add here is, that, by the multitude of niches that appear in some of them, they seem to have had a vast number of statues in them, which are since mostly demolished, upon their conversion to christianity; and some of them, since dug up out of their ruins, are so sadly broken and mangled, that it is hard to guess, whether they were Gaulish deities, or statues of any other kind. Our two authors differ in their judgment about them; but, since the Gauls were grown so fond of multiplying their deities, as to dedicate one oak to an hundred of them, as we lately hinted, why may we not believe with Monfaucon, that they might shew the same fondness for multiplying their idols in those temples, in imitation of the Romans? A great many of these edifices have been preserved here, as they were in other countries, upon the planting of christianity, by being converted into churches, though a much greater number were then demolished, of which there are still some fragments remaining, and may be seen more particularly described in the authors above quoted.

- We are now come to speak of the gods that were afterwards adopted and worshipped by the Gauls. We have already seen, how their antient Efus came to be changed into Jupiter, at first indeed under the symbol of an oak, and even of a shapeless stump of a tree. But at length, as they gave wholly into the Roman superstition, they came to erect altars and statues to him, and to represent him after the Roman manner: thus in some antient statues and bas-reliefs he is carved with a lance in one hand, and a thunderbolt in the other, and with his arms and bosom bare; his head is sometimes surrounded with a radial crown; his name of Jupiter is never met in any of his inscriptions, but only that of Jou, or Jovis, which, being of Celtic extract, was designedly retained by them, instead of the Roman. He is likewise surnamed Taran, which, in the same tongue, signifies thunderer: we would not, however, pretend to affirm, that this last name is the Taramis, or Taranis, of Lucan, or that the Gauls did not give it to any other god but the great Jupiter: but we may be well assured, that that of Jovis was peculiar to him, and has been preserved not only by the antient Gauls and Welsh, but is still retained by the French in many of their compound words (L). In that part of Gaul nearer the Alps he was called Peninus, and those high mountains Penina, from the old Celtic word Pen, which signifies a head, a height, a summit (M). He was represented as a young man naked, on a column reared to him on the top of mount St. Bernard the Less, by L. Lucilius, and is styled Optimus Maximus; whence it is concluded, that he was the same with the Gaulish Jovis. What seems to confirm this beyond all question, is, that the column on which it stood is indifferently called the column of Jove and of Peninus; and the carbuncle that was placed on it, the eye of Jove, and the eye of Peninus; but, since by the eye of Jupiter was meant the sun from all antiquity, and the carbuncle was a very proper emblem of this last deity, why may we not as well suppose this statue, naked and youthful as it was, to have been dedicated to it rather than to Jupiter? However that be, as this last succeeded their great Efus, they paid much the same worship to him, and, in particular, offered human victims to

to have been designed for her priests. But if the naked one, suckling two serpents, signifies the new moon, may not the other, which is dressed in a close-bodied gown reaching up to her neck, have been designed to express the old one, and to signify, that, after she is past the full, she ceases to communicate her influence? for the druids, being well versed, for those times, in astronomy, as we shall see in the sequel, and much addicted to astrology, it was natural for them to think, that as the increase of that planet did daily approximate her virtue to the earth, so her decrease did divert and elongate it from it. But whither are we running with our conjectures?

(L) Particularly in those that follow Joudy or Joudy, Thursday, or day of Jove; Joumont, Joubarb, the mount of Jove, a mountain so called by the Romans, and the beard of Jove, an herb so called, from its resemblance to it; and many more of the like nature. As for that of Taran, which is still kept in many words which express any loud and tearful noise, and from which we take the Greek ταραχή and ταράττω to be derived, it is not unlikely, that it may have been also given to Mars, on account of the thundering noise which the Gauls made upon their shields, when they invoked him, either before an onset, or after a victory.

(M) This deity is called Apenina by Cato the elder, who derives it from Apis, the first king of Italy, with whom, according to him, ended the golden age (20). Servius (21) calls her Penina. But the figure and inscription which Guichenon has given us of it, shew it to have been erected to a male deity. The inscription is, LVCIVS LVCILIVS DEO PENINO OPTIMO MAXIMO DONVM DEDIT. The column was of marble, and about fourteen feet high.

him, as the Romans did to their Jupiter Latialis; some instances of which we have a given in the last section of this chapter, and in a former volume ^m.

Mars.

THEIR next deity was Mars, whom they esteemed as the chief protector of the Gaulish nation. Their invincible warlike temper inspired them with such a veneration for, and confidence in him (N), that whenever they went to war, they made him heir of all their possessions, and about the time of the onset they vowed to him all the plunder ^a. If they came off with victory, they frequently sacrificed their prisoners, as well as their cattle, to him, and hung the heads of their slain enemies about the necks of their horses, in token of their valour. They even inclosed some of the most considerable ones in frames of cedar, and, upon proper occasions, shewed them to strangers, and at no rate could be prevailed upon to part with them ^b. Another barbarous custom they are justly branded with, of poisoning their arrows with a juice, which they extracted from a tree not unlike our fig-tree, but of a quite deadly quality ^p. In times of sickness, or imminent danger, they immediately sacrificed some human victims to Mars, or vowed to do it, as soon as they had it in their power; and performed it accordingly. It was even common with them, in pressing dangers, to vow all their enemies to that deity, and to massacre them, as we have formerly hinted, without mercy or distinction. We have already taken notice, that he was formerly worshipped under the emblem of a naked sword, and under the name of Mars or Mavors, or Maur-ruis, which signifies warlike or powerful. Since then, we find him represented in the habit of a Roman warrior, with a spear in one hand, c and a shield in the other, and with the surname of Camulus (O). We are told, that the Accitani of Spain, or the inhabitants of Cadiz, a Gaulish colony, represented him surrounded with rays of light, because, says our author ^q, the boiling of the blood, and flow of animal spirits, which are the cause of a martial temper, were produced by the heat of the sun. The variety of inscriptions, that have been dug up by the curious, shews him to have been in the highest esteem. We took notice formerly, that all the treasures and plunder, that were vowed to him, were laid up in heaps in the next convenient place in the open fields, and were looked upon as so sacred, that no Gaul dared to meddle with them. Some stones have been found, with eight or nine human heads buried under them, which, by the inscription, appear to have d

(N) Julian the apostate, among his many other chimerical notions, attributed all the bravery and success of the Gauls to the influence which the providence of the Creator of all things had endued that deity with, when he put them under his protection (12). But it is far more reasonable to think, that their natural bravery, joined to their hatred of the all-conquering and enslaving Romans, directed them to the choice of that deity for their protector, and which they antiently worshipped, not as a god, but as one of the attributes of the Supreme Deity, which squared most with their warlike temper, as we have had occasion to hint in a former note (23).

(O) This appears from two inscriptions which Gruter has given us, the one on a bas-relief, with figures of five gods, viz. Arduinna, Camulus, Jove, Mercury, and Hercules; all which have their names engraven over their heads. The inscription underneath shews it to have been dedicated to them by one Quartinius, who is there styled Civis Sabinus Remus; from which that great critic, not observing, that the last word shews him to have been a citizen of Rheims, mistook those deities to be of Sabinian extract, and Camulus to be the same as Camillus (24), one of the names which the Sabines gave to Mercury.

But there is another inscription, of older date by an hundred years, which shews, that the Rhemenses in Gaul worshipped Mars under that title. It runs thus: MARTI CAMULO OB SALUTEM TIBERI CLAUDI

CÆS. CIVIS. REMI TEMPLVM CONSTITVERVNT (25). Hence it is plain, that if Camulus was known in that part of Italy, it was by means of this Quartinius, a Rhemish citizen, who dedicated this inscription there to him, under the reign of Antoninus; whereas that city appears, by the second inscription, to have dedicated their temple in that of Claudius: so that, upon the whole, all these five deities here appear to have been Gaulish, not only by their names, which are of Celtic extract, but from the resemblance of their dress, attitudes, &c. with those that have been found among the antient monuments of Gaul, especially in the great cathedral of Paris (26).

As for the etymon of Camulus, it is not easily decyphered. It may be derived from the Celtic camp, a field of battle; from campa, to fight, and ulvu, a fire, blaze; whence perhaps the Greek cammonia, by which they called the victory gained in single combat. It may perhaps also come from the cam or chans, or songs, which the Gauls used when they went to fight. But we have had frequent occasion to observe throughout this work, that there is nothing more uncertain, and apt to mislead men, than strained etymologies. Besides, the Gauls having received, as we have seen, their polytheism from the Romans, it were unreasonable to expect, that names and surnames of those deities should all be of Gaulish extract. As for Arduinna, her dress, as well as name, shews her to have been Diana, who was worshipped in Gaul, as well as in Greece and Rome.

a been dedicated to him, and these heads to have belonged to those human victims, which they were accustomed to vow to him in times of peril and sickness. In some of these inscriptions he is called plainly Mars; in others he has the title of Segemon; in others Vincius or Britovius, the meaning of which names is not very clear. The reader may see the most probable conjectures about them in the next note (P).

Apollo was another of their deities, and in as great veneration, on account of his being the god of physic, as Mars was for being the god of war. The druids, who were as famed quacks as priests, failed not to celebrate him, as the implanter of all the virtues that they attributed to their materia medica, which chiefly consisted in vegetables, accompanied with a great deal of superstitious trash, which they used in the gathering, preparing, and administering (Q). The Aquileians and Telosagi chose him for their patron and protector. The latter, who occupied a vast territory about Tbolesia, had a very rich and magnificent temple dedicated to him in that city, which was their metropolis. This is supposed to be the same that is mentioned by an ancient author^r, on account of Constantine's repairing thither, to give thanks for his late success (R), and the extraordinary presents he made to it; upon which occasion that author styles it the finest temple of Apollo that was then in the world. The building was a decagon, in which there was a vast number of niches and statues, and, among the rest, that of Apollo, represented as a lively youth; upon which account, the panegyrist compliments that monarch with joining to the youthfulness of the god, the grandeur of an emperor. Some words he adds, which seem to imply, as if the oracle of the god had justly promised him the empire of the world; from which one might be induced to believe, that there had been, likewise, an oracle of that god there, in imitation of that of Delphos; and that Constantine had been consulting it. But we would not lay too great stress on the sworn expressions of a panegyrist. However that be, as Apollo was the same deity with the sun, the Gauls worshipped him under several names, and different forms. He is sometimes called Apollo, Belenus, and Abellion, which signify fair; sometimes by the Persic name of Mithras; sometimes that of Peninus, of which we have spoken under that of Jupiter; and at other times Dolicbenus. We shall not trouble ourselves with diving for fresh etymons d of all those names, which may, perhaps, have risen from the places where he was

(P) That of Segemon appears to be Celtic, and signifies rich, or making rich. Hence the Segones, who inhabited the most fruitful part of Gaul, and were reckoned the most opulent, are thought to have had their name. That of Vincius seems to have been given him on account of his stately temple at Vincia, now Vence, in Provence; and, in all likelihood, that of Britovius from some other city, where he was more particularly worshipped; perhaps that of Britannium, in Galicia, which was a colony of the Gauls, and became afterwards an episcopal see, but is now destroyed (16).

(Q) We have already given some hints of this, in speaking of their misleto, and their time and method of gathering it. It were needless, as well as tedious, to follow them through all their other superstitious quackeries; but one instance we cannot omit, because it shews not only the stupidity of them, but likewise their fondness for them; since this last continued in vogue, it seems, till the eleventh century.

They had an herb dedicated to Apollo, or Belenus, which they called, from him, Belinuncia, and the Romans Apollinari; and is supposed to have been a kind of henbane. The Spaniards and Hungarians retain still the former of these names, the one calling it Yelene, and the others Belend. With the juice of this herb they poisoned their darts, when they went a stag-hunting; and could poison the creature with a slight wound, and esteemed the flesh the more tender and luscious for it. Amongst other ridiculous uses they made of this plant, the following is remarkable, as well for its oddity, as long continuance.

Whenever the country laboured under a great drought, the women assembled themselves, and chose from amongst them a young virgin, to be the leader of the dance. She stripped herself naked, and went at the head of the rest, in search of this herb, which they then called Balija: When she had found it, she plucked it up by the roots, with the little finger of her right hand, and tied it to a string, the other end of which was fastened to the little toe of her right foot. Her company did then cut off each some boughs, and carried them in their hands after her, whilst she dragged the plant after her, towards the next river, where she plunged it in the water: the rest dipped, likewise, their boughs, and sprinkled her with it. When this ceremony was over, they all returned to the place whence they set out, but took care to make the young virgin walk backwards all the way (17).

(R) Constantine had, it seems, just taken the city of Marsoilles, and in it Hercules his father-in-law, who had sworn his ruin; so that he was now enabled to resume the purple which he had been forced to quit. And this being before his conversion, he went to pay his acknowledgment to Apollo, at this stately temple, which, upon many accounts, is supposed to have been that of Thouluse.

The same panegyrist tells us, that there was another temple of that god at Autun, where there was likewise a spring of hot waters, which were used for the punishment of perjury, and which, though they sent up a continual smoke, had neither ill taste or smell, but were both pleasant and wholesome.

more particularly worshipped, or from other circumstances not now to be come at. ^a He was generally represented youthful, naked, with a radiant crown, or golden tresses^c. In some antient bustoes found of him, as well as in some antient coins, he is represented with a pole, or ring (S), and a link of a chain fastened to his scull, by which he was, it is supposed, suspended to the roof, in imitation of the sun, whom they fancied to be suspended by a golden chain^a. But, after all, might not such hanging figures of that deity have been the effects of some vows which the Gauls, and others, used to make to the deity in time of sickness; and who, upon their recovery, hung up the promised figure in his temple, without any regard to the ridiculous notion above-mentioned? One head of his was dug up at the castle of Po-lignac, which place is supposed to have been so called from Apollo, and is still there to be seen against the wall that surrounds it. It is but ill carved, on a bluish stone, between four and five feet in height and breadth, and is surrounded, all over, with rays, which, when the sun shines upon it, cast a kind of golden or fiery lustre, and shew that those rays had been formerly gilt. What is remarkable in this antique, is, that he is carved with his mouth wide open; from which it is concluded, to be here represented as delivering his answer^w. And, truly, the druids were, by this time, become such zealous mimics of the Greeks and Romans, that we need not doubt but they had some one or more of these oracles among them, though we could not find any other footsteps of it. There is an inscription, in this temple, of Po-lignac, out of which the head above-mentioned had been taken, which the antiquary ^c above quoted judges to have been put up by the emperor Claudius, who was of Lions, and consequently had lived in the neighbourhood of this castle, and had been there, perhaps, either to consult the oracle, or, more probably, to pray to that god for the recovery of his health, as he was a very sickly prince when he caused his name and titles to be set up there. For Cæsar tells us, that even in his time the Gauls looked upon Apollo as the god of phyic^x; and another author adds^y, that the sick persons that addressed themselves to him for health, used to send thither that part of their body where the ailment was, carved out in wood, or cast in brass. At Marseilles was found a statue like that of a Roman warrior, armed cap-à-pé, about eleven or twelve feet high, and standing on the crupper of a bull, between the belly ^d of which, and the pedestal on which it stands, is carved an eagle, as it were, sitting squat; and on the pedestal an inscription, importing, that Octavius Paternus had dedicated it to the god Dolichenus. The bull and the eagle has made some antiquaries suppose that deity to have been Jupiter; but another author, often quoted in this section, has given some convincing proofs that it was Apollo: we shall refer the curious, for those proofs, to the book itself^z, to prevent running into too great a length. All that needs to be added, with respect to this antique, is, that the name, which is a Greek one, and signifies, according to some, a hippodrome, according to others, the posts that directed the races, seems to intimate, that Apollo was looked upon by the Gauls to preside over those exercises. ^e

Mercury. BUT the deity in greatest veneration among the Gauls, was Mercury. We have already given some reasons for it in the Celtic history¹. Other deities had particular cities and provinces where they were more particularly worshipped; but this, after he was adopted as the god not only of trade and commerce, of which he was anciently esteemed the author, and chief promoter, in Gaul, but likewise of arts and sciences, of the highways and travellers, of pregnant women, and even of thieves and

(S) To understand what the antients meant by these kinds of poles, we must have recourse to Diodorus Siculus, who is the only one that has given us any light in it, and who, speaking of Alexander's funeral procession from Babylon to Alexandria, tells us, that in the canopy which was over the cars, or horse, there was a pole so nicely wrought, that neither the roughness of the roads, nor the jolting of the wheels, could move it (18). Hence his interpreters have concluded this pole to have been a kind of hinge, or ring, to which a certain number of springs were fastened, which kept the whole machine tight, and immovable (19). And hence it is supposed to have been called a pole, from the number of chains and springs which centred in it, to keep the hanging statue steady. But whether they have hit the point, we will not affirm.

a robbers, statues, altars, and temples, were erected to him every-where throughout this country. He is called, by several ancient authors, Tbeutat, and Tbeutates^b, the signification of which name we have given, as well as that of Mercury, in the volume above quoted; and we need not doubt but they both meant the same deity, or that he was worshipped under both by the Gauls, since both are of Celtic extract, and expressive of the excellent notion they had of him, upon both accounts (T). That of Tbeutat signifying the father of his people, they acknowledged him under that name, at first, as their founder; and afterwards boasted themselves to be sprung from him (V), in imitation of the Thracian kings, who were another branch of the ancient Celts. Mercury was with them the god of riches^c; no man could attain to them without his help: and hence he came to be confounded with Pluto, and to share in his honours and attributes; or, if we may be allowed to guess nearer to the truth, Mercury, being dead, became Pluto; the god of riches, and of the lower regions; and hence both Gauls and Thracians claimed their descent from these two deities, after they had, by length of time, split them into two, in imitation of their neighbours. Some inscriptions shew, that not only Mercury, but even Venus and Mars,

(T) To these two names, and those we mentioned in a former volume, we must add that of Ognius, mentioned by Lucan, and which, though that author gives to Hercules, by mistake; yet, in all appearance, belonged to Mercury. The description he gives of him, as he saw it in Gaul, being somewhat curious, though the humour of it be somewhat exaggerated, we shall give our English readers the substance of it.

"The Gauls, says he, call Hercules Ognius, and represent him as a decrepit old man, bald, wrinkled, and weather-beaten, like some old sailor. One would sooner take him for old Charon, or any one else, than for Hercules. But if one considers him with his lion's skin, the bow and quiver in his left, and the club in his right hand, he looks quite like a Hercules. What is most curious, is, that the good old man binds a multitude of people tied to him by the ears; the chains are of gold and amber, and, though very fine and slight, not one of them seems to strive to break them, or even unwilling to follow him. On the contrary, they seem so pleased, and the chains so loose, that there appears a visible eagerness in them to keep close to him. His hands being both full, the painter has represented those chains as fastened to a hole bored through Ognius's tongue, whilst he looks back smiling on his followers."

Lucan, having expressed his surprize at the oddness of the picture, introduces a Gaul accounting to him for it, in words to this effect: "You will cease to be surprized at it, when I tell you, that we Gauls make Hercules the god of eloquence, contrary to the Greeks, which give that honour to Mercury, who is so far inferior to him in strength. We represent him as an old man, because eloquence never shews itself so lively and strong as in the mouth of old people. The relation which the ear hath to the tongue, justifies the picture of the old man, who holds so many people fast by his tongue; neither do we think it any affront to Hercules, to paint him with his tongue bored; since, to tell you all in one word, it was that which made him succeed in every thing; and that it was by his wisdom that he subdued all hearts unto him." Thus far Lucan: and it is not easy to guess whether he was imposed upon by his Gaul, or whether he himself introduces this story as a burlesque upon the Gaulish nation, who depended so far on their strength and bravery, whilst they as much valued themselves upon their eloquence, as if they had excelled the world in it; and so expose them for their veneration for Hercules; rather than Mercury. It is plain, however, that these slight and brittle chains, which held so many pleased captives fast by the ear to the tongue of the god, could not belong to Hercules, in any case, but to Mercury, the god of eloquence; and are, accordingly, attributed to him by the generality of ancient mythologists. On the other hand, the club, the quiver, &c. were indifferently given to Mercury, to whom, we are told, Hercules consecrated them, after some successful fight against the giants (30). Accordingly, we read, that the emperor Commodus, who affected to appear at public shews in the habit of Mercury, used to wear the caduceus in his hand, whilst his officers carried the club, lion's skin, &c. before him. And in giving these to that god, the meaning was plainly this, that where-ever wisdom and eloquence were, there could be neither strength nor courage wanting; because the former was ever able either to procure, or, at the worst, to supply the want of the latter.

Many other reasons might be assigned to prove, that this picture of Ognius represented a Mercury, and not an Hercules; however Lucan came to give it to the latter (31), wherein he has been followed by the multitude of antiquaries. As for us, we think it unnecessary to dwell longer upon it, in a work of this nature; and those who rather chuse to follow that author, have a Hercules here as worshipped by the Gauls, under the name of Ognius, or, rather, as joined into one with Mercury by them, as he was antiently by the Egyptians, and other nations. But it is plain Lucan had no mind to admit the latter amongst the Gaulish gods, when he makes him tell Jupiter, that he doth not know which way to summon these to the assembly; because, as he was a stranger to their language, he could neither understand them, nor be understood by them (32).

(V) We are told, that the famed Pythagoras, having passed over into Gaul, to learn the mysteries of the druids, was so taken with this notion of theirs, that he boasted the same descent, and that god had promised to grant him whatever favour he should ask; except that of being made immortal (33).

were reckoned among the infernal gods (W). As he was worshipped as their progenitor, he is often joined, in those statues and inscriptions erected to him, with the goddess Proserpina, to assist women in labour. This goddess has much puzzled all mythologists, and may be only an epithet of Proserpine, whom, Strabo says, they worshipped as their mother (X); or, perhaps, of Diana, who had the same office. According to all these distinctions, one may reckon three Gaulish Mercuries, or rather the same god worshipped under three different titles, and represented in three different forms.

As the god of eloquence, he was represented in the manner we have described him from Lucan, in a late note, as an old man, with his bow, quiver, club, and lion's skin, holding a willing multitude chained to his tongue by their ears. As the god of b merchants and travellers, he was represented naked, and without sex and beard, and with his winged cap, his caduceus, &c. He is under this head, likewise, represented with a purse in one hand, and sometimes with a cornucopia in the other, and with wings on his heels, as the messenger of the gods. In some statues he has a crescent, over the wings of his cap, and was often joined with the moon in the Gaulish worship; and that, probably, upon these two accounts: First, as the one was the dispenser of wealth, and the other the giver of fertility to the earth; and, secondly, as both presided over the highways, upon which account, the latter was called Trivia; and both protected the roads, the travellers, thieves, shepherds, and shepherdesses, as he is affirmed to have followed their life; upon which account, these likewise c offered sacrifices to him. As an infernal deity, we conjecture him to have been represented with a beard; his winged cap rather resembled a disk, and instead of a caduceus, he held in one hand an odd kind of sceptre, and in the other a purse. His body was surrounded with a kind of imperial mantle, or paludamentum, tyed, or fastened, by some ornament, on one of his shoulders. This we infer from an ancient monument, an account of which may be seen in the margin (Y), in the inscription of which he is styled Augustus. There have been many other conjectures offered, both concerning this ancient monument, and the title there given him, as well as some others, which are met with in those old inscriptions; such as that of Artaius, Cissonius, Arvernus, and some others, which we shall not tire our readers with: we shall d likewise pass by some other dresses and attitudes with which the luxuriant fancies of the Gauls have represented him, and only add, that from what we have observed of those mounds in which the Gauls and Britains buried their dead, such as those we described on Salisbury plain, and what Livy says of such a kind of tumulus, or sepulchral mount, which Scipio took notice of in the neighbourhood of New Carthage in Spain, and which the natives called Mercury Teutat, one may draw a probable conjecture, that he was buried there. We have formerly shewn, that he reigned in Gaul,

(W) DIE INFERNIS VENER, MARTI, & MERCURIO SACRUM (34). With relation to his being the god of riches, we find an ancient witty inscription at Lyon, in Latin, to this effect: "Mercury promises you gain here, Apollo health, and Septimianus a lodging; but he that brings his dinner with him, will fare the better. After this, stranger, you must look out where to lodge (35)." As this city was one of the most trading ones in Europe, the scarcity of inns in it, at that time, might make the opulent and generous Septimianus give strangers this odd invitation.

(X) As he was supposed to assist women in labour, the names of Proserpina, and Proserpina, might be given her on account of her turning the child to the right position for the birth. Those who make two goddesses of them think, that the one had power to remedy what was past, and the other to prevent what was to come. In one of those inscriptions, under a double bust, one of Mercury, and the other of that goddess, she is called Rosmerta; in some others it is Mercury, and Fort. Verre, or Fortuna Verre, or happy

(Y) This appears, from a large bas-relievo, between five and six feet long, and about three in breadth, and near two in thickness, dug up out of a gentleman's vineyard, near one of the gates of the city of Beauvais. The inscription is, Sacrum Mercurio Augusto C. Julius Heulissus V S L M. It is plain, from some other inscriptions in Gruter, that a bearded Mercury was common in Gaul, though not among the Greeks and Romans; and the title Augustus, which we find in several ancient medals given to other gods and goddesses, or rather to emperors and empresses deified under their names, inclines us to think, that this monument was dedicated to Mercury after he had been deified by the Gauls, and reckoned among the infernal deities. Some distinction, doublets, there must have been of his dress, &c. under this last denomination, and this seems the most likely to have been it; but it is here offered only as a probable conjecture.

a which comprehended then the greatest part of Europe, and particularly Spain; and may be reasonably therefore supposed to have been there interred, after the Celtic or Gaulish manner. Other heaps or mounds, there were, which likewise bore his name; but those were of a different nature, as the reader may see in the next note (Z). How he was worshipped by the Gauls under any of these three denominations, is hard to guess; only as he was, in imitation of the Romans, deified as the god of traffick and riches, we may suppose they borrowed some of their rites from the worship which the Roman merchants paid to him there, and which is beautifully described by the poet ^k, who closes his account of it with this reflection, that Mercury could not but be inclined to forgive all the cheats and perjuries of these his votaries, when he remember'd how himself had been guilty of the like ^l. The chief victim with which they concluded his feast, was a sow with pig.
